Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1876, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the hygiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cnts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the jonrney, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel snre this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Vol. I. or II. mailed on receipt of $2.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of these were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Failing Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of its cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable, and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials backed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

[From the House and Home, N. Y.]

Among the successful physicians who hav departed from the narrow beaten track of orthodoxy, we may rank Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J. His principles are true, his system based upon scientific fact.'

[From the (Mo.) Liberal.

The reputation of Dr. Fellows is sufficient to warran any one in reposing confidence in his skill and ability These in need of his aid should not fail to consult him at once. Procrastination is the thief of time and often costs the life of a human being."

Gems of Thought.

IN 1863 the archbishops and bishops of the Church of England, in their protest to Bishop Colenso, affirmed: "All our hopes for eternity, the very foundation of our faith, our nearest and dearest consolations are taken from us, if one line of the sacred book be declared unfaithful or untrustworthy."—O. B. Frothingham.

WHAT is revered by others has a claim on my tenderness and forbearance, however far removed from my own belief. For this reason I am not in sympathy with those persons who ridicule or despise the faith and practices of any religion. I know that in such forms are embodied the highest conceptions and purest aspirations of a vast proportion of mankind; and that the forms themselvs are in the present order indispensable to the souls which cling to them. Justice, kindness, and a regard for the highest interests of us all, as well as of the cause of truth itself, demand that such things should be treated with respect, though never that one should pretend to believe in them when he does not, or refrain from resisting, by word and deed, when occasion calls for it, their false claims and encroachments.—N. P. Waters

ACCORDINGLY he by degrees perceives
His feelings of aversion softened down;
A holy tenderness pervades his frame,
His sanity of reason not impaired,
Say rather, all his thoughts now flowing clear,
From a clear fountain flowing, he looks round
And seeks for good; and finds the good he seeks;
Until abhorrence and contempt are things
He only knows by name; and if he hear,
From other mouths the language which they speak,
He is compassionate; and has no thought,
No feeling, which can overcome his love.
—Wordsworth.

CHARLES V., after his abdication, amused himself, in his retirement at St. Juste, by attempting to make a number of watches go exactly together. Being constantly foiled in this attempt, he exclaimed: "What a fool hav I been to neglect my own concerns, and to waste my whole life in a vain attempt to make all men think alike on matters of religion, when I cannot even make a few watches keep time together."—Colton's Lacon.

WE will hope the best rather than fear the worst, and believe that there never was a right thing done or a wise one spoken in vain, although the fruit of them may not spring up in the place designated or at the time expected.—Lander's Imaginary Conversations.

THAT the Noachian deluge, recorded in the scripture, covered the whole earth, was the universal opinion until toward the close of the last century. . . . . The present tendency of opinion among writers like the late Hugh Miller, is to regard the flood of Noah as partial and local, though the universality seems to be implied in the biblical description.—Chambers's Encyclopedia. [Seems! Madam, nay it is; I know not seems.—Hamlet.]

WITH the discovery of the immense age of our earth and the enormous length of time (compared with our historical accounts), during which man has been an inhabitant of the globe, and with the knowledge that man's origin is almost without doubt to be derived from a lower order of the animal kingdom, and certainly from very primitiv and savage ancestors, the old account of the first pair, the fall, the curse of the race, the "scheme of salvation," as indicated in the prophesied "seed of the woman" that should "bruise the serpent's head"—all this, upon which is built up the lofty structure of "justification by faith" and "redemption through the blood of the Lamb," crumbles away, and the vast system falls to the ground.—Stoddard's New Faith.

TO reason the king—James II.—was not in the habit of attending. His mode of arguing, if it is to be so called, was one not uncommon among dull and stubborn persons, who are accustomed to be surrounded by their inferiors. He asserted a proposition, and as often as wiser people ventured respectfully to show that it was erroneous, he asserted it again in exactly the same words, and conceived that by doing so he at once dispensed of all objections.—Macaulay.

A FRIEND called on Michael Angelo, who was finishing a statue: some time afterward he called again; the sculptor was still at his work; his friend, looking at the figure, exclaimed: "You hav been idle since I saw you last!" "By no means," replied the sculptor; "I hav re-touched this part, and finished that; I hav softened this feature, and brought out this muscle; I hav given more expression to this lip, and more energy to this limb." "Well, well," said his friend, "but all these are trifles." "It may be so," replied Angelo, "but recollect that trifles make perfection, and perfection is no trifle." —Colton's Lacon.

TAKE from the New Testament all passages upholding the idea that belief is necessary to salvation; that Christ was offered as an atonement for the sins of the world; that the punishment of the human soul will go on forever; that heaven is the reward of faith, and hell the penalty of honest investigation; take from it all miraculous stories—and I admit that all the good passages in it are true; and if they are true, it makes no difference whether they are inspired or not.—Ingersoll.

YOU ought to settle it in your mind that it is "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth" that you want. How is it with most people? Is it not true that as we go on in life we find that some how or other we hav come into posession of certain opinions. We do not know where they came from; we inherited them, perhaps, or we picked them up along the pathway of life. But we hav come to hold certain views of things, and we hav come to hav a sort of personal attachment to them, and if anybody comes along and questions their truth, nine times out of ten we resent it as a personal affront. We are in the position, then, not of truth seekers, but of positiv and earnest defenders of certain views, without much regard to whether they are true or not.—M. J. Savage.

Odds and Ends.

A WOMAN calls her husband Good Resolutions, because he is always broke.

A JERSEY milkman turned pale when several of his customers clubbed together and made him a present of a scarf pin in the shape of a pump. It was a cow-herdly act.

CHICAGO must be a very dry place notwithstanding its proximity to the lake. In some parts of that city there is a saloon for every six houses. Chicago is a spirited village.

SOME Indiana papers refuse to publish any poetry not written by a person who has been a resident of the state for a year. There's nothing like encouraging home industry, especially when kindling material can be obtained for nothing.

"DOES your husband talk in his sleep, madam?" inquired a young physician who was gathering statistics for a work on dreams. "No, sir; that would be impossible," the lady replied. "Why impossible, madam?" asked the astonished doctor. "Because he's been under the sod for several years," gaily answered the happy widow.

THEY were out fishing on the serpentine Hackensack River, when she suddenly exclaimed, "I've got a bite!" "Haul it in, quick!" he shouted as he caught hold of her line. "Why, it isn't there, dear," said she, holding out her hand; "here it is," and she exhibited a mammoth musketo to the excited young man. They don't watch the meteors together, now.

IT is said that formerly in one of the remote mining settlements of Wyoming a single copy of a religious paper containing a sermon by the Rev. Mr. Talmage made its appearance weekly, and that every Saturday evening the men of the community met to determin by a game of "seven-up" who should read the sermon in public on the following day.

THE FINDING OF MOSES.

On Egypt's banks, contagious to the Nile,
Great Pharaoh's daughter went to bathe in style;
And as she ran about to dry her royal skin,
She kicked the bulrush that had little Moses in.
At that event surprised, awhile she stud,
In silence gazing on the sacred flud;
Then turning to her maids, she said in accents mild,
Blood an' ages, girls, which of yez owns the child?

THE colored voters are beginning to understand politics as well if not better than most white voters. One of the candidates for an office at the municipal election in Austin not long since relied on the fidelity of an old family servant to help him out among the colored voters. The candidate was beaten. After the election he was told that his colored political friend had voted against him. He did not believe it, but, meeting him one day, the ex-candidate said;

"I'll giv you a dollar, Jim, to tell me whom you voted for."

"I voted agin you, boss."

"Well, here is the dollar for your candor."

"Look heah, boss, ef yar am gwine ter pay fer de candor, I mout as well own up. I voted agin yer free different times. Free dollars moah, if yer please, boss."

THE meanest man resides in Merced. His name is William Fahey, and he keeps a hotel. He made a wager with George Soper that the latter could not swallow two dozen raw eggs in twenty consecutiv minutes. The wager was for $25, and Soper, as he waited for the eggs, allowed his mind to revel in castle building. He thought how much good he could do with that $25, and how many smiles he would bring to the pallid lips of orphans and the fatherless and husbandless. Soper knew he could do it as easy as falling off a log, and he was just looking out of the window to call in some poor little girl or boy to get a dollar or two for the poor, hard-worked mother, when the eggs were brought in. He immediately lost all confidence in humanity, for Fahey had rung in twenty-four goose eggs, not one of them weighing less than half a pound. Soper don't go to Fahey's any more. It broke him all up.—Stockton (Cal.) Independent.

WHY SHE TALKED TO THE FLY-SCREEN MAN.

She knew he was the fly-screen man by the samples under his arm, but she held the door open and permitted him to say:

"Madam, I notice that you havn't a fly screen at any door or window."

"Not a one," she answered.

"You must be overrun with flies?"

"We are."

"Flies are a terrible nuisance?"

"Yes, indeed."

"And this seems to be a good locality for musketoes?"

"Oh, yes, sir."

"And a great deal of dust blows into a house not protected by screens?"

"A great deal, sir."

"And how many windows hav you in the house?"

"Sixteen."

"Each one ought to hav a half size."

"Yes, sir."

"And I can make them cheaper to you than any other man in the business."

"I think you can."

"Do you prefer plain green or figured?"

"Well, I always did like plain green."

"Very well: I will measure the windows and take your order."

"You needn't trouble yourself any further," she quietly replied.

"What! Don't you want screens?"

"No, sir, The other day the woman across the street had ten minutes' conversation with a tin peddler, and she's had her nose in the air over me ever since. A fly-screen man is about three times as high as a potato man, and I've been talking to you to let her see that she isn't the only lady in town who can put on airs. She's mad as a hen by this time, and now you get up and dust or I'll hav my dog run you clear to the river."—Detroit Free Press.

EXPLANATION.

The advertisment which appeared last week signed by Wm. Wilson calls for an explanation.

In October, 1881, Wilson sold his stock, patent, and good will to the Wilsonia Magnetic Clothing Company, which was organized to continue the business carried on by Wilson. His eccentric methods in business soon caused difficulties which could not be adjusted. It was therefore agreed that Wilson should retire. In June last he ceased to be a member of the company, retaining as his share the Wilsonia Corset, which is not included under the term "Magnetic Garments" as we use it.

The "caution" in the advertisment referred to will apply to certain individuals who are imitating "Wilsonia" and trading upon the reputation of "Wilsonia."

But the absurdity of the concluding paragraph will be seen when we state that Wilson has bound himself under penalty for violation of agreement, not to manufacture "Magnetic Garments," and that, as our agent for Boston, he obtains from us all the "Wilsonia" garments which he advertises for sale. It will be asked, "Why should Wilson thus try to mislead the readers of this paper?" We reply, "It is one of his eccentric methods in business."

Our Magnetic Garments are increasing in reputation day by day. Send all orders directed as below. Pamphlet containing testimonials, price list, etc., mailed free.

THE BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?
BY
Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogatives of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adqocated.

The strong commendations of the secular prass show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

Notes and Clippings.

We understand that Mrs. Besant has just received the only certificate in honors in Botany which has been issued this year from South Kensington.

A girl slept seventy-three days at Beaujon, France, and then awoke very slowly, the use of the faculties as well as the limbs returning only by gradual steps. Speech was restored last.

An ecclesiastical inquiry has been made in England into misconduct on the part of the rector of Chastleton. The bishop said that the defendant's course had been such as to lead almost every one to think that there was some ground for the charges of immorality.

The Salvation Army has begun operations in Toronto. Major Moore is there with a detachment of twenty soldiers and a lieutenant. They sing in the streets, just as they hav done in other cities, but hav not as yet conducted themselvs in as noisy ways as in Brooklyn, Jersey City, and Peoria. The Toronto people are exceedingly conservativ and orderly, and will not be likely to tolerate such proceedings as the Salvationists hav indulged in elsewhere.

Attempts to boycott the products of Chinese workmanship in San Francisco are not entirely successful. While Chinese cheap labor is vigorously denounced, practical experience shows that when it comes to the actual payment of coin, the wares that cost least at the same quality are the ones purchased. When Chinese-made shoes are placed beside others that white workmen hav manufactured, and are sold fifty cents a pair cheaper, they are nearly always preferred.

The Rev. Mr. Brand, of Oberlin, Ohio, whose sermon about Druggist Bronson, a sly rumseller, has led to a suit for damages, wound up the discourse by addressing Bronson thus: "Good men shall breathe freer at thy death and utter thanksgiving when thou art gone. Men shall place thy gravestone as a monument and a testimony that a plague is stayed; and as, borne on the blast, thy guilty spirit whistles toward the gates of hell, the hideous shrieks of those whom thou hast destroyed shall pierce thee—hell's first welcome."

A Chicago letter-writer says that at a recent Sabbath evening service in that city the pastor, who was going to Europe for the summer, took a very affecting leave of his congregation, and at the close requested that all should join with him in repeating the Lord's Prayer, "after which" the choir would "sing a hymn." As soon as the prayer was finished the basso struck up "Rocked in the cradle of the deep," and the organist favored the audience with a mock thunder-storm, with howling winds, etc., between the verses. And then the benediction!

"Has yer had yer boy baptized?" asked Jim Webster of Sam Johnsing, both colored. "Not yet." "What's de reason?" "Bekase de Rev. Aminidab Baxter charges two dollars for ebery chile." "A whole two dollars! Dat am wuss dan highway robbery. De Rev. Whangdoodle Baxter baptized bofe my twins, and he only charged me twenty-five cents." "Yes, but dat ar must be a powerful unreliable kind ob a baptism what only costs two for a quarter. I wants a cheap article myself, but I ain't gwine ter come down so low as two for a quarter."

At an Eastern revival meeting the minister in the course of his remarks informed his hearers that he was the conductor of a salvation train; that the accommodations were first-class; that there were no misplaced switches to fear, and that Peter was waiting to receive them at the depot at the other end of the line. Thereupon a tall, gaunt, keen-visaged man in the outskirts of the crowd, addressing the clergyman, said: "I'm a good deal consarned in what yeou hev to say, stranger, and ef yeou kin git me a back seat on enny of them air keers for half price, I'll buy a ticket."

Apropos of the various camp-meetings now in progress, the story told of a certain meeting of this character among the colored people in the South, a few years ago, is not inappropriate. It was a Methodist camp, and one Sunday night, when a young white preacher was in attendance, the sable worshipers seemed to be powerfully moved to shouting and exhortation. The minister earnestly prayed that the power of the devil might be "curtailed." "Amen! bress der Lor' for dat!" shouted an old darkey close by the altar. "Oh, yes, Lor'! cut him tail smoove, smack off!"

The Prohibitionists of Iowa hav their amendment to the Constitution, but much difficulty remains for them to overcome. A legislature has next to be elected to carry the amendment into effect by providing pains and penalties for its violation. Wine and beer will continue to be sold in the state until a law is passed making the sale a criminal offense. The first effect of such an act will be to stop the manufacture of beer in Iowa; but to provide against its consequences a leading brewer in Milwaukee has made arrangements to put canvassers in every town in the state to take orders for beer delivered on the cars in that city.

This is why he quit preaching: "I understand, Uncle Amos, that you hav quit preaching," said the secretary of state to an old colored man who for years has had charge of a church in Little Rock. "Yes, boss, I'se stepped aside." "Why did you quit?" "Wall, dar was numerous pressures brought ter bar agin de ole man. Da charged me wid stealin' a ham for one thing, and 'vised me ter quit." "Why, they couldn't prove that you stole the ham, could they?" "No, sah, da couldn't, and ef I hadn't 'knowledged it da neber would hab prubed it." "Why did you acknowledge it?" "Case da found de ham under my bed, sah."—Arkansaw Traveler.

To a country parson not more than half way round the world from Boston a rustic couple went to be married, accompanied by the aunt of the bride, an elderly female, with sharp eyes and nose and a general air of intending to see that everything was done duly and in order. The aunt watched keenly during the ceremony, nodding her head vigorously at each emphatic word, and at the conclusion she rose energetically to her feet, saluted the newly-married couple with a business-like air, and then turned briskly to the clergyman. "Mr. M.," she said, "I never met you before, but I know who you are, and I must say how beautiful and how grammatical you hav married them two."

Toronto keeps Sunday in a more rigidly quiet way than any other city of its size on this continent. The street cars do not run, the bootblack boys are not on duty, and all the telegraph offices are closed except the central one, where one man remains all day to attend to important messages. The cab stands are deserted, and anybody who wants a vehicle and team must go to a livery stable. The drug stores are open at certain hours, and that only for the sale of medicins. The liquor shops close at seven on Saturday evening, and remain closed until five on Monday morning. It is said by those who claim to know that only the front doors are closed, and that the thirsty can be admitted by the back door and obtain all the liquor they want.

Once, during a very busy term of the court, George P. Smoote, who had been a lawyer, but who had reformed and adopted the pulpit as an eminence from which to spread persuasiv eloquence, came to town and announced, with special invitation to the bar, that he would preach at night. One of the lawyers arose and requested that the court adjourn at night that the lawyers might hav a chance of hearing the lawyer-divine. "All right," said Judge McCown. "Mr. Clerk, enter it upon the record that this court adjourns to hear the Rev. George P. Smoote preach." "Your Honor," said Judge Eakin, who now occupies a seat on the supreme bench of the state, arising and addressing the court, "it is unnecessary to enter it upon the record." "Enter it, Mr. Clerk," continued the Judge. "I am a Baptist; Mr. Smoote is a Methodist, and I want it entered, so that if he ever falls from grace I'll hav the record on him."

The Du Quoin Press prints this item: "Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of The Truth Seeker, was last year sent by his friends upon a tour around the world. He accomplished the trip, returning last week, just one year to a day from the time he started. He wrote a detailed and exhaustiv acount of his travels and what he saw during his long journey, the recital filling four large volumes. Mr. Bennett traveled with his eyes wide open, and he details in graphic and fluent style the story of his wanderings. One peculiarity of these travels is that they were written from a secular or anti-religious standpoint. They are, however, marked by a spirit of fairness, and, while not in the interest of Christianity, the author is very candid, and treated with high regard the religious opinions of all with whom he came in contact. The consequence was that Mr. Bennett was the recipient of many flattering attentions from the people whose countries he visited. They seemed to be inclined from his age and learning to regard him as a true philosopher. Mr. Bennett's friends gave him a dinner on his return, of which we giv the following extract from the New York Tribune concerning the feast: 'Mr. Bennett, not visibly the worse for his apotheosis, rose to speak amid much cheering and clapping of hands. Of all the lands which he had traversed—and he had seen many—there was none, in his opinion, to compare with America. Greece he had seen, and Egypt, and the Holy Land; he had been in a place where he could look almost from one end of it to the other, and it was his opinion that if Palestine was the chosen, whoever had made the choice had never seen the state of New York.'"

Every six months a notice is circulated in the female penitentiaries of France calling upon all women who feel inclined to go out to New Caledonia and be married to make an application to that effect through the governor. The matrimonial candidates must be young and exempt from physical infirmities. Girls under long sentences readily catch at this method of escaping from prison life. The only moral qualification requisit is to hav behaved well at least two years in the penitentiary. The selected candidates hav to sign engagements promising to marry convicts and to settle in New Caledonia for the remainder of their lives. On these conditions the government transports them, givs them an outfit, and a ticket of leave when they land at Noumea. Their marriages are arranged for them by the governor of the colony, who has a selection of well-behaved convicts ready for them to choose from, and each girl may consult her own fancy within certain limits, for the proportion of marriageable men to women is about three to one. It has frequently happened that pretty girls hav been wooed by warders, free settlers, or time-expired soldiers and sailors, instead of by convicts. In such cases the governor can only assent to a marriage on condition that the female convict's free lover shall place himself in the position of a ticket-of-leave man, and undertake never to leave the colony. The married couples get huts and free grants of land, and all they can draw from it by their own labor becomes theirs. During five years they are subjected to the obligation of reporting themselvs weekly at the district police office, and they are forbidden to enter public houses, and must not be found out of doors at night. This probationary period being satisfactorily passed, they get their full freedom, but subject always to the condition of remaining in the colony. To this rule the law has forbidden that any exception shall be made On no account whatever must convicts who hav accepted grants of land and contracted "administrativ marriages," as they are called, ever return to France.

News of the Week.

Outrages on Jews are reported from the interior of Poland.

Arguments for prosecution and defense hav not yet terminated in the Star route cases being tried in Washington.

One Garland, of Lunenburg Court House, Va., who killed a man in a duel, was acquitted of murder by the jury.

Train robbers stopped a camp-meeting excursion train near Toledo, O., on the 28th ult., and robbed the passengers of their watches and jewelry.

A movement is on foot to place a bust of the American poet Longfellow in Westminster Abbey in London. Tennyson has given his name to the scheme.

In spite of the prohibitory law the saloonkeepers still carry on their business openly in Iowa. A test case resulted in victory for the saloon-keepers.

A riot is reported to hav taken place near Calcutta, in India, in which great atrocities were committed by the Hindoos on Mohammedans, who are in a small minority.

The residents of Cleveland county, N. C., held an indignation meeting and warned out of the state several Mormon emissaries who hav been for some time proselyting in that section.

Two brothers named Johnson, of Fairfield, N. C, quarreled about a watermelon. A shotgun was introduced into the discussion, and one of the brothers was shot through the head and died instantly.

At Brownville, last Saturday evening, a minister who had made himself distasteful to his congregation was taken bodily from the pulpit, carried out of the church, and requested to seek another field of labor.

The latest political scandal is the report that Gov Cornell, of New York, has been gambling in Wall street and made many thousand dollars at the expense of his friends. The story was put into circulation by Jay Gould.

There is trouble over the Irish Skirmishing fund. Ninety thousand dollars has been subscribed, and a meeting of the subscribers was held last Sunday to inquire of the trustees what disposition has been made of the money.

Judge Benedict's coachman has disappeared, and is supposed to hav fallen overboard from a Hudson River steamboat. It is possible that the man committed suicide as a sort of vicarious atonement for the sins of his master.

Thomas Smith, a prominent resident of New Orleans, was buried on the 28th. He had had ten wives at one time, nine of whom survive him, and seven accompanied his remains to the grave He was a very pious man, and was habitually married by a Baptist minister.

The British troops in Egypt are advancing on Kafr-el-Dwar, the stronghold of Arabi, and the decisiv battle is expected soon. The nativ army is continually being reinforced from the peasantry, and the rebel strength is unknown. Several fights in a small way hav occurred, with what are claimed as important victories for the English.

On the afternoon of August 26th Andrew Canary, a Catholic priest, hired a horse at a livery stable in this city. He did not return, and the horse was advertised as stolen. A policeman caught sight of the priest next day on the street and arrested him. He says he got drunk, and has not the faintest idea where he left the horse and buggy. He was locked up.

A minister named Phillips, of Shiloh, O., got into a quarrel with a member of his congregation over the Sunday law, attacked him with with his fists, and received a stab wound in return from which he is expected to die. Popular feeling is against the clergyman, who is said to be intensely domineering in his manner, desires to dictate the conduct of his parishioners, and is very hard to get along with pleasantly.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Bishamon-ten is the heavenly protector of priests. The bushi or cavaliers of all sects regard this diety as their special patron, and they call upon him to make them dexterous swordsmen, good horsemen, learned scholars, and successful men in their various undertakings. The image is a standing figure holding in the left hand a pagoda which contains the souls of the devout, and in the right hand a naked sword to protect those souls. His periodical festival day is the day of the tiger.

Harjin-ten (heavenly joy of joys), sometime called Sho-den (wisdom), has a large number of worshipers. The original idol was two figures embracing, but is now represented single. It is prayed to by all sects for wordly success, and it is claimed that his prayerful devotees receive benefits for seven generations to come. The idol is supposed to be highly pleased if boiled in oil.

Ben-zai-ten (heavenly goddess of capacity and ability) is a deity to whom all the sects are fond of offering prayers. Women especially approach the shrine of this goddess and breathe out the desires of their souls, and particularly ask for ability, attractiveness, and wealth. Men pray for wealth and honor; actors visit her and pray for success and for the power to please. Her shrines are often placed near the water's edge on artificial islands in lakes or shoal water. Snake-day is the occasion of visiting her shrines.

Dai-koku-ten is a god represented in various forms. It is usually represented as a stout figure, sitting on rice bags, wearing a cap, with a sack on the shoulder, the mouth closely closed with the left hand, a mallet in the right hand. The lesson taught by this is that human nature, being prone to excess of ambition, therefore low stature and an humble attitude most befit it. The cap partly covers the eyes, to prevent their looking too high and to keep them bent on the realities of life. The bag represents wealth, like the wind, difficult to attain and requiring its outlet to be firmly controled. The mallet is an emblem of labor, by which alone the fruits of the earth can be obtained, and the bags of rice denote the wealth to be acquired by adopting the precepts which raise the low above the multitude. All sects and classes call upon him for full purses and success in life. The day of the rat is set apart for him.

Fud-so (immovable, honored one) is generally represented seated, and always surrounded by flames, holding a naked sword in his right hand, with which to punish the wicked and terrify the heedless into obedience; in the left a coil of rope, with which to confine the guilty. Pilgrimages are often made to his shrines in the interest of the sick. These penances are not unfrequently made without clothing, standing under a spout of cold water, or abstaining from favorite articles of food, and protracted fasts, in order to please the deity. Miracles are claimed to be often performed at these shrines, such as the blind being made to see, the lame to walk, the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.

Ni-wo-son (two honored kings) are two idols placed to guard the entrance of temples. One is in red, has the mouth open, and represents the Yo, or male principle of Japanese philosophy. The other is green, with the mouth firmly closed, indicative of silence, and represents the female principle, or In. Small pictures of these, pasted on the beam or over the entrance of houses, are supposed to be a protection against burglars and thieves.

Kishi Mojin (the mother of child demons) is a very bad goddess. She steals young children and devours them. She had a thousand children of her own, one of which was hidden from her as a punishment for killing the children of others. Let it be hoped she reformed.

There are many other gods in the Buddhistic category; but I will not take the time and space to describe more of them. In addition are many human gods, or mikadoes and saints who have been deified after death, some of which I will briefly notice. The Japanese name for these is Hotoke.

Amida Niorai, or Buddha himself. This divinity is represented in a sitting posture by bronze statues of very large size, some of them over fifty feet in hight, and called Dai Butzu. One is at Kamakura, one at Kioto, and some six of smaller size at Tokio. Sometimes these statues are standing, but usually seated on a lotus flower. This god is considered so far above the common deities that it is of little use for ordinary mortals to attempt to aspire to such dignity. These statues present the appearance of perfect passivity and rest, with naught to disturb their unmoved contemplation. Worship is paid to these statues on the 15th of each month.

Hotei is the name of a celebrated Chinese priest who was kind to children. He is the Japanese Santa Claus, and is represented with a capacious sack gathering goodly treasures for his numerous little friends. He is said to have eyes in the back of his head, and can see around corners, and thus is able to tell whether all the little boys and girls are good or not.

Jiuro-jin is a little man with a high head. He is intended to represent the south star.

Shoto-kutanishi was the first son of Yom Tenwo. He became a learned scholar while yet a child. He was the founder of the religion in Japan, and died at the age of forty-nine. Idols may be seen, well worn by devotees rubbing the finger and then the affected portion of their own bodies. He was one of the disciples of Buddha noted for his untiring energy in benefiting human beings.

Chiu-jo-hime was the first Japanese nun, and the only woman deified as an idol. She is said to have extracted the fibers of the lotus root and wove them with silk to make tapestry for altars.

There are twelve demi-gods, which closely resemble the twelve signs of the zodiac.

There are also a class of thirty Buddhistic gods, called Bosatz, one for each day of the month, but their names need not be mentioned.

Sennin are spirits which inhabit and haunt the mountains.

Ten-nin are beautiful creatures from Paradise, and really mean good actions.

Kari-yobinga are birds of sweet song in Paradise, making music for the saints.

Onie are demons or evil spirits, and are typical of bad actions.

Hotoke is the generic term for the spirits of the departed which have become gods or have become absorbed into Nirvana. Divinities and household altars are known by this general term.

Niarai are the divinities who watch over humanity, and to whom petitions must be addressed.

Bosatzu are the apostles of Buddha and a few eminent priests of olden time, and are the chief patron saints of the various trades, virtues, views, and wants of humanity.

Rakkan are the disciples of the Buddhistic creed, and who learned direct from the great teacher. Five hundred of them are claimed, though sixteen are the most distinguished and revered.

It was long the custom for temples to be the resting-places for travelers, especially priests, and guests were entertained without regard to religious belief. Intermarriage and adoption frequently bring several sects into families, but this is got along with pleasantly. The religionists of Japan are not so intolerant toward each other as has been the case in many other countries.

Ho-o is the priestly name by which the mikado was known when he entered the priesthood. His children who became priests were known as Niudo-shin-O, or Ho-shin-O.

Monseki are the chief priests of the sects, and are appointed by the mikado. As the Monto priests marry, the position remains in the family. If no children are born adoption is resorted to. In the other sects celibacy for the priesthood is enjoined. The teachers of the mikado, if he enters the priestly class, are called Dai-shi, Kokushi, or Kai-shi. The founders of the sects are called Kai-san, expounders or first teachers.

Sanja (reverend persons) is the term often used in speaking of the learned and holy men of both the past and present. Dai-sojo is the highest title of rank held by the priesthood. The next three grades in descending order are Gon-dai-so-ji, Dai-so-dzu, and Gon-dai-sodzu. Shonin is a sage or learned theologian to whom his sect is much indebted for knowledge or extension of the creed. The same term is applied to the founder of sects. O-sho is the term for superior priests. Inge is the local chief of a temple. Those of an inferior grade are called hajo, jin-u-injiu, anshiu, etc. Their garbs are somewhat different.

Temples are generally built with money collected by priests, who afterward take possession of them. Some have been built by the mikado, or by the shogun, when that office existed. Great virtue is supposed to be acquired by building temples and giving money to embellish them. The daimios formerly erected numerous temples from the same motives. Temples attached to graveyards are supported by the families who have relatives or friends buried there, from the prince to the peasant.

Until within the last few years the priests drew large salaries from the government and officials; but latterly they have been thrown upon their own resources, and have been reduced almost to beggary.

Certain celebrated idols are frequently conveyed from place to place, and the temple where they take up their temporary abode is, of course, a point of attraction. The treasures kept in the larger temples, or in the treasure-houses, often are of a valuable character, consisting of golden vessels, ornaments, etc., donated by rich officials and others. Relics are also deposited in the same places, and are exhibited to the public on certain occasions. Visitors can occasionally see them by feeing the priests pretty liberally. Temples and the grounds surrounding them are made the playgrounds of children, and they show little respect on account of the sacred character of the locality, and are not particularly awed by the grim gods who look down sternly upon them. Offerings of stone or metal lanterns, pictures, rice, saké, and numerous other articles are often brought to the temples by visitors and worshipers.

Kuji, meaning nine figures, is a charm used to protect from harm. The fingers of the right hand are held in certain ways, and figures are described in the air, then both hands joined, the fingers interlocked; after certain numerous set modes, called in-wo-musubu, after which hot iron may be touched with impunity, a naked sword may be stood upon without harm; robbers and housebreakers become so affected by the same as to become rigid and helpless; this being of great benefit to the possessor.

FUNERAL CEREMONIES.

Old people of either sex prepare for death by making frequent visits to the shrine of Buddha and departed spirits in the state of bliss. They also are visited by the priests, who pray with them, and by conversation prepare them for the great change. Those who contemplate suicide visit the temples or shrines with a view of appeasing the deities for the rash act they expect to perform. When an accidental injury or illness occurs the priest is sent for, and the friends of the sick man make pilgrimages to the shrines or temples for his benefit. When restoration to health is despaired of the priest again pays a visit, and after the person's death selects the kaimio, or posthumous name for the departed, and writes it upon a slip of white paper, pasted upon a small tablet of unstained wood. The corpse is moved with his head to the north, and a folding screen turned upside down is placed by it. Cakes of raw rice flour, a saucer of oil, and a dim rushlight are placed near the corpse; also his eating-tray, cup, saucer, and chop-sticks, with vegetable food, so that the dead man can eat what he needs. Forty-eight hours after death the corpse is washed in warm water and prepared for the coffin, or kan, and his head is shaved, a priest making the first three strokes with a razor, when the process is finished by a servant. The corpse is dressed in a white shroud, made of silk, linen, or cotton, according to the circumstances of the family. The heads of female corpses are sometimes shaven, and sometimes the hair falls down loose over the back and shoulders. Stockings are put upon the feet, but not sandals, for the reason that they are not worn in Paradise.

The coffin or kan is wholly unlike those used with us, being a high tub, a square box or large earthenware jar or vase. The body is buried in a sitting position and not a recumbent. The hands are joined as in the act of prayer. The vacant space in the coffin is often filled with chaff, tea leaves, or more costly incense. The wealthy use considerable vermilion. Those who are shaven have a cap placed upon the head. The bier is laid upon trestles, and the face of the corpse turned to the north; a temporary altar is erected on which food is again placed.

The family do not retire for rest on the night before the funeral, and the time is spent in the recitation of prayers by priests. In the processions to the grave considerable formality is observed, especially among the upper classes, and in the following order: Priests in mourning, two white paper lanterns, trunks, lance-bearers, retainers, halbert-bearers, incense-bearers, tablet, coffin on a stand carried by two poles on the shoulders of four bearers who frequently change; the long and short sword of the deceased, one on each side, tied up in covers and born by retainers; the sandal bearer, the favorite horse of the deceased, led by a groom; men bearing baskets of rain coats; mourners on horseback and on foot; the heir on horseback; the members of the family; invited friends. Interspersed through the procession are bearers of white paper lanterns. Every article used is white, so far as possible. This extensive ceremonial is in case of a rich man; with the poor the matter is far more simple.

The corpse is taken to the temple, where it is rested on trestles; prayers are recited for the dead, and often cakes are handed around to those in attendance. At the ending of the prayers the body is taken to the grave, accompanied by the priest, who continues to recite prayers until the interment is completed.

Cremation is often employed, and the process is attended with but little ceremony, the coffin being placed over the place for burning, in a small brick or mud building for the purpose, with a peaked roof and often a high chimney for carrying away unpleasant odors; fire is lighted beneath, and fuel supplied in sufficient quantities to effect the burning, which requires two or three hours. Often the coffin is not burned, but several corpses at a time placed upon a pile of wood and all burned together. Each one is numbered, and after the ashes become cold they are gathered up, placed in an urn, and buried in the cemetery, or the urns or jars are sent to a temple at Koyasan, where is an immense collection of such urns from all parts of the country. About nine thousand dead are cremated annually. For a while, in deference to European sentiment, the practice was ordered discontinued; but after two or three years the embargo was removed, when cremation was resumed. Priests are sometimes employed to remain with the dead while the burning is performed, but not usually. The funerals of the poor are often attended by torchlight, after dark, that their poverty need not be exposed.

The mourning for near relations is very deep, and continues from twenty days to a year. When parents have died business must be suspended for fifty days, as well as the use of the razors, saké, and all animal food. The temple and the grave must be visited daily. Brothers, sisters, husbands, wives, uncles, aunts, and all first-born children are mourned one hundred days.

JAPANESE COSMOGONY.

In additions to the religions of the country, a few remarks upon its cosmogony may be in order.

Konton, or chao, like an egg or embryo, was the original condition of all things, before the separation of the two principles, the In, the female, and the Yo, the male. The etherial ascended and became the heavens; the sediment was precipitated, from which the ashi sprung up like a young shoot. This shoot continued to grow until it became the first of the Kami, or the first being of the country, and was followed by the being who pushed his way into a circumscribed space, and the being who made the land pleasant and lively, and these represent the first fruits of the earth after chaos; and these were followed by the following in regular succession:

Takami-masubi-no-mi-koto, offspring of heaven and earth.

Kami, offspring of the gods.

Uji-hi-ni-no-mi-koto, offspring of the ground.

Ama-no-toko, offspring of the heavens.

The god of plentiful vegetation, the god of earth, the god of sand, the god of useful timber, the god of harvests, the god of husbandry, the god of primeval habitations, the god of primitive dwelling-places. Up to this period the male principal, Yo, being permanent, the sexes had not appeared.

The foregoing represents the creation.

After this the five elements, wood, fire, metal, earth, and water were divided, and in due order fulfilled their respective uses. Isanagi, the producer of the male, and Isanumi, the producer of the female, followed next in order, and these were the first couple in existence. The names were derived from the meaning of the first words spoken upon earth. The woman made the first advances; she beckoned to the man, and he was gallant enough to nod in response and go to her at once. They stood on the celestial bridge which spans the ethereal vault, the man waving the matchless falchion. The thought came to his mind that there might be some substance beneath the face of the waters, and he plunged his mighty weapon into the watery depths, and the drops which trickled from the weapon formed the dry land of an inconsiderable island. To this island the man and woman betook themselves with the intention of making it the foundation of a future continent. They started out to make the circuit of it, the woman turning to the right, and the man turning to the left, meeting on the opposite side from where they started; and at this juncture the woman spoke the first word uttered upon earth—Ana nigush-mashi otako ninu—O joy to meet a lovely man! But the man was so ill-natured as to be displeased because the woman had got in the first word, and insisted that the journey round the island should be repeated. When they again met the man made this little speech: Ana niyashi mashi ootone ni ainu—O joy to meet a lovely woman! Perhaps his remark was not altogether original, but that was the way the first pair began business; and that little island grew until it became the everlasting great Nipon, the largest island in the Japan group.

It so happened that the woman conceived and brought forth a female child, either as a punishment for having spoken the first word, or because the female principle was the most powerful. The man was, however, disappointed and displeased because it was not a boy.

The female child became Teushoko-dai-jin. The wife after brought forth another female child which was called Tsuki yomi no mikoto, the goddess of the moon, the moon itself. The third child fortunately was a male, and was named Hiro Ko, a leech. He was a tolerably smart boy, for at the age of three years, and when he could not walk, his parents built him a boat of camphor-wood, and set him adrift in the world, and he became one of the first fishermen in that part of the country. Catching fish and selling them is considered the first commercial transaction, and this primitive fisherman is still worshiped by fishermen, sailors, etc.

In due time the fourth child was born, and being a finely shaped boy, and after the two girls and the cripple it was very welcome. The hopes of the parents rested with the last born to populate the country. They, however, were doomed to disappointment, for the boy proved to be an unruly young fellow, and the older he grew the worse he grew, murdering the people in that part of the country and tearing up forests and destroying vegetation. His parents were under the necessity of sending him away to a foreign country. But he got homesick and returned, when he resumed his wild career. On one occasion he turned a wild horse loose into a field which his sister was cultivating in rice. The crop was trampled down and the field destroyed. Again after the sister had built a new house in which to prepare the new crop of rice that unruly boy defiled it so that she could no longer make use of it. On still another occasion when this industrious sister was sitting at her loom weaving he threw a rocking-horse's skin so violently against her and the loom as to prevent her working any more. In short, this bad specimen of the masculine persuasion persisted in his mischief to such an extent that his sister was compelled to leave home and flee to the celestial cave and shut herself in by rolling a huge rock before the door of the cave. The consequence was heaven, earth, and the four quarters became enveloped in darkness, and there was no distinction between day and night; and the eight hundred thousand gods assembled at the river-plain of Yusa to discuss what should be done to restore light to earth and heaven: and they procured for the Yokogo the country of perpetual day, a number of roosters, or domestic fowls, which crowed perpetually. These irrepressible crowers were taken to the mouth of the cave where the young woman had shut herself in, where Tatchi, the strong handed god stood waiting. The most beauteous god, Futodamano, brought from Ama-no-kuka yama a beautiful tree, on the top branch of which were suspended five hundred jewels; from the center branch hung a star-shaped mirror, while from the lower branch hung green and white slips of paper, and this tree, roots and all, was brought to the mouth of the cave. The gods then implored the young lady, Teu-sho-ko, to show her face, but she would not grant their request. Then Ama-no-usume-no-mikoto, the goddess with the heavenly, glossy countenance, proposed a dance before the mouth of the cave to excite the curiosity of the damsel inside, and to carry out the proposition she took the branches of the tree which the god had brought, and placed the jewels in her hair. She took a rod of bamboo, with grass tied to the end of it to make it look like a spear, and she also tied up her flowing sleeves with tendrils of ivy. Bonfires were then lighted, when the beautiful goddess danced before the cave with all her might, to the music of fifes, drums, and cymbals. The music and dancing did excite the curiosity of the young lady in the cave, and she wondered what it could all mean. To enable her to see what was going on outside she moved away the rock a little so she could look out, when a strong god seized the stone, cast it aside, and with his other hand grasped the fair damsel and drew her from the cave. Then the gods of the winds twisted a rope of rice straw, and drew it across the mouth of the cave. Then all was gladness and the rotation of day and night was established forever.

As a punishment to the bad boy who had caused all this trouble death was not inflicted upon him, but his hair was pulled out, one hair at a time, his fingernails and toenails pulled out, and he was banished to a far distant land to scratch for a living the best way he could.

When this was all over Isanami, who had not been altogether idle, brought forth a fifth child, Hino-Kam, the god of wildfire, but it was a bad job for her, for on the same day she was consumed by fire. But in the agonies of death she brought forth another child, the goddess of the earth and hills, and still another daughter, the goddess of water. After this Kakutsuchi married Hani-yama, and in due time the wife bore to her liege lord a fine son, the first produce of man and earth, and on his head grew the mulberry and silkworm, and from whose navel sprung the five cereals, rice, wheat, beans, millet, and sorghum.

There is a good deal more of this cosmological story, but perhaps I had not better take the time to tell it. You may not believe even what I have told. I do not vouch for its truth, and do not know that it contains very much; but I believe that those who got up this fable knew just about as much of the origin of the world, the sun, moon, and stars as the man who told that other story about everything being made in six days, about the earth producing plants, flowers, trees, and fruit before there was a sun, about a firmament being made and set in the heavens to hold the water above it from falling down and mixing with the water below it, about a man being made of the earth, he being put into a sleep, a rib extracted, of which a woman was formed; about a snake talking, and all the rest of it. The two stories will probably do very well to go together.

JAPANESE SUPERSTITIONS.

It is not a very long step from religion to superstition, so it will be easy to slide gently from a consideration or the religions of Japan to its superstitions or beliefs in charms, incantations, omens, etc. I shall not attempt to give a full list of all the nonsensical beliefs of this time which the people of these islands entertain, but it is quite likely that I may be able to state enough to convince you that they are by no means deficient in the strange opinions and superstitions so common in most other countries. There is less room in the Shinto system than in Buddhism for the class of vagaries under consideration, and for this reason the ignorant among the Buddhists have been charged with being the class which largely entertain them.

The Japanese believe greatly in fortune-telling, and have various modes of performing the feat. One way is as follows: Six pieces of hard wood are marked in a prescribed manner, then with fifty-one pieces of bamboo, like knitting-needles, of which one is laid down. The incantation is then recited, the fifty-two splints divided at random into two divisions, one for each hand; these are then counted out in lots of eight each, and the odd ones left determine the order in which the sticks are to be placed. This is repeated twice, and the third time the standing needles are counted out, six at a time. The means by which the solution is determined is obscure and hard to be understood, but the process is conducted as described.

Girls divine the future by dropping a long hairpin from their head into the matting and counting from the end of the pin, yes or no, yes—no, alternately, and the last straw in the mat indicates the answer to the question asked.

In building dwelling-houses good luck is supposed to be secured by having the door to the southeast, the closets on the southwest, the kitchen along side the storeroom.

Physiognomy and palmistry are very generally believed the same as formerly in Europe and America.

Another way of telling fortunes is to have a box containing a hundred slips of bamboo all numbered, and well shaken. From a hole in one end one of the slips is shaken out. The number on this corresponds with the number of a paper on which the drawer's fate is written, often, it must be confessed, in ambiguous language.

Spirit-rapping is believed in, the mediums being women. They use various incantations, and profess to be able to converse equally with the dead and living. They are known by their carrying a small bundle of peculiar shape, and also a light bark hat on the head or in the hand.

Amulets are much worn, and are usually obtained at shrines and temples where they are sold by priests. Servants wear them suspended by a string around the neck. More educated men are ashamed to wear them, and conceal them in some part of their clothing, or carry them in their tobacco pouch or purse. Women carry their amulets in a girdle specially made for the purpose, and which they never part with for a moment except when they undress for bathing. Night and day it is on their persons. Some of the more common ones are the Kannon, to give ability and good fortune through life; the Gozo, to bestow the gift of children, and enable their being reared; the Suii Tengu, to save from drowning and other harm; if choking, to swallow the paper of the amulet is a positive cure; the figure of Nichiren and of Kobodaishi, to carry them to paradise; Sei-sh, for good luck; Benten, for the gift of beauty, accomplishments, and attractiveness to their lovers; Chirice Gongen, to protects them from snakes, the greatest dread of Japanese women; Aizen, to cause children to be lovable, and a host of others for various gifts and powers. Girls when very young have some of these amulets suspended from the girdle in a small square pouch, and are worn for years. Ghost stories are widely believed in, and thousands of them are narrated, and some of a very horrible character. Women are said to return after death to nurse their little children they so unwillingly left behind. When lovers are parted for a season, and are faithful to each other, the one who dies first visits the living one and renews the love. When a man passes at night the grave of some girl he has loved it is believed that if he thinks of her, even though she had not reciprocated his love, she rises from the grave, appearing like a beautiful woman, carrying a lantern. He recognizes her as his lost love, and she visits him every night afterward in secret, until discovered by a third person. To all but him she appears a ghastly skeleton, but to him she is lovely in the extreme. The gifts presented by her lover are found on her grave. Ubume is a female specter believed to be often met on rivers and canal banks, on roads, through marshes, carrying a child. If met, she asks the traveler to do her the favor of holding her child for a minute or two while she is absent, but after the holder has held it until out of patience it begins to grow heavier and heavier every moment, until it falls from his arms a boulder which no man can lift.

Demons are believed in, and that they perform very strange feats. One day a man was drinking saké on the verandah of his house, enjoying himself and the prospect before him, when a hideous-looking demon, with sword, appeared beyond the garden fence, and gradually seemed to float toward the man drinking saké, who at once hid himself under some carpet, but, peeking out, he saw the baffled demon turn toward the house of his next neighbor, when a serious conflict soon took place. The neighbor attempted to attack the demon with a naked sword, but judge of his surprise when he discovered that he had struck off his wife's head and mangled the children. There are three very bad demons, one green, one red, and one black, who come after wicked souls when the measure of iniquity is full, and convey them on a terrible vehicle to the raging fires of pandemonium. Tengu is a good sort of devil, he never does harm to good people, nor to his own worshipers, but scoffers and scoundrels must beware. It is his business to guard temples and shrines. He is represented as having a very large nose; and he also wears a mask, which is black and has an enormous beak. The first, Dai Tengu, represents the male principle, and the second, Sho Tengu, represents the female principle.

Strange notions are entertained about the fox, which is as bad as the black cat in witch times in Christian countries. Marter Kitzune (the fox) takes upon him all shapes, but is particularly fond of appearing as a pretty woman, arrayed in very gay attire. In whatever shape, however, in which he appears, he is sure to follow his victim, or lead him over precipices, into rivers, wells, etc. But he is good to the women, and hardly ever annoys them. A fox's wedding is a sight to be seen but once in a life-time. It is conducted with all the pomp fitting for a nobleman, and generally by torch light when there is no moon. Foxes are so mean as to steal away the senses of people, and that, too, when they had none to spare of the article, and play all sorts of mischievous tricks and pranks upon them. They sometimes deceive a man to believe a field of buckwheat to be a river, and he undresses, lays his clothes away carefully, and attemps to swim through it, but has great trouble in effecting it. On a certain occasion a polite young man walking along the road on a racing day met a beautiful young lady without an umbrella. He, of course, offered her to share his, and they walked along together, entering into a most interesting conversation, in which he paid the fair damsel many beautiful compliments. But he happened to notice that the young lady's garments were not at all wilted, and that her robes shone and glistened as though just out of the band-box. Luckily for him, just at that moment he happened to think of the fox, and mustering all his courage, he drew his sword, which fortunately he had with him, and struck the young lady a fearful blow, when he ran home with all his might. Several friends returned with him to the spot, where, instead of a young lady, they found a fox very seriously wounded, when they all came to the conclusion that the young man had escaped a great danger. On another occasion a man saw a fox which had been caught in a trap, and kindly set it at liberty; and a few days afterward while walking along the highway he met a beautiful young lady, who spoke kindly to him and informed him that she was the fox to whom he had done such a kindness, for which she wished to reward him, but being a fox she was unable to do so. She proposed, however, that he take her to a house of prostitution and sell her for the highest price he could obtain, and keep the money as his reward, and she would have no difficulty in taking care of herself. The good man acted upon her suggestion, took her to the place designated, and as she was remarkably charming, he obtained a very high price for her, and went on his way rejoicing. The young lady attracted very great attention by her prepossessing personal appearance, and several men nearly lost their wits on account of her beauty. After playing many roguish pranks upon them for two or three days, she disappeared, and a fox was seen in the garden. The young lady was seen no more, but the man kept his money and was thus rewarded. That was a foxy trick, to be sure.

The badger (tanuki) is also believed to have the power to assume the human form; but, unlike the fox, goes before his victims, who are usually women. Besides appearing as stunning young men, they often assume the form of inanimate objects. A family living near the Imperial College at Tokio is reported as being greatly annoyed with foxes, who continually played practical jokes upon the females of the household, often appearing to the servant maids as an enormous tea-kettle. A badger is also said to have been for a long time a priest of the temple at Morinjie. A waste-paper dealer once bought an iron pot for making tea. On placing it over the fire a long tail and four legs came out, and the pot ran off —a first-class badger.

Cats are also very talented in Japan. As a sample cat story this may serve: A rich gentleman, residing at Tokio, had a niece residing in his family, and one evening she was sitting alone, and was engaged at sewing. Hearing her name spoken she looked around, but seeing no one in the room save the family cat she resumed her sewing, when she again heard her name spoken. She looked earnestly at the cat, when pussy asked the young lady to lend her a handkerchief, remarking if she would do so she would show her a sight worth seeing. The handkerchief was furnished, and the cat told her to look out in the back-yard soon after ten o'clock and see what she could discover. The young lady followed instructions, and when ten o'clock came she looked into the yard, when she saw collected there all the cats in the neighborhood holding high carnival, and each cat decked out with a handkerchief, and having a very gay time. The handkerchief was returned in good condition. Otters are also said to cut up many roguish pranks, adding to the reputation of the Japanese animals for being very sagacious.

Witchcraft is said to be employed in this way: If a woman becomes jealous of her husband or lover, and has good reason to believe that he is paying improper attentions in another direction, the injured woman dresses herself in white, allows her hair to hang down her back, places a tripod on her head (used in cooking), in which are three lighted candles; in her mouth a lighted torch of bamboo and pitch-pine, lighted at both ends, and arround her neck a mirror. This she does at the hour of two o'clock at night; and taking an effigy of the faithless one and his paramour, nails them to a tree within the grounds of some shrine. The result is that in whatever part of the effigies the injured woman drives the nails a serious injury will befall the original in a corresponding place, and thereby the woman will have her revenge. But if by ill chance she happens to meet a ghost while on her untimely errand the whole thing is defeated, especially if she shows the least terror at seeing the apparition. She can only recover from the ill effects by certain incantations and by imprecations on the offending pair. A common mode of bewitchment is to form a lay figure of straw, pierced with nails, and then bury it as near as possible to the place where the faithless one sleeps, when some evil will be sure to befall him.

Charms abound in this charming country, or at least the belief in them does. If on the eighth day of the fourth month a certain kind of grass (peu peu gusa) be gathered and hung within paper lanterns it is considered a sure way to keep away insects. An incantation is used to drive away fleas, but I cannot believe that fleas care a straw for the most powerful incantation ever framed. If the dew on the grass be gathered on the first day of the fifth month it is said to be an unfailing cure for sore feet. If farmers draw a limb of the namako by a cord around their fields the moles will leave it at once. If seven small red beans are swallowed by males on New Year's day, and double that number by females, health will be insured for the ensuing year. (It is a pity that women are twice as hard to cure as men.) If small spots above the ear on the heads of children are left unshaven, they will not be troubled with scrofula. (The heads of small children are always shaved.) If a trader about to start on a journey, whether by ship, on horseback, by vehicle, or chair, will make the sign of shin (red) in the palm of his left hand and then lick it off, he will be preserved from harm, and safely return. If a tiresome visitor stays too long, and it is desired for him to go, the broom is inverted, a towel thrown over it, and it is fanned until the bore departs. If it is desired to dream of an absent friend or lover all that has to be done is to turn the quilt of the bed end for end. If the rice-pot, when it begins to boil faintly, makes a low, gentle noise, it is a sure sign of good luck; but when it makes a loud, boisterous noise, something bad is sure to happen. In case, however, that the pot becomes too turbulent the evil effects may be prevented if it be immediately wrapped in the garments of a female—a virgin, if possible to find one. If a member of the family is away on a journey, in order to secure his prosperity all that is necessary to do is to drop one bean per day into the well while he is absent. That will prevent him from becoming footsore. In order to secure good weather while absent on a festival, picnic, or journey, the girls only have to make a paper image and hang it to a branch of the tree naruten. To prevent the bad odors of a cesspool a cup is filled with water, a tray placed over it, and they are then inverted. If the water is not spilled the cesspool will be sweet. If candy is rubbed over scrofulous sores and then placed upon a yenoki-tree the sores will be seen to heal up. To remove pimples from the face all that has to be done is to rub them with a horse's tooth. If the gridiron on which fish is to be broiled is raised above the head and turned around three times the fish will be sure to not stick to it. To remove the laths from the top of a grave will insure good luck in drawing a prize in the lottery; but this makes it bad for the graves.

The foregoing, touching the superstitions and religions of Japan, is drawn from "Japanese Notes," by C. Pfoundes, and originally published in the Japan Mail.

NEARING YOKOHAMA.

Let us return to our voyage per steamer along the southern coast of Niphon, the main Japanese island. The day was a lovely one and the sea smooth. We were sometimes nearly out of sight of land, and occasionally we passed inside some of the islands, not many miles from the mainland. Reese Island attracted special attention, as it is the home of a volcano smoking away, and which we could see forty miles before we reached it. The hight of the smoking mountain is perhaps three or four thousand feet. It does not belch away so vigorously as Vesuvius, nor does it pulsate, but it sends up a steady volume of smoke equal to a steamboat, and from the conical shape of its upper portion shows that a large amount of volcanic matter has at some time in the past been thrown out. Is is so quiet, however, of late years that little disturbance has taken place. It is some ten miles from the coast, about eight miles in circumference. The island has a population of a few hundred farmers and fishermen scattered along its shores.

FUJIYAMA

Attracted still more attention than Reese Island, and is, indeed, one of the remarkable mountains of the earth, rising majestically and independently from the plain to a hight of 13,000 feet. We saw it at a distance of seventy-five miles, its snow-capped summit peering above the clouds and looking as grand and dignified as the Himalayas themselves. It was originally a volcano, and must have belched, smoked, and thrown out a great quantity of lava, fused rock, and ashes to build up such a vast body as it is, and which undoubtedly was once thus formed. It is the highest land in Japan, and perhaps in Asia with the exception of the Himalayas. It stands alone, not being connected with any mountain range. Its shape is almost as regular and beautiful as a pyramid, equal on all sides. With the love the Japanese have for the grand in nature, it is not strange that they worship this mountain and consider it almost a god. Toward the end of summer the snow of the summit melts nearly away, and pilgrims from all parts of the country visit Fujiyama, and with two or three days' climbing after reaching its base they arrive at its summit, where the view of one of the prettiest countries in the world and the matchless Pacific is spread out like a panorama at their feet. The ascent is not attempted at any other season of the year. It stands some fifty miles from the coast, and in a clear atmosphere is easily seen when a hundred miles away.

As we steam eastward the coast of Japan improves in vegetation and beauty. The shores grow less rocky and sterile in appearance, and the green fields of grain and the forest-clad hills are more pleasing to the eye. The closing days of April find "the land of the rising sun" arrayed in its emerald robe of beauty. The southern line compares in latitude with the southern portion of the United States, and there no longer the robes of winter are left behind when May-day arrives.

YOKOHAMA.

At about four o'clock in the afternoon of April 25th we entered the capacious and beautiful harbor of Yokohama. In little more than half an hour we had cast anchor and were lying before a pretty city spread out on a fertile plain, with a bluff on the western side of the town a hundred feet or more higher than the plain, and on which the pleasant residences of the foreigners are principally located.

Everything was hurry and bustle on our steamer. We had arrived at the end of our long journey, and all were anxious to get on shore and see more of Japan. The natives gathered around the steamer, sculling their numerous small boats, anxious to convey passengers. They were on the alert for a job, but were not so noisy and persistent as the natives of many countries I have visited. I was not specially in a hurry, and allowed others to take boats before myself. In due time, however, I was sculled to the Bund, which is a long, pleasant street facing the harbor. Here, in a moderate-sized building, were representatives of the custom house department, who examined the baggage of new comers. Mine, not being extensive, was quickly disposed of, especially as but little scrutiny was exercised. A jin-rik-sha soon conveyed me to the Windsor House, which, being kept by Americans, a plenty of American papers to be read, made it seem almost like getting home, something I had not experienced for months.

It was too late in the day to get my letters from the bank to whose care they were addressed, but on the next morning I was made the happiest man in Japan by the receipt of nearly a hundred letters and papers from home and from dear friends on the opposite side of the globe. Those of you who have never been a long time away from your homes and your own land can perhaps hardly realize the joy which letters from loved ones afford; but let me assure you that there is nothing in the world like it. The sight of foreign lands, of their red and yellow skinned inhabitants, their quaint dwellings, and all their novel scenery, cannot take the place of news from home. I had long been anticipating this feast and was looking forward to it with great anxiety. Several hours were most pleasantly spent in devouring the contents of my heavy mail, and I now wish to thank all of you who have contributed to my pleasure by writing me while on this lengthy tour.

My pleasure was not greatly enhanced by finding that Joseph Cook and his better half—for she is unquestionably the better of the two—were stopping at the same hotel, but as we are not likely to come to blows, and as I propose to pass a considerable portion of my time in the interior, I did not allow the contiguity to an unpleasant object to disturb my equanimity.

I spent my first days in looking about the city and taking in its sights. I early called on the American Consular-General Thomas B. VanBuren, a relative of ex-President Martin VanBuren, and who has resided here in Yokohama eight years. As we have both resided in the same county, a sort of relationship was almost claimed. I find him a very genial gentleman, well posted in Japanese affairs, and willing to impart the information he possesses. The duties of his position are numerous, having to attend to the needs of American sailors and citizens when in trouble, to give permits to all exports to America, to issue forms, take acknowledgments, administer oaths, etc., pertaining to American interest; to hold court and examine into the charges against lawless

American sailors, and to investigate their claims when injustice is done them. He has the power to fine and imprison for various offenses. I visited him several times, and found he has many calls for his official services, and that his time is busily devoted to his duties. He expressed a desire that our laws should be changed with regard to American sailors, which, as they stand, are often very oppressive, not only to the masters of vessels, but to the sailors as well. By the terms of the law sailors on American vessels cannot be discharged in any foreign port, or for any cause, without paying them three months' wages extra; and this exaction often leads to unpleasant difficulties. The law was enacted eighty years ago, and, though meant in the time of it as a protection to the sailor, it really works against his interest, and in various ways. He is in hopes that Congress may amend the law.

Consular-General Van Buren has written three moderate-sized works upon Japan, one upon the trade of Japan, one upon its food, and one upon its labor. He was kind enough to present me with these works, and I shall be glad to avail myself of the knowledge which they contain. I have also obtained Miss Bird's (that was) interesting work upon this country—"Unbeaten Tracks in Japan"—and I shall not hesitate to draw from it such facts as I deem will be interesting to you. I also find a goodly nunber of American and English people residing here, whom I am glad to see, and from whom much can be learned.

Yokohama has quite a mixed population, and to such an extent that it has been denominated a "hybrid city." The business portion of the city in which Americans and Europeans (the latter including English, French, Germans, and other nationalities) transact business occupies the front portion of the plain next to the harbor, and is very well laid off, fairly built, presenting much the appearance of an European town, and bears the name of the "Settlement" The bungalows and compounds, or the residences of these foreigners, are largely on the "Bluff," where are many pleasant houses, interspersed with gardens. It has been likened to the suburbs of Boston. The Japanese quarter is much the larger portion of the city; it lies on the extensive plain directly in the rear of the "Settlement," and its numerous streets of plain gray houses are well packed with the busy, good-natured natives, who are more conspicuous for their geniality, politeness, and industry, than for the indications of wealth which they evince. I do not remember that I have seen a statement of what the population is, but should judge it to be considerably over 100,000, of which 5,000 are Americans and Europeans, fully the same number of Chinese, and the remainder Japanese.

Yokohama is comparatively a new town, its age really dating from the year 1866. The older town, Kanagawa, occupying the northern portion of what is now the northern portion of the city, is much older, but until this port became by treaty one of the open ports for foreign trade, it reached no distinction, and was little more than a fishing village. Now the splendid harbor has always present European and American steamers and sailing ships, coasting steamers and other craft, and men-of-war lying in the harbor, representing the principal nations of the world. The imports and exports of the city are very large, and it justly takes rank with the commercial cities of modern times.

The local government of the city was at one time in the hands of a mixed foreign municipality, but at present it is under Japanese control, at the head of which is the prefect of Kanagawa. The government buildings, including the custom house, the post-office, etc., are of good style and fit for any city. The stores, hotels, and business houses of all kinds are substantial and creditable in appearance, and the amount of merchandise on sale appears equal to the demand. There are three or four banks, which transact a heavy business. There are two or three public gardens, quite respectable in character, and pleasant places to visit.

The stores which deal in Japanese manufactures and Japanese "curio" and antiquities are interesting places to visit, where one can see almost endless specimens of Japanese art and mechanism in silk goods, damasks, porcelain, lacquer-ware, and an almost endless list of ingeniously devised and constructed articles for various purposes. The public bazar, or properly called an industrial exposition of national handicraft and manufactures, and which covers an acre of ground, occupied with low continuous buildings, is a very interesting place to spend a few hours. The goods are very neatly arranged, the prices marked upon them, polite clerks in attendance, and here considerable sales are effected of the curious manufactures for which this ingenious people are noted. The native stores and shops, all along in the Japanese portion of the city, where goods are sold and where the various branches of manufacture, in a small way, are conducted, are also interesting places to inspect. The potteries in the eastern portion of the town, where their ingenious wares in this line are turned out, are by no means devoid of interest. Industry, ingenuity, peacefulness, cleanliness, politeness, and good nature are the prominent characteristics of this people.

The jin-rik-shas of this city are a decided institution. I have spoken of them before, having seen them first in Singapore, then in Hong Kong and Nagasaki; but here they abound in greater numbers than in the towns named, amounting to several thousands. I think I told you they are a slim hand-cart, with springs under the cushioned seats and a calash buggy top, which can be up or down as the rider pleases. An oiled paper apron comes up before the rider when it rains, shutting him entirely in, except a narrow space for looking out, and preventing him from getting wet. They are light and handy, designed generally for one person, and the manipulators trot along with them on smooth roads hour after hour, nearly as fast as a horse usually travels, and often making forty or fifty miles a day. It is not ten years yet since they were invented, and now fully 50,000 of them are used in different places. Tokio alone has 25,000 of them. As few horses are reared in this country, and those few are of poor quality, used principally as pack horses, carrying produce, etc., upon their backs, the jin-rik-shas are the main dependence for traveling purposes. The Japanese name for them is kuruma, but the Chinese name jin-rik-sha is more used, and for short is often only riki. The price for riding in them is ten sen an hour, or one yen per day, and as it takes one hundred and fifty sen to equal one hundred cents our money, the price is low enough. At these prices, however, the Japanese laboring men can make more money than at farm work, or any menial labor; they rush into the cities, and willingly run themselves to death for the one yen per day, for the constant running with the loads they haul tells heavily upon them, so that they usually last but five or six years, when lung disease of some kind or a broken-down system ends their career. These rikis are gotten up in different styles, some plain, and some lacquered, decorated, inlaid, and ornamented, according to the taste of the owner. Some show mainly polished brass, while others are richly inlaid with pearl, and others again bearing representations of dragons and beautiful flowers. They cost from ten to twenty-five and fifty dollars each. Many merchants and business men have a riki waiting constantly at their doors so as to be ready at all times when they wish to go a square or more. When a traveler or tourist wishes to go off on a long trip into the country where the roads are heavier and more up and down hill, two men generally are employed, one in front between the shafts and the other pushing behind, and on such jaunts one yen twenty-five or one fifty for each man per day is paid, they finding their own food. After dark paper lanterns are, by exaction of law, carried by the riki men. At the busy hours of the day, in the morning and evening, it is a sight to witness the hundreds of merchants, clerks, missionaries, fashionably-dressed ladies, Chinamen, and Japanese, all gliding to and fro on their way home and elsewhere in the ever-whirling rikis. They are a useful institution that could not be dispensed with.

The Chinese in Yokohama are a very useful class of the community. Many of them act as clerks in banks, shipping houses, stores, compradores for Europeans (managers in any kind of business), tradesmen, and mechanics in the various departments. The best tailors, shoemakers, carpenters, cabinet-makers, etc., are Chinamen. As shrewd and successful business men the Chinese unquestionably far excel the Japanese. There is also this difference between them which I think I alluded to before. The Chinese have the best idea of business integrity. They will live up to a contract, and they will not take undue or dishonest advantages in business. They seem to have the disposition and knowledge to enable them to conduct business so as to win and hold trade. The same cannot be said of the Japanese to the same extent. They regard a bird in the hand worth a good many in the bush, or, in other words, they deem a dollar of profit to-day more desirable than the probability of ten dollars a week or month in the future. They will even for the sake of making a dollar to-day be guilty of some petty, dishonest trick by which they will lose a customer worth twenty dollars to them. In business matters they forecast badly. This seems to arise more from the habits of the country than from inherent dishonesty and rascality.

MISSIONARIES.

Christians are fairly represented here, having five or six churches patronized principally by foreigners, and some twenty missionaries, more than half of whom are males. Aside from the schools they are conducting and some hospital work, it is questionable whether they are effecting very much good. In the whole of Japan there are one hundred and thirty-six Protestant missionaries, seventy-eight of whom are married men, ten single men, and forty-eight unmarried women. The wives of the seventy-eight married missionaries are not counted, but they are supposed to be of great service in promoting the morality of those to whom they are married. It has been found that unmarried missionaries were inclined to follow the general custom of other Americans and Europeans who keep native women for their private use, and the missionary boards, for this reason, have latterly discouraged unmarried men from coming out to do moral and religious work for Jesus among the heathen, and are sending married men principally. This is doubtless a very judicious precaution.

As you are interested in missionary intelligence, let me give you a trifle more from the "Annual Report of the Evangelical Alliance of Japan for 1882:"

Stations where missionaries reside, 36.
Out stations where no missionaries reside, 111; an increase of 35.
Organized churches, 83; an increase of 19.
Churches wholly self-supporting, 15; an increase of 2.
Churches partially self-supporting, 59; an increase of 32.
Baptized adult converts, 3,811; an increase of 1,110.
Baptized children, 601; an increase of 336.
Boy's schools and mixed schools, 39; an increase of 25.
Scholars in these schools, 1,584; an increase of 994.
Girl's schools, 18; an increase of 3.
Scholars in these, 607; an increase of 116.
Theological schools, 6; an increase of 2.
Theological students, 93; an increase of 6.
Sunday-schools, 101; an increase of 38.
Scholars in these, 3,764; an increase of 1,253.
Native ministers, 38; an increase of 22.
Unordained native preachers and catechists, 124; an increase of 30.
Colporteurs, 10; an increase of 8.
Bible women, 20; a decrease of 4.
Hospitals, 4; an increase of 2.
In-patients treated in these, 183; a decrease of 97.
Dispensaries, 4; a decrease af 1.
Patients treated in these, 18,027; an increase of 4,744.
Medical students, 5; a decrease of 21.
Contributions of native Christians for all purposes, during the year, in paper yen, 8,772; an increase of 5,583.
Average for each adult native Christian, 2.30; an increase of 1.20.

The increase given is since 1879. The report does not include what the Catholics are doing, for they do not belong to the Evangelical Alliance; they however are said not to be doing very much. It may strike you that a great deal has been accomplished by the missionaries, but when it is considered that between one and two hundred persons have been at work here fifteen years, that millions of dollars have been expended, that all kinds of inducements have been held out to the natives to embrace Christianity, that they are a people rather easily persuaded, especially when they think it to their pecuniary interest to be persuaded; that their religion sits very easily upon them, that in their desire to adopt European and American customs they would very naturally think they had also better adopt the religions of those countries. For such people to lay aside one set of superstitions and take up another is not a very serious affair; it does not, after all, seem that very remarkable results have been produced, especially in view of the many boasts that are made of the great things that have been done here, and of the rapidity with which the Japanese are embracing Christianity. Three or four thousand out of a population of thirty-five millions is but a small percentage. And from what I can learn the spread of Christianity among the natives is slower now than it was a few years ago. As novelties are readily turned to by the human mind, it cannot be thought strange that these simple-minded people should be attracted by a new religion held up to them as containing wonderful powers, and which would be of inestimable value to them, and it is not strange that numbers of the common people should be led to adopt it. But it is becoming an old story; it is no longer a novelty, and these natives are not attracted now as much as formerly. It is about time for another new novelty to come along.

Very few of the better classes are turning Christian. But a small proportion of the educated Japanese are becoming converts to Christianity. Miss Bird presents a very fair view of the more intelligent Japanese mind in the description which she gives of her visit to the Kubota hospital and school under the influence of native teachers who had been educated in Europe and America. After inspecting the school with much interest, she put this question to two of the teachers:

"Do you teach religion?"

They smiled significantly with undisguised contempt, replying:

"We have no religion;" adding, "All your learned men know that religion is false."

Miss Bird gives a pretty full account of her visit to Mr. Tyson, a prominent missionary, and describes the success and encouragement he meets with. She says: "Mr. Tyson itinerates at certain seasons of the year. He finds strong prejudices against Christianity in the country, and extreme indifference in the city. On his first tours great crowds came to hear him of the 'new way,' but that kind of interest has diminished. . . . As 'the outward and visible sign' of three years of earnest work, Mr. Tyson has baptized seven persons." I have seen an American missionary who has been here eight years, who has drawn over twelve thousand dollars from the missionary treasury, and who, as I am informed by a clergyman, has not baptized one person in that time. From such statements as this, those who drop in every Sunday their dimes and quarters for the "salvation of the heathen" can judge how much good it does, and how the money is being used.

I have a plenty of authority from Christians and others that the missionaries lead an easy and a pleasant life here, and make very limited exertions. They all live in very pleasant dwellings; they have a plenty of servants; they perform but little labor, and get double the money for their services that they could make at home. It is all a mistake for our people to think that the missionary takes his life in his hand, and that he endures great hardships in working to spread the gospel. The truth is, he leads an easy, pleasant life, in a luxuriant country, with a delightful climate, with all the comforts imaginable. Miss Bird, herself a Christian, says: "Much of the sympathy given to missionaries at home is altogether misplaced. In Japan they are provided with comfortable houses and sufficient incomes. . . The phrase 'taking their lives in their hands' has no significance, and they incur no perils either from people or climate."

Again the same writer says: "The 'religious faculty' appears to be lost out of the Japanese nature. It is a complete mistake to suppose that because the old faiths are decaying Japan is ripe for the introduction of a new one. The empire has embarked on a career of material progress. Everything which tends in that direction is eagerly appropriated and assimilated; that which does not is rejected as of no account. I asked a highly educated and thoughtful young Japanese, who had just returned from a course of some years of scientific study in America, if he had ever studied religion, and his answer embodies at least the view of the educated classes: 'No; I had no time for anything that had no practical bearing.'"

This intelligent writer had an almost unequaled opportunity for judging of the missionary work in Japan, and of the native character of the people, for she spent several months in journeying over the country and in making close observations of all that she met with. She sums up one of her chapters in this way: "An obstacle in the way of Christianity (and all these are apart from the deeply-rooted and genuine dislike to the purity of its morality) is that the Japanese students who are educated by their government in England or America return and tell their countrymen that no one of any intelligence or position now believes in Christianity, and that it is an exploded system, only propped up by the clergy and the uneducated masses."

Even among the savage Ainos in northern Japan the same writer found a spirit unfavorable to the reception of Christianity; and though savage as they are, she found among them much that is better than what prevails among large classes in Europe and America. She thus expresses herself: "The glamour which at first disguises the inherent barrenness of savage life has had time to pass away, and I see it in all its nakedness as a life not much raised above the necessities of animal existence; timid, monotonous, barren of good, dark, dull, 'without hope of God in the world,' though at its lowest and worst considerably higher and better than that of thousands of the lapsed masses of our own great cities, who are baptized into Christ's name, and are laid at last in holy ground, inasmuch as the Ainos are truthful, and, on the whole, chaste, hospitable, honest, reverent, and kind to the aged. Drinking, their great vice, is not, as among us, in antagonism to their religion, but is actually a part of it, and as such would be exceptionally difficult to eradicate."

The same writer had a long conversation with an intelligent Buddhistic priest, who gave her an explanation of Buddhistic belief, and who, when asked what he thought of the prospects of Christianity in Japan, said: "There have been missionaries called Protestants in Japan for fifteen years; there are now over a hundred; and they count sixteen hundred baptized persons. The college here is sending out young samurai to preach, very ardent, and well equipped for teaching. Christianity may make great progress in some of the country parts of Japan, for many are weary, weary, weary, and it is easy, and they will be disposed to receive it; but not in the large towns."

I cannot say that the reports of the Evangelical Alliance, of which I give you an extract, are untrue in every particular, but it is believed that such reports are not always strictly reliable, and that they are made to look more favorable to the cause of the missions than the real facts warrant; but criticism may not justly apply in this case. I am, however, clearly of the opinion that there are many ways where the money and effort which are spent here in Japan to make Christians of the people could be used more sensibly, and where they would do more good; and this is the opinion of many other intelligent people. I shall hardly forget the remark of General Van Buren on the subject. He admitted that the missionaries had done some good; "but," said he, "there are ten missionaries where there should be one."

It cannot be denied that missionaries are often an over-officious, mischievous element that sometimes does does more harm than good, and it is a matter of much doubt whether the people of this and other Asiatic countries are really made much better for accepting Christianity. People's conduct and character depend far more upon race and natural characteristics than upon what religion they accept. That the Japanese are kindly, genial, hospitable, sympathetic, and inoffensive cannot be truthfully denied. Miss Bird traveled alone among them for six months, visiting parts of the country where a European had never been seen before, and she was uniformly treated with civility, courtesy, and kindness. She was not insulted nor mistreated; no one tried to rob her, and no one scarcely offered her an insult or an indignity. It would seem that a people capable of such behavior are not suffering intensely for Christian morality to be introduced among them. How does this kind of heathen conduct compare with what daily and almost hourly takes place in our own Christian and "favored" land? Since I have been here I took up an American paper and was made ashamed to read an account of a quiet, respectable woman being attacked on the street in the upper part of New York city, about seven o'clock in the evening, by four young men. She was gagged and most rudely treated, taken across the street, and outraged! Should not New York bestir at once and hurry off more missionaries to teach the people of Japan how to behave themselves?

The case I mention is not an exceptional one. I see the American papers are literally full of accounts of villainy, outrages, murders, robbery, stealing, swindling, house-burning, drunkenness, assaults, debauchery, and many other crimes of the most revolting character. I must confess that, after having traveled over the countries of Asia, where I have not seen a fight, scarcely a quarrel, and only one or two drunken men, it makes me almost blush with shame to read over the account of wrongs and outrages committed in our own Christian land.

This is no new state of things. We are, perhaps, not worse materially than we were twenty-five or fifty years ago. The New York Tribune in May, 1857, contained the following sad picture of Christian morals in the Christian city of New York, the article being written by Horace Greeley, the truthful:

"Sixteen murders have been perpetrated in this city during the past seven weeks; and in the same period there have been at least sixteen attempts at murder, besides violent assaults and rum-hole fights without precedent. Ten thousand hardened and hopeless outcast females swarm the streets at night; two thousand children, under the guise of pedlars, from the ages from ten to sixteen, penetrate every public building, store, and office in the city to beg, or steal, or spy for burglars, and on their own account to practice those vices which cannot be named in respectable language; five thousand great and small gamblers prey upon the credulous and infatuated, standing all day at the doors of their dens in Broadway, as well known in person and profession as the mayor himself; ten thousand lazy, drunken, thieving short-boys, swill-boys, killers, roughs, and rowdies of other names, lounge on the rum-cursed corners of the streets, making day disgusting, night hideous, and travel dangerous to all who can be suspected of having respectability or money; thousands of emigrant swindlers, mock auctioneers, lottery dealers, policy brokers, pickpockets, hall-thieves, burglars, wharf-rats, area-sneaks, pimps, and vampires practice their knaveries as openly and with as little fear of punishment as though they were engaged in the most virtuous and legitimate pursuits. The swell mob of London, flying from a real police, and the unendurable felons of San Francisco, expatriated by bullet and hemp of the Vigilance Committee, are received here with open arms, parade our streets, not only by the toleration, but with the protection and personal friendship of our police—carry our primary elections and fill the high positions in the nominating committees. On every hand we have vice, and crime, and splendor—crime, vice, rum, and beggary. Here, in the most fashionable faubourg, is the Crockfords of New York; there, between the palatial residences of a millionaire and a divine, is the maison de joie of a woman whose dress is the most brilliant, whose equipage is the most costly, whose appearance is the most stunning of the gay butterflies, virtuous or vicious, whose beauty and wealth add glitter to the opera or sunshine to the promenade. Within a bow-shot of these palaces is the other side of the world: for brocade, rags; for diamonds, dirt; for Johannisberger, whisky; for millionaires, beggars; for divines, devils; for Aspasias, drabs; with here and there some poor, starving wretch painfully enacting the 'Song of the Shirt,' her besieged virtue glimmering in the misery of this tangible hell like the jeweled jewel in a dung-hill. And over all we have a set of men called rulers, wrangling like hungry dogs for the public purse, lying and cheating for advancement, plotting to overthrow all law, that they may rob the people; and in their influence upon our vast criminal population, recklessly flaring their incendiary torches in our moral powder mill."

The above picture is very graphic, but not overdrawn. It is true to life, and in view of the facts thus set forth, is it not a great pity that a few thousand more missionaries have not been sent over here to Asia to learn its quiet millions how to practice Christian morals and how to prepare themselves for a Christian heaven?

LIFE IN YOKOHAMA

In walking the streets of this city one meets with a great many blind persons, who are, perhaps, made so by the excess of smoke in the native houses, together with the changeable nature of the climate. Doubtless the sight in many cases could have been saved had the proper treatment been resorted to in time; but charms, amulets, and whimsical superstitions are not very effectual in removing inflammation from the eyes. These people walk about the streets with almost the same freedom and ease as do other people, and in many cases, unless very observing, one would hardly notice they were blind. In their perambulations they very frequently blow the whistles they carry to inform people that they are on the street and do not wish to be run over. As day and night are the same to them, their whistles are to be heard even in the late hours of the night. As a class they are self-sustaining, and manage to make their own living by practicing the healing art, or curing many ailments by the laying on of hands, rubbing, and various other manipulations. It is possible that the loss of sight in some way increases their magnetic powers, as what would be lost by going out through the eyes is conserved in the system, thereby giving them unusual nerve force, by which the cures ascribed to them are effected. They get moderate prices for their services, but such as suffice to maintain them comfortably in this country where living is cheap. Some of them act as barbers, and evince much skill in dressing hair.

Portable restaurants and confectionaries are an institution of the city, as they are of nearly the whole country. The restaurants are two cases some four feet high, comprising a series of shelves and drawers for containing food, and the two are connected with a shoulder pole, by which they are carried. The compartments are sufficient to contain a full assortment of the various Japanese dishes, including stew, pickles, mixtures, etc. It is very common for these out-door restaurants to be located on the corner of the streets and to be patronized by the working classes, where at meal times they may be seen eating boiled rice, maccaroni, baked potatoes, stews, pickles, etc. Five sen buys a pretty fair Japanese meal.

The man carts used for transporting heavy material, such as stone, brick, sand, gravel, and merchandise, etc, are much in use, and it is almost surprising to see what enormous loads are moved about the city in this way. Two men may often be seen with half a ton on a cart and marching along with it at a good walking gait. But they keep up a doleful shouting at the same time. The two men in front at every step ejaculate alternately, first one and then the other, "Ha," "Hoo," "Hai," "Hoo," "Hai," "Haida," and this loud enough to be heard several squares. They seem to keep step by this shouting, and they may imagine the load is hauled easier for it, but one would think it takes half as much strength to keep up such a constant outcry as to do the pulling. When the loads are so heavy as to require it, one or two additional men assist by pushing behind, but it is the leaders who do the shouting.

I think the women appear on the streets less here than in several other countries; I see very little parading the city on their part to exhibit drygoods or fine dresses. They all seem to have duties to attend to at home, and spend little time in making display. Every morning before sunrise nearly a hundred women pass my window on their way to the large tea houses, where they work through the day at preparing tea for exportation. They go in squads of a dozen or two, some old, some young, and many with their babies at their backs, the way in which children are nearly altogether carried in this country, as among the Chinese and Malays. The Japanese women place their babes inside their kimons or over-garments, with very wide sleeves, which lap in front, one side over the other, often padded, and confined about the waist by a girdle or wide belt. The girdle prevents the child from slipping down. The mothers wear the same kind of cloth about the lower limbs as do the men, and the same kind of wooden clogs or sandals.

I stepped into one of the large tea-houses referred to and saw fully a hundred five or six-gallon iron kettles set in furnaces, in a brick building two hundred feet long, and in these the tea is brought to the requisite degree of heat, called "firing," and which, I think, is the last process before packing it in chests. Some of the hundred inmates were attending to this department, some were lining boxes, some putting on large labels, some packing, some wrapping, branding, etc.. Men and women were working together in the most social and friendly manner. The amount of tea prepared, packed, and shipped at Yokohama is simply enormous.

STOCK GAMBLING.

Yokohama cannot claim to be free from this great evil of modern times. It has its stock board, its excitements in the rise and fall of values, and here fortunes are made and lost with great celerity. This gambling is confined principally to the irredeemable paper money of the country called kinsats. These fluctuate in value about as rapidly as gold used to go up and down with us in war times. The price changes two or three times a day, or at the three daily meetings of the stock board. What it is that makes the value of this money change so often I did not understand any more than I know why stocks go up and down so suddenly in our large cities; but I presume, as with us, it is mainly due to the mischievous manipulations of the stock gamblers. The price varies from 1.45 to 1.80; that is, some days it requires 145 sen to equal a yen, or dollar in silver, or 1.80, as the case may be. One day the price is perhaps 153 in the morning, 159 at night, and 1.50 the next day, allowing variation enough to meet the desires of the most inveterate gamblers.

It is somewhat interesting to witness the operations before this stock board. Several hundred anxious persons are assembled in the large building for the purpose; the smallest sales or purchases are $1,000, and from that up to $10,000. The uproar makes a perfect pandemonium, the same as at the meetings of the stock board in New York. The secretary of the board marks the changes in value as they occur from time to time with a pencil in characters eight inches in length, and scores of messenger-boys are in attendance to carry the latest quotations to their employers in various parts of the city. There are many Chinese and Japanese money-dealers through the town whose whole business it is to buy and sell paper money, giving silver or bank paper, which is of coin value. The heaviest and most active dealer of this kind is a woman, who counts out money with the utmost celerity, and who makes calculations on the reckoning-board with greater dispatch than an ordinary person can do it with figures. She buys and sells thousands of dollars per day, and is said to be shrewd and successful. Those who travel in the interior must have the paper money of the realm, as that is the only kind in circulation outside the city. It is folly to go to the country without the necessary supply of paper yen.

The Japanese are very attentive to the matter of bathing. They make it a rule to take a bath every day. Many bathe in their own homes, while many others resort to the public baths, of which there are several in the city. These are by no means fine buildings, but usually cheap wooden structures, some of them little more than sheds. The bathing is usually done in large tubs, the water in which is heated by means of pipes from furnaces in an adjoining room. Quite unlike the custom in our country, men and women bathe in the same houses and at the same hours, but not often in the same bathing-tub. Formerly they bathed indiscriminately together, as though all men or all women; but for the last few years, since the ingress of foreigners, slight changes have been made, and now there is a board partition between the men and women. Sometimes this partition reaches three feet from the floor and sometimes all the way up. In the interior, where foreigners are not around, the two sexes still bathe together without dreaming there is any impurity in so doing. This looks wrong to western eyes, who deem it a mark of depravity, but I hardly so regard it. These simple people have not the same fastidious, squeamish notions that prevail with us. The limbs, the breasts, and many parts of the person are exposed with any idea of its being wrong, and they become so familiar with the practice that they think no more of it than we do to see a woman's face or arm. These people seem to me to have the same innocence and indifference common to little brothers and sisters, or which exists between husband and wife; and I am not able to say that their fashion is any more productive of evil than ours. These things depend very much on custom. In Syria, Egypt, and Arabia women are far more careful to keep their faces covered than their bosoms, and it is more unusual to see a woman's face than her breasts. To illustrate: A friend at my elbow, who has traveled in Palestine, says while there he one day suddenly came upon a woman whose face was uncovered, and in her great perturbation and anxiety to conceal her countenance she raised her dress and exposed her person. Thus custom makes slaves of us all, and makes natural simplicity a source of shame.

This being near to the fifth month, much observance is paid to the flying of large flags made in the shape of a fish, and somewhat in a cylindrical form, with the mouth open, with fins on the back and side, a well spread tail, painted and dressed up so as to represent scales, etc. The wind blows into the mouth, swells out the sides, and escapes at the tail. They are of various sizes, from a good sized sturgeon up to a shark, and on up to a whale large enough to take in any careless or disobedient Jonah that might be straggling around. They are fastened by cords to tall bamboo poles, some red fish, some yellow, some green, and some bordering on black. In Japanese towns there are scores of them, and as the wind is rather brisk they flop and whirl about in a very fishy sort of way, with their mouths wide open as though they are very hungry for some Jonah to happen along. I get two reports upon this fishy subject; one that these fish are put up in May at the homes in which a male child has been born within the past year, though why boys should be regarded as any more fishy than girls is not explained. The other statement is that in May comes the boy's holiday of religious festival, and that these fishes and whales are a part of the paraphernalia belonging to the same. Now you know as much about it as I do, save as to how these numerous fishy monsters look floating in the air.

A VISIT TO THE MOUNTAINS.

Of course it was a settled thing that I must see something of Japan away from Yokohama. So on Saturday, April 29th, after making a bargain with a very excellent Japanese, Tage Ro, to take me with his jin-rik-sha on a four days' tour to the country; after providing some chow, which friends said I had better take along with me for fear I would not find food to suit me, and after procuring some bread, biscuits, cakes, butter, cheese, etc., we started about the middle of the day for Kanazawa, some ten miles west of Yokohama. It having rained the day before, the road proved to be rather heavy when we got outside the city, crossing the level plains, and it made me feel bad to see Tage Ro tugging along at so hard a rate to pull me through the mud. But this is about the only mode for travel here. It is riki or go afoot. Horses are very scarce, and though they were to be had the roads and bridges are too narrow to allow a buggy to pass over them. Tage Ro can half-way speak a few words in English and understand rather more than he can speak. His pay was to be one yen twenty-five sen per day, but I soon made up my mind that it was going to be too hard a task for him to haul me about alone for four days. I have some feeling for a horse, if he has but two legs. So I said: "Tage Ro, you must get a man to help you. Get a man to help you, and I will pay him the same as I do you. I am merciful when it does not cost more than a yen and a quarter per day, and other people furnish the money." After a while Tage Ro succeeded in getting a man to help him, and then we got on a little easier, and we all felt better.

For a few miles the road led over low ground among rice fields in the narrow valleys, with the moderate hills not far away. I saw many digging the small fields of beds preparatory for planting rice. The digging is done with a mattock, with a blade fifteen inches long and four inches wide, or with a large strong hook with four tines or teeth eight or ten inches long, like a potato-hook, only three or four times as large and strong. The earth is not turned over as with a spade, but is taken by the mattock or hook and moved toward the digger some eighteen inches. Afterward the water is let into the small field or bed, usually containing less than a quarter of an acre, and with a heavy rake the earth is leveled down, and when about the consistence of stiff mortar it is leveled off with a long straight-edge or pole, and thus the ground is ready to receive the rice-plants which are grown in beds for the purpose. These preparatory beds I saw in considerable numbers, the plants up and looking green and thrifty. I saw some of the farmers making the dykes surrounding and dividing the rice-plants, taking the mud up with their hands and building the walls which compass the beds and which divide them so as to hold the water from running away, or allow it to run from one bed to another when desired. As they stood nearly naked in the mud and water up to their knees I thought it was a moister kind of farming than I should prefer; but I have no doubt of its being strictly honest and honorable.

Passing a large section of these small rice fields I reached ground a little higher, where barley and wheat abounded, and was nicely headed out. Of course it was winter grain, sown last fall. The Japanese mode of cultivating these cereals is to sow them in rows sixteen or eighteen inches apart, the stools being eight or ten inches apart in the rows, and the earth is worked with a heavy hoe between the rows. The grain looked very stocky and even, and as though it ought to yield thirty-five or forty bushels per acre, though I think the heads were shorter than with us. The straw also seemed shorter. The yield of rice is from thirty to fifty bushels per acre.

I saw many patches of peas just in blossom, and sometimes a border of peas surrounding the fields of wheat and barley. The blossoms are of variegated colors, looking really beautiful; many fields of rape also presented themselves, just in blossom, looking much like fields of turnips in bloom. I think the seed is raised for making oil for burning, etc. I also noticed many small fields of the tall black beans two feet in hight, wholly unlike the beans we grow in America, but of the variety I saw in several countries in Europe, They enter somewhat largely into the food of the Japs as well as of their horses, where they have any, which is not very often. The beans are also sown in drills and carefully cultivated. I cannot speak in too high terms of praise of the thoroughness and cleanliness of Japanese farming. There is not a weed to be seen anywhere in their fields. I have in all seen many thousands of acres in grains of different kinds and I have scarcely seen a weed in it all. I could but wish that American farms were as free from weeds. The Japanese are evidently not sluggards. The amount of land which any one cultivates is not large, but he cultivates it thoroughly. Manuring is carried out as fully as possible when little or no live stock is kept. Forest leaves are gathered in the fall and rotted in vats and applied to the land. Night soil and urine are saved with the greatest care. Half barrels or tubs are sunk in the earth by the roadside at intervals for making deposits in. Notices are put up by them, but they do not read, "Commit no nuisance." The contents are taken in large buckets and carried by means of the shoulder-pole into the fields and applied directly to the crops. Such efforts and such industry deserve to be crowned with success.

I saw no meadows and no pastures in Japan. No cattle, no sheep, and no horses are kept as a rule. A few bantam chickens, now and then a dog, and a few bobtailed cats are all the live stock I saw. Sheep cannot live in most parts of Japan; the wild bamboo grass, which grows here universally, kills them. Efforts have often been made to introduce sheep, but without success. Cattle also do not do well. The Japs know nothing about drinking milk or eating butter and cheese. They make some use of eggs, but their breeds of chickens are small and poor. They eat chickens to a very limited extent. I have not seen a pig or hog in Japan. In this respect the Japs differ widely from the Chinese. who are extremely fond of pork. The utter absence of flocks and herds detracts from the fascinations of country life. The lowing of cattle, the bleating of sheep, the squealing of pigs, the crowing of roosters, the cackling of hens, the squawking of ducks and geese, all have their charms, and add to the pleasures of rural existence. Of the bobtailed cats I cannot speak in very high terms. I do not know that tails are of very much use to cats, but we have so long been used to seeing pussy with a large, erect caudal appendage, that it does not seem an improvement to cut them off. What is a cat without a tail? They should continue to wear their tails. Moses was in the right in his reply to his brother:

"Says Aaron to Moses, 'Let's cut off our noses;'
Says Moses to Aaron, 'We'd better still wear 'em.'"

Nature is right; let pussy still keep her tail.

There are few or no barns here. The grain is either threshed out when harvested or stacked up in bundles under trees. They have no reapers or threshing machines; the primitive modes are still in use; the grain is cut with a crooked knife, and threshed with a flail made of two pieces of bamboo. The homes of tillers are seldom on their small farms; they live in little groups and villages along the roadside, and this is the prevailing custom in all parts of Asia. Our mode of country life is unknown here.

Along one roadway were great quantities of small wild flowers, the names of which I do not know, but their pink, yellow, and blue blossoms have a cheering effect. The dandelions, the docks, the colt's-foot, and motherwort, which grow plentifully here, I do know, and they seem like old aquaintances in a foreign land. I saw quite a number of plants which we have in America. The hills are pretty well wooded, and everything looks green and lovely. The farms look like gardens. There are no fences, no hedges, save in the little villages before the small lots. I see no door-yards in front of dwellings, but they all stand even with the street or road. The houses are nearly uniform in style, usually one story high, of unpainted wood, with a high, steep roof of thatch fully a foot in thickness, and evenly cut at the eaves. On the ridge a layer of straw is placed horizontally two feet in hight, held securely in place by bows of bamboo, and often with iris—flower de luce—which greatly abounds in this country, growing on this ridge. The roofs are usually four-sided or hipped, the pitch descending four ways instead of two; but as the houses are longer in front than deep, the ridge of the roof runs parallel with the street. In the larger villages there are often two-story buildings, and the roofs are deep lead-colored tiles. I have passed seven tile manufactories; the stiff clay is worked carefully and dressed off by hand; and the kilns in which they are burnt are but little larger than ovens. A cart-load would fill them. The shape of the tiles, as well as the color, is different from any I have seen. They seem a superior quality, and make a handsome roof. On the temples and finer buildings they ornament the tile roofs by extra rows of tile of different shape and color. As the buildings are not high and the roofs steep they show very plainly.

KANAZAWA

Is the general name of some thirteen little villages situated not far apart and nestled by the sides of the streams and the bay, for here the ocean comes up near to the town. From the eminence to which we had climbed before reaching the place, I had a beautiful view of the valley below, the steamers, the Pacific Ocean, and the cosy little villages aforesaid. My men stopped at a wayside tea-house to take a little cha and chow—tea and rice—which afforded me ten minutes to view the loveliness of the picture before me.

TEA-HOUSES

Are a special institution in Japan, and are of great convenience to travelers. They are found in every village, and often by the roadside between villages. These latter seldom furnish lodgings, but keep hot tea constantly on hand, with boiled rice, sometimes maccaroni, with the pickles and mixtures of vegetables of which the Japanese are so fond. The common classes of Japanese eat little or no animal food, save fish; of the latter they are very fond and use pretty freely. Boiled rice is the great staple of food, and the tea-houses keep it on hand in covered vessels and where it does not get cold. A small bowlful of this, holding little more than a coffee-cupful, is sold for a cent; and two or three bowlfuls of it, with a fair proportion of pickles and relishes, make a good meal for a Japenese. Five or six cents gives him what he considers a good square meal. He varies his bill-of-fare occasionally, taking maccaroni in place of rice, and of the other pickles and mixtures there is no end to their combinations. Though not suited to an American palate, they are highly appreciated by the natives of this country. I took a small cup of cha, which I found good.

NEW YORK SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 2, 1882.

The Watkins Convention.

The Sixth Annual Meeting of the New York Freethinkers' Association has just been held at Watkins, and, being a success, it givs us pleasure to furnish a brief and hurried description of it. The attendance was very fair, being probably about one thousand persons at one time, and some two thousand in all, as many who could not remain through the entire five days left at different stages of the meeting, giving place to others who had just arrived.

Much the largest representation was, of course, from New York, but numerous friends were with us from New England, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, and Ontario, some traveling a distance of over fifteen hundred miles to attend this convention. All seemed to be well pleased to be there, and doubtless returned to their homes strengthened in their love for the truth as it exists in nature, reason, and common sense.

Among those from a distance were: Charles Bright, from Australia—now on a visit to this country; J. P. Mendum and daughter, George Chainey, W. S. Bell, and Josephine S. Tilton, from Boston; Judge J. B. Curtis, of Stamford, Conn.; A. B. Bradford, G. W. Baldwin, Mrs. Grace L. Parkhurst, J. R. Perry, and many others, from Pennsylvania; J. H. Burnham, M. Babcock and wife, S. D. Moore, and others, from Michigan; A. B. Severance, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, A. Minski, Mr. and Mrs. Woodworth, and others, from Wisconsin; W. M. Bronson, Prof. Peck, Mrs. H. S. Lake, and others, from Illinois; G. H. Walser and wife, with others, from Missouri; John E. Remsburg, from Kansas; etc., etc.

Among the New York representativs may be mentioned Mrs. Amy Post, Mr. and Mrs. C. W. Austin, Mr. and Mrs E. H. Gault, Mrs. L. A. Allen, Mrs. S. E. Decker, Willet White, Moses Hays, and others, from Rochester; David Cosad and wife, from Junius; Samuel Cosad, A. Boughton, and others, from Wolcott; J. H. Harter, L DeWitt Griswold, and others, from Auburn; Wm. Smith, Geneva; J. T. Brown, Angelica; John Peck, Naples; Dr. S. E. Shattuck, Hornellsville; E. E. Curtis, Brighton; Homer S. Billings, Fabius; F. N. Albright, Barkers; J. W. Truesdell, Isaac VanSchoick, and others, from Syracuse; Zenas Kent, Jerome S Davis, and others, from Ithaca; Dr. R H. Lamb, Nyack; A. H. Walker, Oswego Center; R Baker, Esq, Poughkeepsie; James Sturdevant, G. H. Look, and others, Prattsburg; Dr. D. C Farlin, South Butler; Geo. C. Gregory, Skaneateles; Mrs. May Peck, South Otselic; W. F. Doty, of Port Jervis, with many, many others too numerous to mention.

Among those from this city were T. B. Wakeman, Courtlandt Palmer, T. C. Leland, S. P. Putnam, W. P. Slensby, the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, etc.

The meeting was ably presided over by the president, T. L. Brown, of Binghamton, until the fourth day, when by telegraph he was summoned home to attend a patient at death's door, after which T. B. Wakeman presided, assisted occasionally by J. H. Burnham and Courtlandt Palmer.

It is simple justice to say the speakers were abundant and exhibited a high order of talent. Probably at no previous meeting has abler speaking been heard. The subjects spoken upon were quite diverse, and all tastes ought to hav been pleased.

It gave us, personally, great pleasure to meet the numerous friends from all parts of the country, to take them by the hand, and to feel from their earnest manner the hearty "welcome home" which they spoke. There is a sincerity in the professions of true Liberals scarcely to be found among other classes. To meet dear friends after so long an absence is truly gratifying.

Two days of the meeting were somewhat rainy, and as it was necessarily damp in the grove where a stand and seats were erected, the meetings were all held in the Opera House, which comfortably holds a thousand persons.

Three meetings of two and a half hours each were held every day, the first commencing at 9 A.M., the second at 2 P.M., and the third at 7.30 P.M., thus insuring about eight speeches or lectures each day. An hour each morning was occupied in a conference meetings, in which ten-minute speeches were made by those who desired to be heard. After this the regular speeches only were in order, and came on in course as decided upon by the committee in charge. These averaged an hour in length, some falling short of that time, and some continuing nearly two hours. It will thus be seen that those in attendance had about as much mental food as they could well digest.

Each meeting was cheered and enlivened by very good singing by Prof. W.F.Peck, accompanied by the melodion, played by a young lady of Watkins. Many of the songs were original, some being parodies upon old-time songs, and some new words to old and popular tunes. Others, again, were of a decided humorous character, and excited much laughter.

Upon a large-sized chart which was hung upon the side of the proscenium facing the audience was painted the following, in conspicuous letters:

DECALOGUE—NEW VERSION.

1. Better be an honest man in hell than a sneak in heaven.
2. An honest god will never damn an honest man for an honest belief.
3. All blessings come from the earth; none are rained down from heaven.
4. Human welfare is the only good; human misery the only evil.
5. You cannot help God; man needs your aid and sympathy.
6. A man is equally a slave whether his master is on earth or in heaven.
7. If the blood of Christ will save a thief, will it ever fail an honest man?
8. The most hell-deserving are those who desire a hell for others.
9. All time is too sacred to do wrong; no time too sacred to do good.
10. To teach there is a way to escape the consequences of sin is equivalent to a license to do wrong.

INTERPOLATION.

If the churches are the houses of God, and he owns the cattle on a thousand hills, he ought to be made to pay his own taxes.

It was easy to realize the great change that has taken place in the community at Watkins, toward Freethinkers, within the past four years, when the Convention was before held there. Then it was that the editor of this paper and three others were arrested upon a frivolous charge, and at that time it was that a spirit of unkindness was shown in many ways; but now every person in the town treated us with respect, and a kindly spirit was generally manifested.

In connection with this should be mentioned the increased inclination on the part of the secular press to report our meetings fully and fairly. Never before in our history has such a disposition been shown to giv our speeches in full, and to treat us with respectful consideration. The general attention which is being attracted toward us, and this willingness to do us justice, are an augury of good results. As soon as Freethinkers are deemed as respectable as other people, as soon as we are truthfully spoken of in the public press, as soon as the odium of being an unbeliever is fully removed, the faith in ancient creeds and supernaturalism will rapidly giv way. Thousands will be ready to declare that they long ago lost all faith in the dogmas of theology, and that they fully believe that the powers and forces of nature are quite sufficient to account for every result that has ever taken place. Then will the doctrins of gods and devils, of hells and divine anger, sink into oblivion with the old beliefs in genii, hobgoblins, and witches, which beliefs but two hundred years ago were rife in Christian Europe and America.

Our time and attention was too much occupied to admit of our taking notes of the speeches that were made; and that fact, with the want of space and time, will account for our not giving here anything like full details of the proceedings. We will hav to content ourselves by simply giving, in most cases, the names and order of those who spoke, with the subjects upon which they held forth. In the future some of the speeches may be given in these columns when space and time are more under our control.

On the morning of Wednesday, August 23d, the first meeting was called to order about ten o'clock, when Dr. T. L. Brown, the president, made the opening speech, congratulating those present upon the favorable auspices under which this meeting assembled. Mr. H. L. Green, the secretary, also made some remarks, reverting to the previous meetings of this association, and expressing hope for the future. He also expressed his views of the necessity of Liberals instituting schools where the various branches of education can be taught without the objectionable theological dogmas so universally introduced into all our public schools. He deemed Watkins a very suitable place for a school of this kind, and hoped steps toward its establishment would be taken by those able to donate money for the object. Mr. G. H. Walser, of Liberal, Mo., and editor of the paper by the same name, gave some account of the town of Liberal in Missouri, of his prosecution by Christian bigots, and of the starting of a fund for an orphan asylum in his community, toward which fund Mr. A. Minski, among others, has generously donated the sum of one thousand dollars.

Mr. W. F. Doty, of Port Jervis, N. Y., explained the mutual insurance organization being started in his town, principally among the Liberals, denominated "The Secular Benevolent Association." Miss Mary E. Tillotson spoke for some fifteen minutes upon the reforms of the day, giving more particular attention to dress reform among women. Dr. J. Stolz, of Toledo, O., spoke for a few minutes, as also did some others.

At 2 P.M. Dr. T. L. Brown gave an address on "What we Think," which was an able examination and argument upon the subject of the mind, the opening sentences being as follows: "Thought is the most valuable phenomenon known to man. If our think is not our soul, our mind, we hav no idea of the true meaning of the two words so often used. The more we know, the larger and more useful are our souls. Useful knowledge, it seems, has much to do with saving souls. Education is the basis of mind salvation. To be saved in mind is to be correctly educated. What we know about our thoughts should be freely and timely spoken. What is a thought? is one of the most important and necessary questions. If thought is a form, what form? If thought is a motion, what is moved? Is motion an entity? It seems only a relation of forms. Is thought an entity? Not unless it is a form. Can form and motion be separated? They never hav to my knowledge. If our think is our soul, and only brain motions, then our soul and our brain are inseparable. A brain without blood in motion does not seem to contain a motion. We can name thought. There can be no thought without sensation, and no sensation without brain and moving blood, timely united. Therefore if we explain our sense-perception we explain our thought." This was followed by an able address from ex-Rev. J. H. Burnham upon "The Purposes of Liberalism."

At 7:30 P.M. ex-Rev. S. P. Putnam read a part of the poem, "Ingersoll and Jesus," followed by a fine address upon "The Supreme Thing," in which he clearly showed that natural morality, manliness, and virtue are the supreme thing and superior to theological inculcations. This was succeeded by an able paper on Alcoholism by Dr. J. Stolz, of Toledo, O., giving the phvsiological effects of alcohol, and showing that intoxicants are a foe to the human race.

Thursday, 24th, after the conference of an hour, Mary E. Tillotson gave the first lecture upon vital reform. This was followed by Jay Chaapel, who pointed out several of the wrongs and frauds of the time, and defended the claims of Spiritualism. Courtland Palmer continued with an able and telling discourse, contrasting the era of God with the era of man. A more clear and effectiv discourse was not given during the convention.

In the afternoon meeting S. D. Moore opened with a ten-minute speech, after which M. Babcock, of St. Johns, Mich., highly amused the audience with one of his very humorous lectures upon theological absurdities and biblical monstrosities. George Chainey followed with an interesting discourse upon the false claims of the current religious system.

In the evening meeting Charles Bright opened with a speech of half an hour, touching the relativ merits of science and theology. Dr. Juliet H. Severance followed with effectiv remarks upon the reforms of the day. Next the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER detained the audience for twenty or thirty minutes upon the observations he had mads on his tour around the world. The meeting was closed by poetical recitations by Mrs. H. S. Lake.

On the third day, Friday, the 25th, after the conference in the morning, Dr. D. C. Farlin led off with a finished discourse upon the contrasting claims of Materialism and Spiritualism. The ex-Rev. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa., followed with an extremely interesting discourse, in which new ideas were presented, showing the superiority of science and commerce in teaching morality over the doctrines of Christianity.

In the afternoon meeting T. C. Leland read an able paper on the work and purposes of the Liberal League, after which Mr. Charles Bright delivered a very interesting discourse upon the nature of Science and Freethought.

In the evening a resolution of welcome and sympathy to Herbert Spencer was offered and passed, and the same was dispatched to him by telegraph in the name of the thousand Freethinkers in convention assembled. After this Mrs. H. S. Lake gave one of her earnest and eloquent lectures on "The Mission of Liberalism." After which Courtland Palmer announced to the audience that an adjournment would then be made to the Glen Park Hotel to participate in who had recently returned from his tour around the world, and had in foreign lands held aloft the banner of Liberalism, and had been received with marked distinction by sympathizing friends on the opposit side of the globe. He invited as many to participate in the exercises as felt like it, and concluded by eloquently responding to the toast "Humanity," which had been assigned to him. At this juncture Dr. E. W. Krackowizer, of Elmira, a Christian who believes in the doctrines of Darwin and Huxley, talked for some fifteen minutes, making a somewhat erratic and feeble effort to defend Christianity.

The adjournment was then made to the Glen Park Hotel, where the large dining-room was brilliantly illuminated, and some twelve tables, capable of accommodating ten persons each, were supplied with various viands, with others to be brought on as ordered. The bill of fare was neatly printed, with a fine cut of the hotel, and under it these words:

FREETHINKERS' BANQUET TO
D. M. BENNETT,
August 25, 1882.

Then followed the various dishes which made up the supper, and of which all partook with apparent good appetite.

This gathering contained many distinguished personages, and probably as much intellect as is often found in assemblages of the same size. Among those present may be named, first, Mrs. Amy Post, who for much over a half century has been an activ and practical abolitionist—a friend to the slave and down-trodden, as well as a constant and earnest worker in the cause of Spiritualism and Liberalism. Next may be named J. P. Mendum, for nearly fifty years publisher of the Boston Investigator, and numerous Freethought works. Then was the venerable A. B. Bradford, for many years a distinguished clergyman of the Presbyterian denomination. Among the other ex-reverends were J. H. Burnham, George Chainey, W. S. Bell, and S. P. Putnam. Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage, the editress of the Ballot Box, and an able advocate of woman suffrage, was also there, as was T. B. Wakeman, T. C. Leland, G. H. Walser and wife, M. Babcock and wife, E. H. Gault and wife, A. Minski, Moses Hayes, John E. Remsburg, Mrs. H. S. Lake, Mrs. Grace L Parkhurst, A. B. and Dr. J. H. Severance, Jay Chaapel, Dr. D. C. Farlin, and numerous others.

J. H. Burnham presided, and after the bountiful viands were disposed of he called to order, and taking the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER by the hand, addressed him in an impressiv manner as follows:

MY DEAR FRIEND, MR. BENNETT: I extend to you the hand of welcome, and congratulate you on your safe return as a voyager around the world. Look upon the faces surrounding you here in this room. These whom you behold are your friends. They hav followed you in your long pilgrimage with watchful anxiety, and are now only too glad to tender to you this welcome, though here you hav only a few in comparison with the many thousand who would greet you, as we do to-night. From the day you started your little TRUTH SEEKER in Paris, Ill., until this, you began to make friends among the Liberals and Freethinkers of this country and the world, and your career has been watched, and many thousand in the Liberal world hav only learned in all that watching that you hav born bravely and fearlessly the standard of Liberal thought amid the persecution and hate of the minions of superstition. And we are glad to recognize in you the representativ of the true spirit of honest Liberalism. Your courage, your persistent labor and dauntless bravery, hav won for you the admiration of this goodly number of friends here to-night, and many thousands throughout the world. In these honest endeavors to follow out your deepest conviction, you hav been made the victim of hate and prison walls; and the fidelity and devotion of friends, and the victories won by you, come in to compensate you in part at least for all of these trials and sorrows. We wish that you could liv a thousand years as our standard bearer—the man of a hundred well-fought battles, who has turned seeming defeat into victory. The banner of Liberalism in you hand has not known defeat, nor has it ever dragged in the dust, and hence we extend these friendly greetings and welcome in this banquet to-night.

To this Mr. Bennett responded, expressing his gratitude for the great honor conferred upon him this night. He said, while for some reason a certain portion of the public had been disposed to act the part of bitter enemies toward him, and had sought to do him all the injury in their power, he was proud to know he had hosts of the best friends a man was ever able to boast of. No man ever had greater reason to be proud of his friends than he. So long as he was encouraged and sustained by such friends he should very lightly regard his enemies, however bitter and despicable they may prove themselvs. "I cannot, of course," said he, "liv a thousand years, but hope to remain with you yet, fifteen or twenty years, and to still do some good and effectiv work."

"Let me," continued he, "while here assembled with you around this banqueting board, say a few words in behalf of our brothers and sisters in humanity on the opposit side of the globe—those usually denominated pagans and heathens. We hav often been told that they are a low and degraded portion of the human race, full of crime and wrong-doing. I wish to correct this statement, and to assure you that I hav found it to be false. In all the Asiatic countries in which I hav traveled, whether in India, Ceylon, Java, the Malayan Peninsula, China, and Japan, I hav found the nativs quiet, peaceful, and well-disposed human beings.

"In the six months I was traveling in Asia I saw no two nativs fighting, nor even quarreling, and during that time I saw but two or three persons who seemed to be intoxicated. I hav the testimony of Dr. Kerr—an intelligent American gentleman, and a very skilful surgeon, connected with the Christian missions in the city of Canton, where he has resided for thirty years—that during that time, in a city of nearly two millions of people, he has not seen more than one or two drunken persons in a year. The Rev. Mr. Chandler, eight years a missionary in China, and with whom I crossed the Pacific Ocean, assured me that during his residence in that pagan country he saw not more than two or three intoxicated persons. I can certainly assure you that I saw in a single night in the Christian city of London more evidence of drunkenness, prostitution, and crime than in the six months in which I was traveling among the pagan nations of Asia. True, there is crime in those far-away lands. A portion of the people there lie and steal and commit other crimes; but from what I learned by visiting the prisons and in studying their statistics, I am satisfied that while crime is punished there more severely and more uniformly than with us, there is not more than one-tenth as many criminals among heathens, in proportion to population, as there are among Christians in Europe and America. Yes, as I said, it is true that lying, cheating, stealing, intemperance, and prostitution exist in the countries I visited, particularly in the seaports and large towns, where Christian sailors, Christian soldiers, Christian traders, and Christian missionaries most do congregate. Those simple-minded people hav learned much dishonesty and crime from their intercourse with Christian people. They readily adopt our vices; but our virtues, if any, seem to do them but little good.

"I will remark that the missionary boards of America and Europe hav wisely decided to send very few unmarried missionaries to those countries because of the immoral habits which they teach the females of those lands. It is found more advisable to pay the wife of the missionary three hundred dollars per year, with an allowance of one hundred dollars for each child, than to permit the unmarried missionary to form immoral alliances with the nativ women and produce a population of half-breeds. It is found that Christian men without wives, whether traders, officials, soldiers, sailors, or missionaries, are very prone to follow such practices as to materially increase the population of those countries, infused with Christian blood and Christian morals. There are nativ prostitutes over there, but they are not nearly so numerous, in proportion, as in Christian countries.

"For several months I traveled over those pagan countries without seeing any evidence of the unchastity of their females. I saw not on their part an immodest action or wanton look until I reached the semi-European city of Singapore, where there could be no doubt of the unvirtuous character of a pretty large number of females there, but they are from Italy, Russia, France, Germany, and other Christian countries. They were not of 'degraded pagan' birth.

"I was treated with uniform civility in heathen Asia, and deem it quite as safe for a traveler there as in our own boastful Christian land. No person attempted to injure me or wrong me. None showed the slightest disposition to do me personal injury or to offer an insult. The same was the experience of that intelligent lady, Miss Isabella L. Bird—that was—who, after making extensiv explorations of our Rocky Mountains, upon which she wrote a most interesting book, decided to travel for a while over Japan. Her tour lasted for six months. During that length of time she traveled alone over that somewhat extensiv country, her only companion being her interpreter, a nativ youth of eighteen years. Although she visited many parts of the country, and where a European had never before been seen, she was treated with uniform kindness and respect. No insult or unkindness was offered her at any time, and the nativ goodness of those heathens was shown to her in numerous ways. It has occurred to me that a lone woman could hardly travel with safety for that length of time in our favored Christian country. I could not help contrasting the continued politeness and kindness of those people toward Miss Bird with numerous accounts of criminal atrocities which take place in our own country. I remember that upon arriving at Yokohama, I eagerly sought American papers, and among the first articles that met my eye was an account of a great wrong done a lady who ventured to step upon the streets, early in the evening, in the upper part of my own city, New York, when four men seized her, gagged her, dragged her to a hiding-place, and did her a most serious and criminal wrong. I thought at once, how different this from the treatment Miss Bird received from pagans! And since my return home I hav hardly been able to take up a daily paper which does not contain some account of wrongs, crimes, and outrages committed in our Christian country, arising from heavy drinking and unbridled passion. It has more than once occourred to me that it is hardly worth while for us to impoverish ourselvs to send over Christian missionaries to teach those distant pagan people how to liv and conduct themselvs.

"But I will not longer detain you; I simply wished to say a word in defense of those un-Christian people in foreign lands, who, many think, are suffering for the want of our civilization and the Christian religion. I am extremely glad to be with you to-night. I am inexpressibly grateful for the honor you do me; and again I sincerely thank you."

Mr. T. C. Leland was called upon to respond to the toast, "D. M. Bennett's Friends." He spoke as follows:

Not having the least expectation that I should be called upon to make a speech here to-night—I hav prepared one. It is the unexpected which happens.

Many tears are shed over those who are driven out into the cold, cold world. We parted from Mr. Bennett with moist eyes last year, but he seems to hav kept well on the outside of the crust of the Cosmos and didn't slump in anywhere that we hav heard of, especially not where it was cold. We are happy to greet him safe and warm-blooded here to-night.

The poet has immortalized in song the shot fired for freedom at Lexington but heard all around the world. That is nothing, however, to the free and independent criminal whose imprisonment in behalf of liberty fired himself all around the world; and it is on record, too, that he rather made himself heard as he went.

The latest and meanest Napoleon, in the hight of his despotic power, used to boast that he was the elect of 5,000,000. Mr. Bennett in the interest of human rights can beat that reactionary record all hollow. He is the first and only prisoner, whether innocent or guilty, whose pardon was petitioned for by over 200,000 of his fellow citizens. Never before in the history of the world had 200,000 names come streaming in, day after day, yes, and 12,000 personal letters by mail, respectfully petitioning the pardoning power to remit the sentence of any criminal on this earth. Mr. Bennett will wear the belt of that honorable record to his dying day. I only regret that the editorial sire has not a bleeding son to hand it down, that, though battled oft, it may be never won. On his tombstone, when he has occasion to hav one about him—which may it not be until after a ripe old age—it will be a simple and sufficient honor to chisel these instructiv words: "D. M. Bennett, the petitioned of 200,000." This is approximately the sum of Mr. Bennett's friends at that date, but they are probably innumerable at this hour.

Now let us flash a lantern on his enemies. Where are they?

The extraordinary way in which some of his persecutors hav been embalmed in oblivion, and others in infamy, is wonderful. There are half a dozen Hamans hanging on the gallows constructed for this Mordecai, while he, the man of honor and of success, sits in every one of their gates to-night.

There is Francis E. Abbot, who led off within the Liberal household itself. Francis was the founder and the president of the National Liberal League, and he might hav continued so to this day had he been fit to survive. Abbot snapped and snarled at Mr. Bennett for two years; but see—the man recovered from the bite, the dog it was that died. I suppose there never was a really learned and capable writer so well advanced toward a firm, well won, impregnable place in letters, as well as in Liberalism, who so suddenly fell out of line, and almost out of the memory of men, as Mr. Abbot has done, and it came about just from the little mistake of choosing the wrong road at the parting ways.

Then there is Mr. Underwood, second fiddle to Mr. Abbot while he was leader of the orchestra, but now sawing the same old Index catgut pretty much alone. He makes no better success of it; and the same abyss of Coventry and oblivion—for his treason to Liberalism, awaits him. He commits that lowest of offenses against good breeding, which alone dismisses a man from the society of gentlemen. He peeps into private letters and becomes a party to what the decision of learned judges has denounced as the meanest known method of attacking character. He connived, if he didn't directly promote, the publication of private letters without their author's consent, and all suspicions point to his doing it yet. Well, after all this, Mr. Underwood has lost caste among Liberals. From being the popular lecturer he once was, he no longer "draws," as the actors say, and he has fallen down, down, until he has landed now in the seat on the Index, from which Mr. Abbot was bounced. He fills it perfectly, and, on the same line, will come to the same bad end.

Then there is Mr. R. C. Spencer, of Milwaukee; but I made my point on him in a letter which has been published, so I won't dwell.

Next comes Tom Titcomb, of Scribner's Monthly. He characterized Mr. Bennett as a very bad man, and our reception of him in Chickering Hall as the "Apotheosis of Dirt." Well, within a year Tom went into the presence of that God of his, who inspired the great infallible book, and he knows now, if he is as immortal as he used to think himself, which has got the most "Apotheosis of Dirt" in it, the Bible or the reception at Chickering Hall. It is the luckiest thing in the world for us Infidels that the Bible is so magnificently obscene. We can retort on them, "You're another," with such a crushing effect. It is as lucky as that Guiteau was a Christian; for see with what haste they rushed to announce, before all the returns were in, that the assassin was an Infidel and a Socialist, who had worked among the Nibilists and Communists of Europe. But it was the example of Abraham! That is what did it. That trail is too "blarsted" fresh on any Christian who follows it; and the whole Christian world shout, "Hang him for the severity of his logic; not for his crime."

Now we come to Joe Cook, the very Hercules of Christian science. Little did he think in the spring of '79 when he sat in Judge Benedict's court, with nose in the air, ogling, cookadooing, and egging on Comstock, counsel, and court to railroad this man with express speed to prison, that he would meet that same convict within two years going about all over the world like a roaring lion, seeking to devour even Joe Cook, the Lord's annointed; and succeeding pretty well, too, I think, for Mr. Bennett seems to hav left him rather tattooed in India ink.

Oh, yes! there is Comstock. I nearly forgot him This is coming to a climax with the small end down. Well, I guess Comstock wishes he never had invested that three dollars in a decoy letter ordering an Infidel book from Mr. Bennett. Comstock's sun began to go down in gloom from that moment. He has succeeded in nothing since. The obscene line don't pay any more. He calls his meetings at Association Hall, women not admitted, but only the same men who hav bled for his country before, attend; and they don't bleed so freely now. As Dr. Tyng, who used to make speeches for him, broke off suddenly from the theologic line, and went first into insurance, and from that into stock gambling, so Comstock had to look about him for at least an adjunct to his obscene profession, and he tumbled naturally into the lottery business. He has taught a few obscene pupils and scattered them over the country, but they make poor work of it, and rush "Heptameron," or Walt Whitman's Poems, or whatever work they attack, into an unparalleled circulation. In one sense they are public benefactors—they make two "Leaves of Grass" grow where only one grew before. It will go hard if we don't look to it, but some enterprising publisher will lay in with Comstock, or some of his tribe, to attack any new book they may publish, so as to secure for it an unprecedented sale.

But the result of it all is the whole Comstock movement is petering out. It is a line of business that cannot be pushed far without running butt up against the rock of American independence with the "bird of freedom" perched on some jutting crag of it. She needs to giv but one scream, when it's all up

Is Mind Material?

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: My final proposition is that if the theory of Materialism is either true or false, that mind and everything else in nature is the result of material organization or evolution; then that is the very foundation and cause of every system of idolatry and god-worship that has ever existed in every nation and race of men from the most ancient down to our present day, including Christianity with all the rest.

It would hardly seem necessary to undertake to offer an argument in support of this proposition. It is of the character of a truism, for it can make no difference what the cause may be, the result is the same. Here we are in the world as it is, and the past as it has been, with a future to be as it will be, and we may consider the cause to be anything we please. Yet still the fact remains the same. If material evolution is true, everything is the legitimate result of that; and if untrue, men hav acted upon the supposition that it was true in their systems of idolatrous worship.

But for the purpose of illustrating the nature or workings of the rule, law, theory, principle, or whatever it may be named, of materialism or evolution as held by Materialists, let us consider that if the mind is the result of a peculiar material organization over which it could not possibly hav the least control, because it could not be in existence until that organization was perfected, for that organization is the only cause of its existence, then that mind would be dependent upon that organization not only for its present but for its continued existence, its capacity of thinking, and for the order, character, and quantity of its thoughts, and could be no more responsible for the actions resulting from the workings of the organs upon which it depended for its life and manner of action than a block of wood would be responsible for its existence, form, or position in the universe.

And upon that principle of reasoning (if it can be called reasoning) no created being in the universe could commit a crime or perform a virtuous action; they could not be blamable for any act, for they could not possibly hav acted in any different manner than they did, for it was all the result of the complicated and peculiar organization of the brain, over which the actor had no control. All such actions could be nothing more or less than simply an automatic play for which nothing could be responsible. For it is not to be supposed that the natural organs themselvs possess intelligence; they produce intelligence, and the product is not responsible for the production.

I think the above is a fair statement of the case. That it does not go as far as the statement that the food we receive into the stomach is ground up, digested, and by some evolutionary process and the action of the material organisms converted into thoughts, it would seem to be enough to affirm that the food was necessary only to sustain the material organisms that produce the thoughts, inasmuch as it is not claimed that the organisms are thoughts themselvs; and let the food claim end there without jumping it over the organization claims into thought.

But to come to the proposition that Materialism is the foundation of idolatry, all the nations and races of men that hav ever inhabited this earth within the historic period of time, and prehistoric only so far as their history is perpetuated in the ruins of buried cities and monuments in different parts of the world, hav had some idea of a great supreme power that controled the forces of nature and the destinies of men, and hav worshiped that supposed power in as many various ways and forms as their conceptions of that being varied in regard to his attributes and powers.

In reading "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times" I was forcibly impressed with the thought that the ancient Aryans and the American savages had the most pure and clear conceptions of the true god of all the races and nations of which we hav any knowledge. The Aryans worshiped God in the powers and forces of nature, recognizing him in his acts as he manifested himself in his works, which was in truth the next thing to worshiping him as an eternal spirit. They worshiped the action instead of the actor, and as action in the forces of nature presented the actor in a material aspect, so they materialized the actor, and confounded the actor with the action, and that is just what the Materialists of the present day do. That seems to be the simplest form of idolatry. The American savages worshiped the great spirit himself, which is in fact the worship of the true God, and although they look over into the spirit world, and in their imaginations picture to themselvs their hunting-grounds and the pleasures of the chase, that is no more inconsistent than the Christian's New Jerusalem, with its walls of precious stones and streets paved with gold. The one is as likely to be true as the other, and the idea of an activ state of existence hereafter seems to me to accord far better with everything else in nature than being employed eternally bowing before a throne and singing the same old psalm over and over again and again. It seems as if it must become monotonous after a time to any one who was not too lazy to work for a living; and it is just as reasonable to expect to be activly engaged in a future state as to be so engaged here; it would be perfectly natural; nothing supernatural about that.

The Materialists tell us that we cannot conceive of the super natural, by which I understand they mean that we cannot conceive of an immaterial spiritual existence, which they consider supernatural. Now, if there can be a spiritual, immaterial existence intelligence like my own mind, which I believe to be such an existence, then it would be no more supernatural than the material organization of its indwelling, this body.

And I can conceive of such an existence just as easily as I can conceive that I hav a mind of my own, as that I hav an existence myself; and I can conceive of a supreme intelligence that acts in this universe as my mind acts in my own material body. And I do conceive of such an existence, and I believe that existence to be the only living and true god, though I can not see him through these material organs of vision. Neither can I see my own mind in that way, but that does not prove that I do not exist or that God does not exist. I can sit here and write, and I know that I am yet in existence; and because I can see all nature teeming with life and activity I know that God exists, and there is nothing supernatural about it any more than my own existence with this mind and body united is supernatural. The great eternal is this god of nature.

This is the spiritual, immaterial view of the subject; there is no idolatry here; we get down to bottom facts, to things as they are. Only place things in their proper order, and let mind, which is the power that we know controls and does all that is accomplished here with us and around us here in this world, sit at the helm of the universe, and all is plain and easy to understand as far as finite minds can see into infinity, which we know of course it could not grasp.

Idolatry is the substituting of a material organization for a spiritual existence that acts through that material organization in manifesting that existence to us in this material state of existence in which we are now placed. It is the lowering of the eternal spirit down to the material that we can see or handle, and charging the effect to cause. And so the idolater makes for himself a material god of wood or stone, and bows down and worships that. He can see that, and knows what he is about, while groveling in the material rubbish, instead of worshiping the eternal spirit that animates all animate matter and is the life and soul of the universe.

Perhaps I hav said all that is necessary on this subject to make myself understood. I can think of almost innumerable reasons for the belief in a spiritual eternal, power, intelligence, mind that controls the material universe, and who cannot be dependent upon the material organizations that are subject to his will for his own existence. As I wish to trespass upon your time no more than necessary, I will not further prolong this discussion, but will conclude by briefly summing up and naming a few of the results of Materialism as I see it from my standpoint. And, first, it is suicidal, for if the mind is the result of the material organization in which it exists, it can and has by its own action destroyed the cause of its own existence, as in the death of the body from the action of the mind independent of all other causes. And, again, it destroys all responsibility, for if the mind is the result of an organization over which it had no control, and for which it depends for its present and continued existence and every thought and action in life, it cannot be the author of its own volitions, and is, of course, irresponsible. It reverses the order of nature, putting the cause for the effect and the effect for the cause. It aims to dethrone the great eternal, banish him from the universe, and endow inanimate matter with an inherent force that does not belong to it to supply his place in that universe. It justifies every scoundrel that exists in everything they do, for they could not hav done differently from what they hav done; and Anthony Comstock, as mean as he is, is no more to blame for anything he has done than the child unborn; and it is the most unreasonable thing that could be thought of to charge him with crime. Only for the reason that the same cause or the organization of the brain that makes him do as he does, makes D. M. Bennett think that Anthony has done wrong; the one exactly the opposit of the other. The one is as right as the other; neither is responsible; a lie is as true as the truth. And why should we blame men for worshiping idols, the Virgin Mary, or anything else, or for spending money for building temples, cathedrals, and churches for the worship of their gods, when it is all the result of evolution, for there could be no other cause if that is true? Or why spend our own time and money in lecturing them for doing so, and telling them how much better it would hav been to hav spent their time and money in building school-houses and educating the masses, when all that we can find fault with is the result of the very system we are advocating—all the result of material organization of evolution? Could anything be more inconsistent? Torquemada, the inquisitorial fiend, in all his infernal torturings by fire, the rack, starving in dungeons, flaying alive, and every other mode of torture that he could inflict, was only acting out what the peculiar organization of his brain prompted him to do. It was a practical illustration of Materialism; if it was Christianity, it is all the same—all the result of the same cause.

This is all upon the supposition that Materialism is true. It proves that Materialism, in its practical workings, is contradictory; that it does exactly what it condemns; that while its advocates are complaining how bad the world is, and charging it to this, that, and the other thing, this, that, and the other thing are all the result of their own theory of Materialism, of evolution. If we will only investigate, we can see that it is contradictory and suicidal All that is, ever has been, or ever will be, if Materialism is true, is the result of that system. If anything is wrong, evolution has made it so. James Hale.

The "Apotheosis of Dirt."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: On reading the remarks of M. E Tillotson upon my article, "The Movement in Favor of Ignorance," I am reminded of the story about the Irishman, who, being unable to write, got his employer to write for him to his friends on the old sod. In the letter he stated that he had meat to eat three times a week. "What do you mean by that?" asked the scribe. "Don't you get it three times a day?" "Yes, sir," was the reply; "but don't you think I want them to believe me?" I, sir, am the original discoverer of the truth that there is a movement in favor of ignorance. Not to be considered a vain alarmist, I had, on announcing that discovery, to draw it mild. I am not sure that the movement in favor of ignorance has no chance of success. I am sure it will succeed unless those in favor of knowledge dare to face the music. You will perceive, Mr. Editor, that the critical point is the right of truth seekers to discuss such subjects as marriage, divorce, heredity, and sexual physiology. The Christian strategists, in selecting this as the place at which to resist the advance of science, hav shown their usual judgment. History will never accuse them of lacking skill in controversy. By rallying here, they secure the united support of all vested interests, all brutal passions, all ignorant prejudices. All physicians of the "regular" school, all the actual and prospectiv husbands of the old fashioned Abrahamic type, all the thick-necked sensualists who belive with Ingomar that a slave is all a woman is good for, all the sanctimonious lechers, all the match-makers, all the husband-hunters, all the acrimonious old maids, and all the increasing class of ladies whose own reputations require purification by the process of smirching others, are found, as might hav been predicted, grouped around the Phallic standard which Mr. Comstock has set up. There, too, is all the remaining machinery of persecution for opinion's sake. All the prosecutions of Liberals during the last twelve years hav been based on the charge of "obscenity." A formidable host, indeed, confronts us! For not only hav they chosen their own ground, and mustered their entire force, but they are fighting with their natural weapons. And we all know that there is an animal which no human courage was ever expected to face! It is evident, Mr. Editor, that the movement in favor of ignorance has so far met with a great deal of success. What a seemingly resistless phalanx were we as we moved against the church a little while ago! What "cultured" and "eloquent" and "intelligent" and "competent" leaders we had! How magnificently they strutted at the head, without the least idea that they were about to meet a skunk! Suddenly that Phallic emblem was thrown to the breeze in front of us, and all was rout, confusion, and disarray. Abbot went over to the enemy, bag and baggage. Underwood was suddenly discovered to be hunting the rear. And away, somewhere on the flank, methinks I see even the stalwart form of Ingersoll, edging off toward a place where bullets are less plentiful! All this, however, is less alarming than the want of interest in the situation among the rank and file. How often I hav been told by Liberals that Comstock is a bore, and the point at which he has chosen to giv us battle a side issue! "No, gentlemen," I say; "it is the main issue." If the inductiv philosophy is not good for a matter of such vital importance as the relations of the sexes, it is good for nothing, and, instead of regenerating the world by knowledge, we are about to plunge into a new abyss of confessed ignorance. Shut science off from that sacred ground, which can be done by systematic legislation of the Comstock type, and she sinks from a giant into a dwarf—the patronized slave of those three "learned" professions, in which the stupidity and conservatism of past ages is summed up. No more progress—all's known! No more triumphal parade to the high altar. That Phallic emblem means "No Thoroughfare."

Now—the remedy. We must go in for the "Apotheosis of Dirt." I thank thee, Scrib., for teaching me that word. We must stop making any, even the slightest, concession to summer soldiers who are afraid of soiling their uniforms. Let them go and parade with the National Liberal League of America. They are nothing but a nuisance in the day of battle. To reach the expected triumph we must go through mud and mire, as well as fire and water. Glorious, then, is dirt. The man who is fighting mud-throwers, and can show no mud on his clothes, is one who ought to be ashamed. Remember that this mud battery is the last we hav to attack. If the obscenity racket fails, the church has nothing left to fall back upon. "Dirt" has always been trumps in her hand. But we can learn something from her. There was once an instrument of torture, shame, and death, which Christianity has changed into a symbol of victory, glory, and immortality, simply by choosing to boast instead of being ashamed of it. In this way, and no other, we can defeat our skilful enemy. I exclaim aloud that sexual science is destined to effect that extirpation of vice, of misery, of crime, which Christianity could only promis Exalt the truth that by knowledge generation will be made right and regeneration superfluous Seize the Phallic standard, claim it for our own, bear it before our column, defying, nay, glorying in slander and abuse, and justify the ancient sentiment "In Hoc Signo Vinces." C. Mr. Putnam's Banquet Poem.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: The report published in The Truth Seeker of the Bennett Banquet at Martinelli's has been read by me with great interest. Not the least entertaining of the many good things besides the dinner is Mr. Putnam's poem. Mr. Putnam is a vigorous poet. His poetry rings like a bell and stirs the reader like a trumpet. It has the brightness of sunshine, the majesty and grandeur of the stars, and the breezy freshness of a gale. It is as broad and far-sweeping as the universe. He is one of the early risers in the morning of liberty; he greets the dawn with song; and his productions will be read with enthusiasm as long as energy and fire and virility are admired in verse. A strain, too, of martial music runs through them that wakens the senses like a Marseillaise.

Having said so much, which is not half what is due, of Mr. Putnam's poetry, let me offer a little criticism. In the banquet poem the third and fourth lines read like this:

> "And foul birds flutter 'gainst the golden dawn,
> And spit their poison though their fangs are gone."

This is a figure, of course. That is all right. But it seems to me the metaphor is mixed. The second line I hav quoted is open to objection as follows: First, is there any variety of birds which spit? Second, is there any family among the feathered tribes that spit poison? Third (which seems to me the most infelicitious the author could hav chosen), is there any species of bird known to ornithology having fangs? I was under the impression that since the days of the winged and feathered saurians nothing more distinct in the way of fangs than hens' teeth had been brought to the notice of those who make birds a study.

These two lines are all there is to mar the beauty of the banquet poem, and I cannot help thinking that it would be improved by omitting them. The next couplet—is above criticism. It is a leap upward and goes far to restore the confidence of the reader, which is liable to be lost in the figurativ labyrinth of the preceding line.

> "Backward and forward tides of darkness flow
> And chilling blasts rebuff the morning's glow,"

I do not write this to warn Mr. Putnam against the evil of mixed metaphor, which, being an experienced versifier, he is doubtless aware of, but only to point out that the best of poets will sometimes take more license than the poetic prerogativ allows. Bulgarius.

Opposing Opinions.

From the Indianapolis Times.

It is astonishing how Americans love America. Here is D. M. Bennett, of obscene literature fame, who served a term of imprisonment for selling nasty books, and has just been dined and wined by his sympathizing friends on the occasion of his return from a year's journey abroad. While away he lectured in Ceylon, where the nativs were so deeply impressed with his wisdom and piety that they deified and worshiped hin. After putting him in their Buddhist temples they composed an ode in his honor, in which they compared him, among other things, to the Heavenly Elephant and the wish-conferring Cow of Heaven. And yet Mr. Bennett had rather be a convict in America than a god in Ceylon. Perhaps one of the reasons why America is so desirable a place of residence may be found in the fact that obscene cranks of the Bennett order are generally suppressed.

From the Iconoclast.

With all such dough-faced papers as the Times, "it is astonishing how Americans" would ever honor as good and pure a man as D. M. Bennett is at all. The Times is a time-server of orthodoxy. It can see no good in anything or anybody outside of a rotten and decaying church. Mr. Bennett was imprisoned for selling what the Times would pronounce "nasty books." He has nothing to conceal of what he sold. He served a term of imprisonment for doing a thing which was no crime. He was made a subject of persecution by one Anthony Comstock, as filthy and contemptible a villain as ever disgraced the soil of America. Mr. Bennett should hav been pardoned, and would hav been if we had had at the time of his imprisonment a president who was not a coward and a dupe of the church. No man in the United States ever before had a longer or more respectful list of petitioners for his pardon. Hayes turned a deaf ear to their desires and let Mr. Bennett suffer for a crime he had never committed. He is now the honored guest of the world, and the loved man of all true Americans, while Hayes, who was once president of the United States, has retired to the walks of private life, a disgraced and dishonored one.

The honors the nativs of Ceylon paid to Mr. Bennett seem to the editor of the Times very strange. Those people in giving him a warm welcome acted more the part of civilized human beings than can be said of some of our own people. The people of Ceylon, heathens as they are, know better how to treat Mr. Bennett than Anthony Comstock and his horde of Christian persecutors. These people, though, were not the only ones that paid high honors to Mr. Bennett in foreign lands. From the time he set his foot upon foreign soil in his voyage around the world he was honored and toasted by all. He was received with open arms by the people of every nation he visited, and upon his return to his own dear America, from the time he landed in the city of San Francisco to his arrival in New York, in every city and town through which he passed our people gave him a triumphal reception. Those who sought to disgrace and forever dishonor Mr. Bennett by their cowardly persecution of him hav at last found out, to their amazement, that instead of accomplishing their damnable purpose that they are the ones who hav been disgraced and dishonored, and not he. They will yet sink into insignificance, covered with the slime of their own filthiness, while he will liv an honored and respected citizen, and his name will ever shine in history among the greatest and purest of American sons.

A Delegate from the Pacific Coast.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: As corresponding secretary of Auxiliary Liberal League 190, of this city, I hav mailed a number of postal cards and letters to leading Freethinkers asking that we should make a movement to send a delegate from this coast to represent us in the Sixth Annual Congress of the National Liberal League, to assemble at St. Louis the latter part of next month. I hav received several replies, and some gentlemen hav offered to contribute $5 toward sending me, while two in addition would also contribute $5 each toward bringing me back. I am very grateful for this generous offer, and especially the good will manifested, but cannot accept. The trip could not be made for less than $400, and this large sum would not be adequately repaid by anything that I could do. I should think it a great honor to appear as a delegate in so intelligent and progressiv a congress, but, under the circumstances, this is out of the question.

It is possible, however, that some gentleman, a Freethinker, of ability and means, may be going East on business, and with the hope that this brief note may attract his attention, I send it to you for publication. Such a delegate could well take a run to St. Louis, where, without doubt, he would be amply repaid by meeting the most intellectual body of Freethinkers in the republic. Will the Boston Investigator, the Age, the Iconoclast, the Banner of Light, Mind and Matter, and other Liberal journals please call attention to this important subject? The right man may be found by agitating the matter.

We should be represented, as very important matters will come before the congress. The most important among them will be the question of abolishing the mythical and bloody calendar of Christianity and adopting the universal calendar, dating from the martyrdom of the immortal Freethinker Bruno, burned at the stake by the Christians at Rome on the 16th of February, "A. D." 1600. We are rapidly adopting what is called the Bruno-Wakeman calendar, and La Voce del Popolo, the leading Italian journal of this city, enthusiastically advocates its adoption. "The Real Blasphemers."

This little pamphlet of Col. J. R. Kelso's is truly an eye-opener to the bloodthirsty character of the Jewish Jehovah. His plain showing-up of the injustice and cruelty of this malignant God's commands to the Jewish nation to rob and slay each other, as also the unoffending nations and tribes around them, comes to us as a revelation, tearing the bandage from our eyes, that hav been holden from seeing these monstrosities, while blinded by the glamour of sanctity that has been thrown around the Bible and its teachings.

I remember, when a child, on reading the Old Testament for the first time, and coming upon the passage where God commanded the women and children, whom the soldiers had left alive, to be slain, all but the virgins, I threw the book from me with horror, and exclaimed in indignation, "I hate such a God as that!" My mother, who sat near, in utter astonishment said to me, "My child, you blaspheme!" But I hav lived to know that I did not blaspheme, and that the God of the Jews, as set forth in their traditions, is not the supreme ruler of the universe. "That religion or Bible which shocks the mind of a child cannot be true," says one of the wisest of men.

When in after years I became a member of the Methodist church, and used to pray, I could never use the name God or Jehovah without a feeling of misgiving, and would aspire to reach the infinit that I felt was far above and beyond such a conception of deity. How hard it is for the human mind to let go the errors taught in youth, especially those of a religious nature, which we were taught to lisp at our mother's knee! But how grand it is to see the mind, in maturer years, discarding the crude ideas of traditions and taking on the scientific knowledge of demonstration and experience. As man can never become better or greater than the God he worships, let us hope that few will not arise above the character of the Hebrew God, who is, as the colonel says, far below a respectable devil. No mind is free that even pays homage to such a God, or that even believes that the innocent must suffer for the guilty; that God's anger against sin is turned away by foulest murder! How long, oh, how long, ere the world shall learn the truth that makes free, and that the only salvation is by living a true and loving life, when love shall supersede all law, and become the conqueror of every wrong, crime, and sin?

L. Hutchinson.

"Real Blasphemers" is a sharp, sensible, critical book. John R. Kelso, A.M., has done good service to Liberalism by his strong and abundant proofs, which show that all who indorse the Bible as the the word of God, or the biography of saints, prophets, and holy men and women, are the "Real Blasphemers," according to Webster's definition of the word.

Kelso certainly shows up the character of the being called God, as it is represented in the Bible, to be cruel, revengeful, wicked, and altogether abominable and terrible. He makes him out to be pueril, weak, childish, unreasonable, treacherous, bloodthirsty, and cowardly. Indeed, their is scarcely a demeaning adjectiv that will not apply to him.

If you want to know how bad this God of the Bible really is, you could not apply to a better source for information than this book of Kelso's. Speaking of David (the man after God's own heart) delivering the seven innocent children into the hands of the Gibeonites, and their being hanged as a sacrifice to this God, he tells of the mother guarding her sons day and night to keep the birds and beasts of prey from them. He says: "Picture to yourselvs the unutterable agony of that loving mother as she keeps her lone vigils day and night upon the cold, hard rock for long weary months, while the bodies of her murdered children are slowly dropping to pieces before her very face, and then, if you feel like doing so, break forth in loud hallelujahs to the unutterably hideous monster that had it done—the monster, that according to your teachings, is not a particle better now than he was then."

The book is well worth reading, and will be a good one to lend to all Bible-worshipers as a true picture of the God we are commanded to believe in or be damned.

CHRONICLES.

I hav just received the "Chronicles of the Pilgrim in the Land of Yahweh," and am very glad it is in a book by itself; it is a nice, pretty book, too, and I take great pleasure in recommending it to Liberals as a splendid volume for missionary work. I hav been re-reading it, and appreciated it even more than at the first reading. There are so many good points made against the old Christian myths, and so many humorous descriptions of the superstitious legends and legendary places connected with them, that one marvels how in 1882 any one can be found who believes enough in them to keep up the farce any longer. If Bennett had written nothing more than this description of the Holy Land, every Liberal ought to hav felt he had the worth of the five dollars contributed. Why, there is enough in this volume of 462 pages to convert every Christian in the world from his belief in the old fables and legends to the truth as it is in Bennett the Apostle and the Scribe. I hope every League will order one for circulation, and also every individual who can do so. Every page is full of interest, and every sentence strikes home and hits hard. It is the only true and correct history of the Holy Land that has ever been written. It is sensible, interesting, humorous, and excellent. I hope every truth lover will do all they can to circulate this useful, practical, and myth-destroying book. I shall do my share by ordering half a dozen of them just as soon as I can. May the fates bless our hero.

"Honor to him who scorns to be
To name or sect a slave;
Whose soul is like the sunshine, free,
Free as the ocean wave;
Honor to him who freely givs
Of his best thoughts a store;
Who shares the knowledge he receives
With those who need it more."

MR. HACKER'S RECEIPT.

Received through the office of The Truth Seeker from several friends, to whom replies hav been sent through the mail, the aggregate sum of $5.25. Also through C. Garwood, of Baltimore. Md, 19.30.

Thanks seem a poor return for all this kindness, but we hav nothing better to offer. Would pray for our good friends, but hav no certain proof that prayers are ever answered by any power higher than man. Jeremiah Hacker.

Berlin, N. J., Aug. 2, 1882.

Between the monthly and special contributions for last month we are able to make a very respectable showing and to gladden the hearts of our aged friends I would like to say to "Shoe Hammer," of Sedalia, Mo. (and whom I ineffectually tried to reach through the mail), please send me your real name. Your letter has the true ring. As requested, I hav divided the dollar inclosed, and sent fifty cents to Elmina for friend Tuttle.

Trusting that new support will be added to our efforts, and that none of us will forget or neglect to renew our donations, I remain, Fraternally yours, C. Garwood.

Baltimore, Md., Box 858.

Some Questions Answered.

Freemont, Pa., Aug. 19, 1882.

Dear Bennett: Allow me to ask you, through your columns, if your four volumes with regard to your round-the-world trip will be copiously indexed. Such should be the case, so as to make the work a handy book of reference. The stories of old Yahweh's meanderings and of Jesus ought to be so that they might be easily referred to. How about your account of the Holy Land appearing in the above in the form of chronicles? After one's having read so much untruth in that style, the mind naturally spleens against it. Would it not be be better to hav the truth stand in plain English than to try to imitate the old barbarians? Yours truly, George Sweet.

[In answer to the foregoing we hav to say that Volume IV. will contain a copious index of the entire work, so that any subject treated in either of the volumes can be found and turned to at once. It may also be stated that the portion of the work referring to Palestine or the "Holy Land," including the eighteen visits of Melchisedec, together with the First Epistle of Bennett the Apostle, making in all 462 pages, is bound in a cheap volume by itself, and sold for one dollar. This is a good book with which to do missionary work. It is certainly not hard to understand; and it is only in two or three chapters that the Bible style is closely followed. It is mainly in common English, with the exception of being divided into chapters and verses, which ought not to be a serious objection.—Ed. T. S.]

"The First Epistle of Bennett the Apostle."

By particular request this has been printed in separate form, and is sold for ten cents. It is to a limited extent a parody on Paul, and is believed to contain quite as good morality as do the writings of Paul, and quite as much of truth. Many are pleased with the good sense and the moral maxims with which it abounds. The extracts from the teachers and sages of ancient times are worth all is asked for it. Send in 10 cents for a single copy, or $1 for a dozen copies.

"Crimes of Preachers."

We hav just brought out a second edition of this little work by Col. M. E. Billings. Over two hundred cases of freshly-committed crimes on the part of sensual shepherds. The same will annually appear in revised editions from year to year with the product of clerical crime for each year thus added. The entire work has been put in larger type, and, being arranged in alphabetical order, is convenient for reference. 25 cents per copy; five copies for $1; or twelve copies for $2. The edition of one thousand should soon be worked off.

"A Truth Seeker in his Own Country."

Friend Bennett: Seeing thy request that all who are disposed to subscribe $1.50 per volume for thy description of travels around our own country, Mr. Slenker and myself respond at once with the money for the first volume, which please find inclosed.

Mr. Slenker says if thee wants a "traveling companion," he hopes thee will not go to "Watertown, Wis," for her, but take Mrs. Truth Seeker along. And we also hope you will take in Snowville on your round, so that our humble home may be honored by your presence and ourselvs be made to rejoice with an exceeding great gladness. Elmina.

Snowville, Va, Aug. 20, 1882.

The Fourth Annual Encampment of the Liberals of Kansas, will be held in Bismarck Grove, commencing Thursday, August 31st, and holding over Sunday, September 3d. The following speakers are engaged: Fredric A. Hinckley, Hudson Tuttle, Emma Tuttle, Rev. D. Cheyney, Mrs. M. P. Krekle, C. B. Hoffman, Gov. Chas. Robinson, Mrs. H. M. Stearns, David Eccles, and others. The musical and social features of the occasion will be especially attractiv. The best of camping conveniences are to be had in the delightful grove. Meals will be furnished on the grounds at low prices. An educational department for the purpose of studying the live social problems of the age will be superintended by Miss Sarah A. Brown and Judge H. H. Howard, of Lawrence, Fredric A. Hinckley, of Providence, R. I., and other successful educators. The Union Pacific Railway offers the exceedingly low rate of one and a half cents per mile, the round trip. Other roads offer reduced rates. No pains will be spared by the managers to make it pleasant and profitable to those in attendance.

"Are you certain of securing the diadem?" asked the minister of the dying man. And when the man said that he "didn't want to diadem bit," the minister and the doctor flew, and as a natural consequence, the man got better.

There are sermons in stones, and some are gneiss. —Boston Transcript. They are generally preached for the "rocks" that are in 'em.—Peoria Transcript.

A Western preacher, whose congregation had begun to fall off somewhat, had it intimated that he would discuss a family scandal the following Sunday. As a consequence the church was crowded. The minister's subject was Adam vs. Eve.

"Father," said a fashionable young lady, "am I a member of the church?" "Yes, my daughter," her father replied, "you are a member of the church. I initiated you by having you baptized in infancy." "But, father," she answered, "I hav no piety, never was converted, and I do not think I ought to be a church-member." "The wheat and the tares are to grow together, our Lord tells us in the parable, and you are tare, I fear, my daughter—only a tare," replied her father. "But didn't you say that you initiated me?" she asked. "Yes," said he, "I initiated you in your infancy. But why did you ask?" "Because," she answered slowly, "the Bible says that the one who sowed the tares was the devil." The old man groaned, walked the floor, and made no reply.

The Truth Seeker will be sent to new subscribers three months for half a dollar. Let those who are interested in the spread of Freethought induce their friends to become trial subscribers.

Letters from Friends.

ATLANTA, GA.

MR. EDITOR: Received your second volume a few days ago. It is just splendid. Please accept my thanks. Kindly, etc., A. M. SHOMO.

KUHN'S CROSSING, COL., Aug. 14, 1882.

MR EDITOR: For the inclosed $5 send history of your travels around the world to S. G. HOUSH.

LUDLOW, ILL., Aug. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Glad to welcome you home again, and, as I noticed your letter in last TRUTH SEEKER in regard to your traveling in this country and lecturing, I hasten to send in two names that will gladly send in the required sum for your volumes whenever you wish it. Respectfully, GEORGE NEWKIRK,
ELIZABETH NEWKIRK.

LYNEDOCH, ONT., Aug. 16, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find two dollars, to apply on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I congratulate you on your safe arrival home from your long voyage, and also on your very interesting accounts of the same. Your industry has been marvelous; to see all you hav seen, and to describe it in the way you hav done, is what but very few men indeed could do.

I remain yours in the bonds of friendship,
JOHN MARSLAND.

JACKSON, MICH. Aug. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals in this city speak of your late visit among them with earnest appreciation and refreshing enthusiasm, and they express the hope to see you in the place again at no distant time.

All our old subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER renew their subscription with a cheerful promptness, and we shall gradually gain new and substantial allies to this most important list. The glorious old flag-staff must be kept aloft and in the breeze, with bold hearts and courageous hands to bear it

Yours truly, C. S. R.

APPLE RIVER, Aug. 17, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find post-office order for $5 to be applied as follows: $3 for my paper for 1883, as I see my year ends on September 1st; $1.50 for the fourth volume, as I see you are to hav four books and I only paid for three; then there will be 50 cents left, apply this in part payment for "Keelers' Short History of the Bible;" this will leave me 25 cents in your debt, and I will send it when I remit you for some more books.

I feel happy to hear of your safe return, and hope you will long liv to open the eyes of this superstitious world. I am seventy-six years old, never believed in any church or creed, and fear no gods or devils. Your friend, with much respect,
W. ENNOR.

CEDAR SPRINGS, MICH., Aug. 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: We are hungry for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Through the kindness of Mr. Hendee, of Warsaw, Ind., we became acquainted with you through your paper, and hav formed quite an attachment to the "prison bird." It does our soul good to see you quench hell with truth.

My wife is the only daughter of a Methodist minister, but she has had a change of heart (or mind) since reading the many Liberal papers, such as THE TRUTH SEEKER, Irish World, the Age, and others. If such papers would not bring about a change of heart what would?

My political views on finance correspond with my religious views, i. e., man, redeem thyself—money, redeem thyself. These fundamental principles it would be well to study. The only devil that man need fear is a false idea. Truth can only save us from that monster. A. S. CROXTON.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Aug. 13, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to congratulate you, and your wife also, that you are home again from a foreign shore, and that you are safe and sound, though you did hav to cast a wishful eye from Jordan's cooling stream, where your possessions or clothes were hanging on a bush.

Let me state for the many friends of Mr. York that he is still an invalid, has not lectured since you left us, and the prospects do not seem flattering for his doing so this summer. Some weeks since Mr. John Sunderland, of Reno, Nev., sent him an invitation to visit them and try the air from the Sierras. The invitation was so cordial that it was accompanied by a check sufficient to cover all expenses, with the promis of good care and his expenses paid home again, and they are fulfilling their contract to the letter, but he does not gain as rapidly as we hoped. He needs rest more than anything else. I think he regrets being unable to carry out the large amount of work he had planned and promised, but man proposes, etc. Our second volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World" has just arrived all right. Your vindication of Slade's slate-writing in a recent issue of your paper I consider simply an act of justice, for right wrongs no one. While I know nothing of his character, life, or tricks, I hav proof that this slate-writing is something that he cannot do, and, to my mind, is evidence that those who hav passed on can and do return to earth. MRS. J. L. YORK.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Aug. 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I can think of no better way to welcome you home from your long trip than to renew my subscription to your brave paper and also to subscribe for the Round-the-World books. I hav not read the letters in the paper simply because I wanted the reading to be new and fresh to me when it came in book form.

Please find inclosed $10,00—$6.50 for the books, and the balance apply on my subscription. I see I got a little behind, which I should not hav done. Infidels should pay promptly for their papers, as it is but a little mite, individually, to each one, but a very large elephant, collectivly, to the publisher of a paper.

You advertise the Round-the-World books at $6.50 for the four volumes, but do not say anything about the style of binding. I want the best, and if they cost any more notify me and I will remit the difference. I know they will be a splendid addition to my Liberal library, and they can't be bound any too good. Please send Vols. I. and II. right away. Thanking you for your untiring labors in behalf of our great cause, I remain your friend and supporter in my humble way, JAS. L. MCKELVEY.

CIRCLEVILLE. OHIO. Aug. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: We are glad to hear of your safe return to your happy home and ardent friends from your long and perilous journey around the world. May you long liv to enjoy the fruits of your faithful labors in the cause of humanity, sustained by the approving smiles and congratulations of all true Liberals throughout the world. And may the minions of superstition and priestcraft be imbued with a little humanity to temper their excessiv godliness, so that they may never seek to annoy or persecute you again. I think you hav suffered enough from Christian bigotry, hatred, and intolerance. Let peace and patience possess your soul.

Please find inclosed $3, to be applied on my subscription as directed.

A Liberal friend of mine, and your ardent admirer, Thomas Rayson, gets the paper, and reads and circulates its secretly in the neighborhood. His wife is so godly and pious, and such a devoted Christian, that she will not allow her husband to take the paper or read it in the house with any peace, although he subscribes for the Christian Advocate for her, and allows her full liberty of conscience. Please remember us kindly to Mrs. Bennett, and believe me ever your devoted friend, C. M. SEARS.

UNITED WE STAND; DIVIDED WE FALL.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

BROTHER INFIDELS: May I claim your undivided attention? We are now a large body of persons, and our power and influence ought to be felt in this and other lands. This could be effected by a grand union between us. We should be well known to each other by some clever method, whereby we could not be mistaken, and as brothers we should stand firmly by each other, and all our movements should be in unison. Let us form and consolidate our persons and principles, and become a formidable phalanx against the common enemy—priestcraft. Let us seek to dethrone this false authority. You all know how base it is, what guilt rests upon its blood-stained claws, and how it ever tries to smother the honest truth, and promulgate the blackest of lies. The priesthood are ever ready to spread deceit and gull the imbecil multitudes, and draw their hard-earned money and liv in ease through public plunder. Oh! what infatuation to cringe before these systems of paganism. It is time this solemn mockery came to an end, and sound Materialistic sense prevailed. It is the great and true remedy to rid the earth of many errors and all the miserable delusions of religious superstitions, and giv to man peace, joy, friendship, prosperity, and the most solid happiness. Brothers, unite. THOS. WINTER.

LOWER BOISE, IDAHO, Aug. 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: During the last three months I hav been staying in the mountains, and I hav not seen any papers until yesterday. I read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 1st an article clipped from the Inter-Ocean of Chicago. Now, it does not seem possible that the editor of that paper could use such language as that, when he must know that every word that he uttered was a lie except that you were tried and condemned. No man that is posted in your case but knows it was nothing but religious persecution. If the pamphlet, "Cupid's Yokes," was really obscene, why did President Hayes pardon the author of the book when Hayes said it was not obscene? If that editor is a responsible man I would commence suit against him for libel. There is no doubt in my mind but such suit could be sustained against the paper. Judge Benedict, in the trying of your case, no doubt thought that he was influenced to do what he did by God's holy word, so called, as we hav a parallel case in the 109th Psalm, 7th verse: "When he shall be judged let him be condemned. Let his days be few, and let another take his office. Let his children be fatherless and his wife a widow. Let there be none to extend mercy unto him, neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children. Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered with the Lord, and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out." Now, the editor of the Inter-Ocean will soon find out, if he has not already, that forty such editors cannot put D. M. Bennett down. He may be hurt as badly as the two editors that united to kill D. M. Bennett, but killed themselvs. No one can tell what became of them. I am heartily glad that you hav returned home, and are ready at all times to battle for the right.

Yours fraternally, H. S. HALL.

GWYNNVILLE, IND., Aug. 17, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I seat myself this morning to drop you a letter of inquiry concerning a statement said to hav been made by Colonel Ingersoll some time during the latter part of the past winter.

A minister of this neighborhood, by name McNew, says that Ingersoll, in making a temperance lecture, said, "In my belief there is a hell, and all saloon-keepers will go there."

I would like, if you conveniently can, to hav you giv through THE TRUTH SEEKER the essence of that portion of the colonel's lecture bearing on hell, if there is any such portion, for by so doing you will confer quite a favor on me. I hav treed the black-coated gentleman in several lies already, and would like to tree him again.

Yours for truth, A. W. SWAIN.

P S—I hav a debate between myself and this lordly gentleman, a portion of which I am going to hav published after a while.

I presented the questions on paper, and he answered in the same way. I consider the answers extremely childish.

I hope, in the course of a month, to be able to send you one or two trial subscribers to your paper, at which time I will send for a few more books. Nothing like good reading matter. A. W. S.

[Not hearing Colonel Ingersoll's lecture, not having read any report of it, and not being in the country when it was delivered, we are very poor authority upon the subject. We are sure, however, that Colonel Ingersoll believes in no hell save that which men make for themselvs in this life. If whisky-drinking is well followed up it will create hell enough to suit the most ardent hellite on record.—ED. T. S.]

MAUSTON, WIS., Aug. 15, 1882,

MR. EDITOR: I hav much I would like to say if I only knew how to say it; but I can say I am glad you are here again, to family, friends, and the duties of your office.

I hav read every line of your travels, I hav seen all you hav described in my mind's eye. I did intend to hav a shake of your hand when you were in Milwaukee, but a friend that promised to accompany me backed out, and I, never having been there, felt a little shy to go alone, and since then I hav been called to see an old Infidel friend of mine at Marengo, Ill., where I used to reside for thirteen years, and there buried a wife and three children. The expense of this journey has depleted my purse so much that I am obliged to be careful, or I should hav sent for more books.

Let me say right here, before I forget it, that my old friend above mentioned has been a subscriber to the Boston Investigator nearly as long as Mr. Mendum and Mr. Seaver hav had the management of it. I asked him, while on his dying bed, with his hand in mine, how his mind stood on matters of religion and Infidelity. He said, "Just as it always stood from my youth up to the present moment; nor can all the Christians in the world change my views, for they know no more about a future state than you and I do, and that's just nothing at all." My last words to him were these: "Farewell, old friend, a long farewell, for we shall never meet again." He said, "If we do ever meet again we shall hav as good a time of it as any of them," meaning the Christians. So it is not true, as the Christians are in the habit of saying, that Infidelity may do to liv by, but that when we come to die we generally repent and call upon the Lord to save us.

I distributed several of your small tracts among the heathens of Marengo, and lots of God's doings; had several little confabs with some of the gospel slop-drinkers, to the great delight of many of the by-standers.

I do believe that great good might be done in Marengo if some Liberal lectures could be given there. If I was living there I would hav some one visit it, even if I had the whole bill to foot, as I hav had the most of it to do in Mauston. I hav done more than any other man here for the cause of Liberalism; but for me Mauston would be as dead as Marengo, I am sorry to say.

Yours ever in the cause of mental liberty,
WILLIAM HOLGATE.

MODESTO, Cal., Aug. 29, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will recall your prophetic utterances in your letter three months or so ago (April 29th), and will remember the wonderful fulfilment of the "Coming trouble in Egypt," namely: "They (the Egyptians) are talking among themselvs of the necessity of rising against their oppressors. This may come in one, two, or three years, but come it surely will."

Did any prophets of the Bible come any nearer the truth? Why not place you among the prophets? Surely, this profession is by no means extinct. It strikes me that you hav shown yourself a pretty good imitator of Isaiah. It is permissible amongst Bible prophets to make years mean months or days just to suit particular events. Every Bible reader or expounder has been struck with the wonderful facility it can be done and be believed by a certain class of people.

Again, you write "That will be a bloody day when it comes, but it will only giv the European nations a good excuse to visit severe punishment upon them." These two prophecies hav been fulfilled. Now the Bible is bolstered up by just such testimony, and Christians consider this sufficient to secure its acceptance as a divine book; but I fear the Christians will not accept you, Mr. Bennett, as a true, genuin prophet, because the bubble known as prophecy has met in you, the Infidel, an effectual "bubble pricker." You hav caused the book containing them to subside into the ocean of quackery business on which it now floats; hence, there is no chance for you in this nineteenth century to become a simon-pure prophet. Well, I am glad that the old prophet system is dead. It has hindered progress in science by keeping knowledge in the dark or using it merely to float a great corporation of priests, ministers, and divines, with their great system of "fraud, error, humbug, and lies."

Prophet or no prophet, you hav really and truly disappointed a large class of your admirers as plain Mr. Bennett, by not coming to our town and giving us a chance to see you face to face and giv you a good shake of the hand. Our town has quite a large number of Freethinkers and Liberals who would hav given you a hearty welcome. To be an Infidel here is not to be ostracized from society or an impediment to success in business. The successful men of our town are with few exceptions Liberals.

California is on the high road to become free from the shackles of religion. The Democrats hav it as a platform, "No Sunday Law," and, as far as I am able to judge, they will be a success along the whole line, as it is almost sure that the Republicans will adopt "Enforcement of the Sunday Law." And, if so, they are defeated. C. C. Luther, Col. Kelso, Capt. James, D. C. Coleman, and others, wish to be kindly remembered to you, and all express a hope that you will again visit this coast and not fail to visit Modesto, the central town of the boss country for wheat and barley in America, and the finest climate in the world. Yours respectfully,

A. A. GILMOUR, M.D.

SPRINGFIELD, Mo., Aug. 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find three dollars, which, you will find, will pay me up to June 1, 1882, for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Times hav been hard with us in southwestern Missouri, owing to an almost total failure of all leading crops last year, and money scarce. But I desire to take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and will try in future to pay more promptly, if you think proper to send it to me. While I recognize the incalculable good which the Liberal movement is doing in freeing the human race from the terrible superstitions and fallacies which hav been bequeathed to us by corrupt priests and churchmen, yet, after much thought upon the subject, I think that Atheism commits the same fatal mistake which Theists of all ages and ranks, from the most ultra orthodox priest to Deists like Thomas Paine, hav fallen into; ultra Atheism asserts with dogmatic hardihood that there is no God.

Theists or Deists or Monotheists also assert, in the most positiv manner, and often in an acrimonious spirit, that there is one all-wise, eternal, unconditioned God. Now, how do the representativs of either of these extreme positions know anything about it. It is only necessary to remember that, owing to the limitations of the human mind, which is circumscribed and bounded by a mental horizon which, though large to our human, finite conceptions, is as nothing in comparison to the great unconceived infinit which underlies and overlies this very small circle; in which our little minds move, and in which we see things as through a glass darkly. It surely ought to occur to the most common minds that, in order to successfully grapple with either of these very extraordinary positions, the eternal, inflexible, insuperable barrier which must ever intervene between the finite and the great inconceivable infinit must be removed (a thing impossible) before we could successfully cope with all the vast and momentous issues involved therein. Hence either proposition contains a problem in which is contained an unknown quantity of such vast proportions that he who assumes to be able to solve the mystery is presumptuous indeed. It is plain, then, that Atheism, though far more tolerant and magnanimous in spirit and incomparably more in harmony with the results of scientific discovery and the spirit of the closing years of the nineteenth century, is fundamentally as dogmatic and in some extreme cases as impatient of contradiction as is Theism of any kind from the most simon-pure orthodox believer in the Westminster Confession to the most Liberal Unitarian. I must confess to some surprise that one so sympathetic and so deeply skilled in a knowledge of the human heart, one who so successfully and happily and wisely decides on all those strange, mysterious, and subtle conflicts which rises between and puts at variance the head and the heart, should unreservedly indorse and embrace Atheism—I allude to Mrs. E. D. Slenker. No one admires the beauty and grandeur of her character more than I do. Nor do I desire by any means to detract or censure one who has done so much to enfranchise the human mind, and one, too, who has, with singular ability, penetrated the devious labyrinths and chambers of the human mind. But when she assumes to sustain the Atheistic position either deductivly or inductivly she must, with all the other grand and noble intellects of the present and past ages, succumb to the inevitable and confess that she is finite, and that the proposition in question is merged in the infinit.

In conclusion, let me congratulate you upon your safe return from your eventful trip around the world. If it is not asking too much, I would be pleased to hav this briefly-improvised letter published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, in which case I hope "Elmina" and others will rise and explain.

Yours truly, M. J. ROUNTREE.

ORANGE CITY, FLA., Aug. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $7, $3 to apply on subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the balance to apply on a three months' trial subscription.

We hope to add to the list of subscribers to your valuable paper from time to time; but it is almost impossible to induce people to investigate the claims of Liberals by even reading the papers devoted to the promulgation of their principles.

We are glad to know of your arrival on the shores of your nativ country in safety and good health.

We feel sure that the knowledge you hav gained by the year of arduous travel just closed is fraught with consequences the value of which the strongest intellect can yet scarcely comprehend.

Your true friend, T. D. GIDDINGS.

BERLIN, N. J., July 26, 1882.

FRIEND BENNETT: There is one subject which, next to mental liberty, should claim the earnest attention and action of all who wish well to the future of our country, and that is the land question. Nature spread out the land for the use of all her children, and it never should be bought and sold any more than sunlight, air, and water. It is one of the elements from which life must be supported, and should be as free to all as air or water. The one that comes first to the wilderness should hav the right to take what he can cultivate without money or price, and no man should hav a right to own or claim more than he can cultivate, but should leave the rest for others, that all may hav a home and not be ground down under the heel of capital. Then men who cannot receive a fair price for their labor could draw their support from the soil. But instead of this the government claims all the unoccupied land; and when a young man becomes of age the government turns him into the highway and taxes his head, and if he cannot find some man to buy his labor for one-half its value he must rob, steal, or starve. If he picks up a handful of sticks and kindles a fire anywhere on the earth to keep himself from freezing he is liable to be fined and imprisoned for stealing. Thus government nurses rogues and then fines or taxes the people for courts and prisoners to punish them, and is at the same time selling hundreds and thousands of acres to individuals who are introducing into this country the same system that has reduced Ireland to pauperism and starvation. If you feel interest enough in the future welfare of our beloved country to publish this, I would like to send you some statistics on this subject, that should be known to every man who desires the welfare of posterity. Yours, with such sappers, not to say sap-heads, as Comstock. We leave him to the American eagle.

J. HACKER.

Now I will close with some lines of our dear Emerson. It is a poem that has a little puzzled the learned world to get at the bottom meaning of it. I confess I never saw all the latent and the occult, and even the prophetic lurkings in its lines till I saw the nimble way in which Mr. Bennett strikes on his feet, rebounding after every attack that these agents of the Almighty hav put upon him. But, God-ordained as they are, they fail in every assault, while he marches on over every obloquy and every persecution, to greater and greater success. He is as lucky as they are unlucky.

"Early or late the falling rain Arrives in time to swell his grain," and spoil theirs. But here is the Emersonian portrait of Mr. Bennett, delineated a quarter of a century ago.

If the red slayer think he slays,
Or if the slain think he is slain;
They know not well the subtle ways
I keep, and pass, and turn again.

Far, or forgot, to me is near;
Shadow and sunlight are the same;
The vanished gods to me appear,
And one to me are shame and fame.

They reckon ill who leave me out;
When me they fly, I am the wings;
I am the doubter and the doubt,
And I the hymn the Brahmin sings.

To the toast, "Resolution," A. B. Bradford was called upon to respond, and in compliance read the following:

Resolved, That we congratulate our guest, D. M Bennett, on his safe return from his journey round the world, and welcome him back to his family, his business, and his co-operation with us in the great cause of Freethought, free speech, and free men.

Resolved, That we regard the late fining and imprisonment of Mr. Bennett for an alleged violation of the postal laws of the United States, which violation, according to the judgment of the attorney-general and other members of the then President's cabinet, he was not guilty of, as an infamous proceeding on the part of the government—a cover shame—whereby a citizen was punished for one offense on the false and mean pretext of his having committed another. That is to say, Bennett's real offense for which he was fined and sent to prison was not in violating the postal laws, but because he was editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER and offered for sale it and other publications which exposed the unfounded assumptions of the church and clergy and their various conflicting creeds. And the crime was all the more odious and unpardonable because it took away from us as Americans the ground of our former proud boast that, whereas all the governments of Europe, at the dictation of the priesthood, hav for centuries imprisoned men for their honest religious opinions and the expression of them, our purely secular government, recognizing the authority of no priesthood, had never been guilty of such conduct in a single instance. It will now be inscribed on the records of our country's history by the iron pen of truth that during the corrupt and imbecil administration of President Hayes, an arrogant and persecuting church, in order to gratify her hatred of Freethought and of one of its distinguished advocates, had power enough under the perverted forms of law, and under a Constitution which ignores all religions, to use the government of the United States as a tool to drag a citizen away from his family and his lawful business and to send him to prison as a criminal.

Resolved, That while we thus denounce the actions of the church and government in this case as infamous and cowardly, we hav the same words of condemnation for those traitorous "Liberals," falsely so called, who, when the church had Bennett down in prison and were triumphing over him, organized themselvs into a conspiracy to destroy his reputation and his business by imitating the jackals of the jungle, and raking out of their privacy and publishing to the world letters of a strictly confidential character, under the pretense that by so doing they were serving the cause of decency and good morals. In our condemnation of this relentless and unpardonable persecution which has been kept up to the present time, it is very clear, from the history of the past year of Mr. Bennett's life, that the great majority of American Liberals concur.

To the toast, "Illiberal Liberals," J. P. Mendum responded.

To the toast, "Woman and Her Freedom," Charles Bright, of Australia, responded.

To the toast, "Physical Reform," Dr. Juliet H. Severance responded.

To the toast, "Woman and the Ballot-Box," Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage responded.

To the toast, "Modern Martyrs," Mrs. H. S. Lake responded.

To the toast, "The Orphans," G. H. Walser, of Liberal, Mo., responded.

To the toast, "Liberal Work," H. L. Green responded.

To the toast, "Secular Schools," M. Babcock, of St. Johns, Mich., responded.

To the toast, "The Ghost," Dr. T. L. Brown responded.

To the toast, "Liberty of the Press," George Chainey responded.

To the toast, "The Glory of Radicalism," S. P. Putnam responded.

To the toast, "Humanity," Courtlandt Palmer responded.

To the toast, "Liberal Law," T. B. Wakeman responded.

To the toast, "Temperance Reform," J. E. Remsburgh, of Kansas, responded.

To the toast, "The Liberty Bell," W. S. Bell responded.

To the toast, "Liberal Music," Prof. W. F. Peck responded.

To the toast, "Liberal Money," J. W. Truesdell responded.

These were mostly short speeches of some ten minutes, but full of sparkling hits and thoughtful sentiments, which would read extremely well were they correctly reported.

It givs us pleasure to state that though so many toasts were given and responded to in the most happy and brilliant manner, no wine was used. And though the meeting was continued till 1:30 in the morning, every one retired to rest perfectly sober and entirely happy. It was indeed an occasion long to be remembered.

Death of Mrs. Rawson.

Mrs. Emma Taylor Rawson, daughter of Laura Keene, the actress, and wife of A. L. Rawson, died August 23d, and was buried in Greenwood Cemetery on Saturday last, the 26th. Her age was about forty years. She was the mother of three children, the eldest a girl of six and a half years, and a pair of twin boys four or four and a half years. For several years she followed the stage with her talented mother, appearing last before the public in 1873. She was a most estimable woman, and highly beloved by all who knew her. She was reared a Catholic, but became a believer in Rationalism and the Religion of Humanity, in which faith she left the world. She died of consumption, as did her mother and sister, and was buried in the same lot with her mother, her grandmother, her aunt, her sister, and her niece. Truly a worthy woman has gone to her rest.

THE Spiritualists and Liberalists of southern Michigan and northern Indiana will hold their annual reunion and grove-meeting at Schoolcraft, Mich., Friday, September 8, 1882. Excursion trains on all roads at reduced rates. The best speakers are engaged, and everything is being done to make this a very successful meeting.

LIBERALS in Iowa and vicinity should remember the Tama meeting on Sept. 7th, 8th, 9th, and 10th. It promises to be a large gathering, productiv of much good. Hotel rates are reduced, and there will be cheap accommodations for those preferring to camp out.

THE LIBERAL CLUB will be opened for the season, Friday evening, September 1st, at the German Masonic Temple, 220 E. 15th street, by a lecture by Stephen Pearl Andrews, on "The Social Organism."

Home Again.

TO D. M. BENNETT.—BY ETHEL ETHERTON.

Home, home again! How the welcome words
Thrill and tingle in every vein!
Home from a voyage around the world,
Clasping our loved ones' hands again.

We hav scaled the mountains and crossed the seas;
Hav broken bread in the "Faderland;"
Our cheeks been fanned with Italia's breeze,
The kneeling Hindoo hath kissed our hand

We hav bathed in the Jordan's sacred flood,
Seen the sepulcher where Jesus lay;
We hav stood in the Moslem's holy wood,
Heard pilgrim and prophet and priestess pray

We hav traced the source of the mystic Nile,
Been borne on the breast of the Dead-Sea waves;
Hav plucked the shamrock on Erin's isle;
Yea, stood by her patriot-martyrs' graves.

We hav trod old England's kingly soil,
The lair where the lion holds his own,
Still gathering the grain of others' toil,
Grain Ireland in blood and tears hath sown.

We hav seen the cot where a Burns was born;
The hills where a Wallace and Bruce hav trod,
Where at peal of pibroch and twang of horn
Brave warriors leaped from the teeming sod.

We hav seen the splendor of orient morns,
The glory and glint of her sunset scenes;
The weird, wild grandeur of Alpine storms,
Surpassing e'en poets' and prophets' dreams.

And again on our own Pacific strand,
With tropical wonders all aglow,
The rivers sparkling with golden sand,
Fruits sweetest, flowers finest on earth that grow.

But their brilliancy pales as we near our home;
So even the gold-dust scarcely shines:
Our real wealth is of hearts alone,
And home the altar our love enshrines.

Yea, this land to us is the holy land,
The bravest, fairest, by bards e'er sung;
Holds hearts the truest, warm, freest hand,
Its sweetest music our native tongue

Home, home again! How the magic words
Thrill, fill our being with subtil bliss!
Like scent of roses and song of birds;
Aye, heaven is centered in love's warm kiss.

Beautiful in Art and Nature.

BY UNCLE LUTE.

I never saw a pretty flower in bloom
'Mong wildwood scenes, or garden grown,
Blushing at morn, or sweet in evening gloom,
But I would wish it for my own.

I never saw a lovely maiden, sweet,
In modest girlhood's glory dressed,
But quickened pulses of my heart would beat,
And long to fold her to my breast.

I never saw a painted canvas glow
With living products of the art,
But for the genius gratitude would flow,
From spell-bound eyes and sated heart.

I never read a poet's song, or name,
If truthful to his gift divine,
But an enraptured fount my soul became,
And I would wish such power was mine.

As more I see, in nature and in art,
The beautiful, grows a desire
That graces yet may blossom in the heart,
Out-shining dead past's funeral pyre.

Died.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Death has again entered the little fold of Freethought in Paterson, and still another we can ill spare has been taken from amongst us. The late Mr. Alexander Turner, the subject of this notice, was a nativ of Paisley, Scotland, and was by occupation a weaver. About three years ago he came to this country, since which time he has been engaged weaving silk in Paterson. Having held many positions of responsibility at home, he accepted a similar situation in Philadelphia about six weeks ago, where he died after a short illness, August 6th, in the 59th year of his age.

The parents of Mr. Turner being members of the established church of Scotland, he was early taught to believe all the dismal doctrins of that body. But the power which, according to that church, created both, had ill suited them to each other, for as he rose from childhood to manhood he simultaneously emerged from darkness into light, from the silly superstitions taught him in his infancy to the intellectual platform of Freethought.

Mr. Turner was well known and highly respected by all the Freethought party in Glasgow, and not by them only, for, being a warm advocate of co-operation, and always ready to lend a helping hand in any scheme likely to promote the welfare of his fellow-man, he was brought into contact with and esteemed highly by men differing widely from him in religious opinions. None more fondly than he appreciated the weekly visits of the Investigator and TRUTH SEEKER, and after poring over their contents they were duly mailed to friends across the Atlantic.

His remains were brought from Philadelphia and interred here. GEORGE TEMPLETON.

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM
Edited by HORACE SEAVER.
PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.
The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer 3m53

A Short History of the Bible,
Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.
By BRONSON C. KEELER.
Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.
This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.
I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He gives, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts, he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the hygiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so admirably imparted."

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring snch a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an accounnt of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout. Baalbec to Damascus.

Volnme II. embraces visits to Damascns, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volnme IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tonr over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any acconnt of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by retnrn mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Vol. I. or II. mailed on receipt of $2.

A NEW BOOK BY ROBERT G. INGERSOLL,

ENTITLED

BEING

Six Interviews with the Famous Orator on Six Sermons by the Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, of Brooklyn, to which is added

A TALMAGIAN CATECHISM.

Stenographically reported by I. NEWTON BAKER.

Printed in bold, clear type, on heavy, tinted paper, and handsomely bound in muslin, with heavy boards, beveled edges, gilt top, Octavo, 443 pages.

Price, $2.00. Paper Edition from same plates, $1.00.

Those who wish to hav Col. Ingersoll's latest lectures on "Talmagian Theology," will find them here, in full, to gether with many other points necessarily excluded by the limits of a lecture. "The Talmagian Catechism" puts n the form of direct question, the plainest and profoundest inquiries of modern doubt, and answers them according to Talmage and orthodox Christianity. As a piece of satire, with earnest purpose, this production stands alone, and in the literature of Freethought has not its equal.

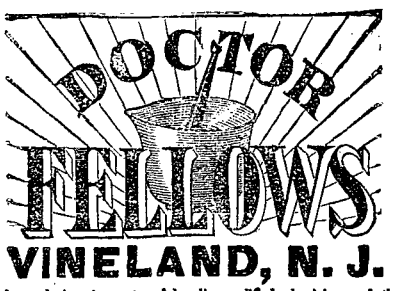
JUST OUT



DEITY ANALYZED AND THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. The singular audacity with which he attacks the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

CONSULT!,

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Lost Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, are thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of these were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, backed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Gems of Thought.

To study, experiment, reason, and learn is man's prerogativ, and the more he learns of nature, its power, and potencies, the less will he hav faith in the marvelous and miraculous. The mysterious becomes simple and plain when the causes producing it are understood and comprehended.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

BE thoroughly persuaded that such and such a doctrin is contained in the Bible, and you will very likely find it there, and in passages whose authors were the farthest possible removed from the doctrins; but go in a spirit of candid inquiry to this oracle of contradictions, and the more you search the more confused and hopeless you become. This must needs be so, for the Bible is made up of the ill-natured compositions of many disagreeing writers, who wrote for times and places, as well as for mental and moral habitudes, very remote from those of ours; and as to the question of the church in the nineteenth century, it is especially at fault, from the notorious fact that the primitiv Christians expected the last judgment and the consummation of all things to come in their own mortal day and generation.—N. E. Waters.

JESUS therefore said unto them again, Verily, verily, I say unto you, I am the door of the sheep. All that came before me are thieves and robbers; but the sheep did not hear them.—John x, 7, 8.

BUT thou who claim'st the keys of God's own heaven,
And who would'st fain usurp the keys of earth—
Thou, leagued with priests and tyrants who hav given
Their hands and pledged their oaths to blight the birth
Of thine own children's rights—for scorn and mirth
One day shall stand, thy juggling falsehoods named,
Thy plots and wiles unmasked, thy heaven-high titles shamed!

—The Church, by C. P. Cranch

I THINK every one, according to which way providence has placed him in, is bound to labor for the public good, or else he has not right to eat.—Locke. If any man will not work, neither let him eat.—St. Paul.

"LET in more light!"—Last words of Goethe.

EXAMPLES of ingratitude check and discourage voluntary beneficence; and in this the mischief of ingratitude consists. Nor is the mischief small; for after all is done that can be done toward providing for the public happiness, by prescribing rules of justice and enforcing the observation of them by penalties or compulsion, much must be left to these offices of kindness, which men remain at liberty to exert or withhold. Now not only the choice of the objects, but the quantity and even the existence of this sort of kindness in the world, depends, in a great measure, upon the return it receives; and this is a consideration of general importance.—Paley's Moral and Political Philosophy

INGRATITUDE is a vice of such enormity that the most profligate man would be ashamed to acknowledge himself guilty of. "Si ingratum dixeris omnia dixeris." If you call a man ungrateful, you hav called him everything that is base; you need say nothing more. The ungrateful man is an enemy to the human race, for his conduct tends to discourage beneficence.—Dr. James Beattie.

BLOW, blow, thou winter wind
Thou art not so unkind
As man's ingratitude;
Thy tooth is not so keen,
Because thou art not seen,
Although thy breath be rude.
Freeze, freeze, thou bitter sky,
That dost not bite so nigh
As benefits forgot;
Though thou the waters warp,
Thy sting is not so sharp
As friend remembered not.

—Shakspere's As You Like It

MR. LOCKE was asked how he had contrived to accumulate a mine of knowledge so rich, yet so extensiv and so deep. He replied that he attributed what little he knew to the not having been ashamed to ask for information; and to the rule he had laid down of conversing with all descriptions of men on those topics chiefly that formed their own peculiar professions or pursuits.—Colton's Lacon.

WHOEVER improves his own nature improves the universe, of which he is a part. He who strives to subdue his evil passions, vile remnants of the old four-footed life, and who cultivates the social affections, he who endeavors to better his condition and to make his children wiser and happier than himself, whatever may be his motivs, he will not hav lived in vain. But if he act thus, not from mere prudence, not in the vain hope of being rewarded in another world, but from a pure sense of duty, as a citizen of nature, as a patriot of the planet on which he dwells, then our philosophy, which once appeared to him so cold and cheerless, will become a religion of the heart and will elevate him to the skies; the virtues which were once for him mere abstract terms will become endowed with life, and will hover round him like guardian angels, conversing with him in his solitude, consoling him in his afflictions, teaching him how to liv and how to die.—Reade's Martyrdom of Man.

NATURE never did betray
The heart that loved her. . . . Therefore let the moon
Shine on thee in thy solitary walk;
And let the misty mountain winds be free
To blow against thee; and in after years,
When these wild ecstasies shall be matured
Into a sober pleasure, when thy mind
Shall be a mansion for all lovely forms,
Thy memory be as a dwelling-place
For all such sounds and harmonies; oh! then,
If solitude, or fear, or pain, or grief
Should be thy portion, with what healing thoughts
Of tender joy wilt thou remember me
And share my exhortations! —Wordsworth.

Odds and Ends.

"YOU advertise that there is a fine stream of water on the place, but I don't see it," remarked a stranger who wanted to rent the place. The landlord said: "Just work that pump handle a little, and you will see a fine stream of water. You don't expect to hav the Niagara Falls on a place for $15 a month, do you?"

A RATHER elderly darkey was inquiring of a policeman if he knew anything of his son Pete. The policeman replied that there was a young darkey in the lock-up for breaking up a meeting with an ax-handle. "Dat's him! Dat's my chile Pete!" exclaimed the overjoyed parent. "He tole me he was gwine to 'muse hisself."

HOW THEY LOOKED.

On the Jefferson avenue line the other day a man with an umbrella and a woman with a basket were the only occupants of a car for several blocks. The man not only stared at her, but rested his umbrella on his chin and took a long look. She was at first nervous, then vexed, and by and by she cried out:

"Why do you stare at me in this rude manner?"

"I am not staring at you to be rude, madam, but simply to study you."

"Well, I want you to stop it.

"Certainly, madam; but I assure you that I was regarding you in the light of a piece of statuary."

"That's all right, sir, and I hav been regarding you in the light of a baboon: but we'll both quit regarding, or one of us will walk the rest of the way home!"

He turned his head and regarded the back end of the horse in the light of a beautiful landscape, but it really didn't seem to satisfy his artistic longings.

JIM WEBSTER is one of the most upright negroes in Austin, and yet he is peculiar. Not long since he brought a large package of coffee to the store of a white neighbor, and said:

"I bought dis coffee at de store ob Mr. Ho'chkins an' I jes know he has cheated me outen more dan a whole pound in de weight. I jes kin feel de lightness. Dar should be ten pounds, an' I'se sho dar's not more 'an eight pounds. He fixed his scales to cheat poor cullud folks what ain't got no sense."

The white neighbor took the package, and, after weighing it carefully on his scales, said:

"You are mistaken, Jim, he has given you a pound and a half too much. There are eleven and a half pounds in the package instead of ten."

"Yer don't say so, boss! I was so sartin dat he was gibben me light weight dat, unbeknownst to him, jes to get eben, I lifted off de shelf a pair ob fine boots, wuff $6, ter balance der account,"

"Well, now you see that he hasn't cheated you; I suppose you will do what is right?"

"You bet I will, boss. I'se gwine right back ter dat store ter do what am right."

"Are you going to return the boots?"

"No, boss. I can't afford to make any such sacrifices as dat. I'se a poor nigger, ef I is honest. I can't afford to make anybody a present ob sich a high-priced pair ob boots, but I'm gwine ter gib him back dat extra pound and a half ob coffee. I admire liberality, I does, an' from now on I'se gwine to do all my tradin' with him, now dat he has worked hisself inter my confidence He shant lose nuffin by my honesty ef I kin help it."

THE BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?
BY
Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogatives of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly advocated.

The strong commendations of the secular press show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

HISTORY
OF THE
CHRISTIAN RELIGION
TO A. D. 200.
By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

Verdict of European Scholars.

The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religio Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupferschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."

One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

Notes and Clippings.

THE old-fashioned preacher used to claim that he had a call to preach. The modern preachers must hear the sound of the salary before he can regard the call.

HE who doth preach in that grand church
Beneath that lofty steeple,
Oft preaches less unto the Lord,
Than for the ears of people.

IN Arkansas some of the preachers save the counterfeit money which pious people deposit in the contribution boxes, and give it to tramps. "The poor ye hav with you always."

AUSTRIAN astronomers now claim to possess the largest refracting telescope in the world—that lately completed at Vienna. The length of this instrument is thirty-three feet and six inches.

A PHILADELPHIA clergyman finds no good in the circus. Yet the lemonade is on the regular Sunday-school picnic style, and the show isn't up to the program. It must be the introduction of animals that he objects to.

DR. SIEMENS calculates that the present annual yield of all the coal mines of the earth would suffice to keep up the fire of the sun, at its present intensity of light and heat, for about the forty-millionth part of a second.

IN a Deadwood church the other day the large congregation were devoutly kneeling in prayer, when an irreverent joker quite audibly whispered, "Here comes an Eastern detectiv." In seventeen seconds all of that congregation, including the chief elder, had slid through the windows.

THE dishonesty of the Christians of Philadelphia is evinced in carrying out the will of Stephen Girard, who expressly stipulated that no theological instruction should be given in the college he founded; but so wholly is this disregarded, it is as thoroughly a theological school as any in the country.

IT is the opinion of the most experienced health authorities in London that the poorer classes of Jews are naturally long lived, and that the dietary and other sanitary regulations prescribed by their religion enable them to battle for a considerable time against unhealthy surroundings.

IT is asserted that prohibition was carried in Iowa through the efforts of the women. They organized associations in nearly every county, and, by diligent and importunate appeals to individual voters, induced a large proportion of those who were languidly opposed to the proposition to support it at the polls.

A REAL-ESTATE dealer advertises in a Dakota newspaper: "I can be found either at the Gold Mine playing 'freeze out,' at Mitchell's Exchange betting on the age of 'old hosses' with Brown, or at my residence on Oak street reading the scriptures." In which way was his time most uselessly expended?

THOMAS MOZLEY recently wrote of Herbert Spencer's system of philosophy as filling "several yards of shelf in most public libraries." The author, apparently shocked by the inaccuracy of the statement, wrote a note declaring that less than two feet was the actual space covered by his thirty years of philosophical work.

A LAWSUIT at Andover, Vt., involves indirectly the right of a public school teacher to read the Bible in school. Farmer Hazelton didn't want his children to hear the scriptures, and so the prudential committee arranged with the teacher to hav devotional exercises a few minutes before school opened each morning, attendance being optional with the pupils. Hazelton informed the committee of his intention to stop the religious exercises entirely. With that end in view, he instructed his children to attend them, and to get up and leave during the reading without the consent of the teacher. This was done, and the children were expelled. The case will go to the court of appeals.

"THOSE people," said the pastor, solemnly, after giving out his text, "who are either too poor or too stingy to afford fly screens at home, are perfectly welcome to sleep in this church every Sunday morning." And then he went on with his sermon, but he preached to the wide-awakest congregation a good man ever looked down upon.

RECENT geological investigations are thought to establish the fact that the eastern part of Kansas, a part of Nebraska, southern Iowa, and northern Missouri were once covered by a fresh-water lake which received numerous rivers and smaller streams from the outlying regions, the turbid waters of which deposited a sediment varying from 150 to a few feet in depth.

A SUIT of interest to people of prayer is threatened at Morris, Conn. A good widow, who was noted for her faith in prayer, was offered ten dollars by an unregenerate man if she would only fetch rain in three days. The next evening it sprinkled lightly, and the widow presented her bill. But the man claimed that the rain wasn't of contract amount, and refused to pay. The widow has brought a suit.

THERE is a good deal of illusion about the rise of the Nile. It seems to be thought that for a few weeks the delta and the valley of the Nile are a lake, and then that they are a muddy swamp. The water of the Nile flows into canals; from thence it is pumped every morning, as long as the rise lasts, into small rills, which permeate the fields, which are thus irrigated every morning. The water evaporates every day, leaving in the evening dry mud. Thus, except in some low-lying districts, there never is an expanse of water or mud.

AN exceptionably sensible bishop is the bishop of Melbourne, Australia, who, when lately asked by some zealous teetotalers in the diocese to denounce publicly the moderate use of spirituous liquors and tobacco, without any hesitation avowed his liberty of action on these points, even though a prelate. "I walk," said he, "my twenty miles a day, for the good of others, and when tired out I take my glass of wine and smoke my pipe of peace." Similarly he refused to denounce the theater indiscriminately; and when recently a deputation requested him to use the prayer for rain, he told them plainly that it would be not only absurd but useless to use such a prayer, as the laws of nature and the causes that control the weather are irrevocably fixed and cannot be changed by prayers. Instead of praying for rain, he recommended judicious irrigation to the petitioners.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK'S opinion confirms or indorses the conclusion long since put forth by some of the most eminent astronomers, namely, that there are now in the solar system, or firmament, many dark bodies—that is, bodies which now emit no light, or comparativly little. He points out, for example, that in the case of Procyon the existence of an invisible body is demonstrated by the movement of the visible star. Another illustration which he cites relates to the notable phenomena presented by Algow, the bright star in the Head of Medusa. This star shines without change for two days and thirteen hours; then, in three hours and a half, dwindles from a star of the second to one of the fourth magnitude; and then, in another three and a half hours, resumes its original brilliancy. According to the view entertained by Prof. Lubbock, these changes must be regarded as indicating the presence of an opaque body, which intercepts at regular intervals a part of the light emitted by Algow.

A SAD picture of life in Ireland is drawn by a correspondent of the Springfield Republican. He declares that no one can conceive how wretchedly poor and destitute human beings can be and liv until he has ridden by cabin and crib and all the nameless shifts for shelter that offend the eye between Glengariff and Killarney. Not one decent home, not one comfortable, tidy dwelling, not one cleanly, well-fed, neat human being did he see. Troops of sad, wan, starved children nearly naked, smeared to the eyes with dirt and ashes, followed him mile after mile plaintivly wailing, "A penny if ye plaze, sur." Men and women with the dull, dead expression of despair in their eyes, waded out to gaze upon him from their cabins and holes in the ground, or between the rocks, literally ankle deep in mud, and clad in such tattered tatters that Lazarus was attired in princely robes in comparison. Deer stood in the fields and birds sat upon the trees, fearless of man, for no Irishman is permitted to hav a gun or to touch bird or beast, even though his family starve before his eyes. In the whole long ride of fifty-four miles he never saw a dog; and he exclaims, "Think of a people too poor to keep a dog!"

MR. ANTHONY COMSTOCK is said to hav been badly euchered in Brooklyn the other day. Keen in his scent for improper doings, he "lighted" upon a person who announced by private and confidential circular that he had some "rare and spicy books" to sell. This was enough for Comstock. Every fiber in his body throbbed with indignation. No such thing could be permitted while he remained above ground or his society still escaped bankruptcy. He explored the post-office. He found out the author of the circular was doing a flourishing business, letters poured into his lock-box daily, and many of them contained remittances. Finally a copy of one of the "spicy" books was secured by strategy. It proved to be made up of clippings from the "funny" columns of the daily newspapers—the wit and wisdom of the professional paragraphists, who, as a general rule, are good fellows—somewhat given, it is true, to the saying of saucy things, and, especially if they come from Jersey, bite like one of their own gigantic musketoes. But there was nothing to cause a blush upon the fairest cheek in all that Comstock found, and he had his labor for his pains. But the pains were severe.—Commercial Advertiser.

STILL ANOTHER!—The following is a special dispatch by a Baltimore, Md., correspondent to the New York Herald: "Quite a sensation was created here to-day (Aug. 30th) by the announcement that Rev. Charles Bentley, an evangelist, who has been attracting immense congregations, had fallen from grace and would be compelled to abandon his ministerial work. Bentley has been assisted in his religious work by Rev. A. D. Jones. Both boarded at the house of a highly respectable family in South Baltimore, and the members of the household were soon among the most devout and zealous attendants at the revivals. One of them, a young lady, quite pretty, who had been married but deserted by her husband, was a regular attendant, and frequently accompanied Mr. Bentley to and from the church. They became great friends, and it was soon whispered around that their friendship would result in a matrimonial match. Some months ago the young evangelist left the city to convert souls in other places. The young lady then became disconsolate and frequently was discovered by her friends weeping bitterly. About a month ago however, the preachers returned to renew their religious work, and were more successful than ever. Nightly the mourner's bench was filled with sinners anxious to giv their hearts to God. A few days ago the youug lady to whom Bentley had been so devoted in his attention became a mother, greatly to the astonishment of her parents, who had no kuowledge whatsoever of their only daughter's shame. In reply to an inquiry the poor girl acknowledged that Rev. Mr. Bentley was the father of her child. The parents, who were greatly incensed over their disgrace, sent for Bentley and demanded satisfaction. He accordingly confessed his guilt. The affair has caused a flutter in social and religious circles.

THE striking iron workers held a meeting last Monday and unanimously voted to continue the strike, many members of the union pledging what property they had to assist the destitute.

ABOUT thirty thousand workingmen paraded the streets of this city last Tuesday, and in the afternoon and evening held a picnic at Elm Park. Many business houses were obliged to close on account of the absence of their men.

COAL is likely to be high-priced this winter. It seems to be a constant effort on the part of the monopolists to make living dear and wages cheap. It was such a course steadily followed for years that led to the French revolution.

THE grossness of the Salvation Army is excitiug disgust in the more sensible portion of the English church people. Locking young men and women up together for an all-night religious spree is not conduciv to morality any more than a Methodist camp-meeting.

THERE is considerable rioting in Dublin, and several constables hav been injured. A gunboat lies ready to shell the city. Five thousand soldiers are quartered in and around the place, and hav been and will be used to quell disturbances which the police cannot subdue.

THE subscribers to the Irish skirmishing fund are suspicious of the honesty and the intentions of the men holding the money, and want an accounting, which they cannot get. A new fund has been started, which will probably benefit nobody so much as the committee that receives it. It is certain that Gladstone will not resign on account of it.

MR. BRADLAUGH has issued a notification to his friends throughout England requesting them to bring all possible pressure to bear upon members of Parliament during the recess with respect to the "constitutional question of Northampton," in view of the possibility of bringing forward the matter during the autumn sitting, when he intends to make another effort to take his seat.

JOE COOK was thrown from an upper to a lower deck of a steamboat on his voyage from Japan to Sydney, hurting his ribs so badly he was obliged to be put in charge of the ship's surgeon. Providence did not take care of him so well as of the Infidel voyager, but his friends will no doubt be gratified to learn that his injuries are not severe enough to prevent his lying as vociferously as ever.

Japan.—A Visit to the Mountains Continued.

JAPANESE FOOD

Is a subject which Miss Bird took not a little pains to inquire into, and, being a woman, she naturally easily learned the modes of cooking and combining. She remarks that the range of Japanese eatables is almost unlimited, though rice, millet, and salt fish constitute the staples with the poorer classes. Over ninety kinds of sea and river fish are used, which are boiled, broiled, and eaten raw—from steaks of bonito and whale down to a minute species, not larger than our minnows. Salmon, cuttle-fish, sea-slugs, etc., are either dried or eaten raw. Eels and other dainties are served with soy (sho-yu), the great Japanese sauce, of a dark-brown color, made from fermented wheat and beans, with salt and vinegar, with a little saké sometimes added to impart flavor. More than a dozen kinds of shellfish are used, including clams, oysters, cockles, etc.

Cranes and storks are luxuries with the rich, and wild duck and goose, pheasant, snipe, heron, woodcock, skylark, quails, and pigeons are eaten by the better classes or those who are able to indulge in them. The believers in Shinto eat more birds, etc., than do the Buddhists who, from their opposition to taking animal life, make less use of animal food. Birds and fowls are usually cooked by boiling.

The variety of vegetables is infinite, but with one or two exceptions they are nearly tasteless, as are also most of the fruits of the country. I have tasted the pears, kept over from last year, and had my eyes been bandaged and I told to guess what I was eating, a pear would have been the last thing I would have thought of. It tasted like a turnip more than a pear, but it was not so good as an average turnip.

Fourteen kinds of beans are grown for food, with peas, buckwheat, Indian corn, potatoes, sweet potatoes, turnips, carrots, lettuce, endive, cucumbers, squash, muskmelons, watermelons, spinach, cabbages, leeks, onions, garlic, chillies (peppers), egg-plant, etc., besides such usual vegetable species as docks, ferns, wild ginger, water pepper, and bamboo shoots (a great delicacy). The bulbs of several kinds of lilies are used, as are also mushrooms. The vegetable, however, which most should be noticed is a mammoth white radish (daikon) raphames sativus. When full grown they are three feet long, and nearly three inches through at the crown. Its taste is much like the ordinary radish, when raw, but the style here is to partly dry and then pickle them for three months in brine, to which rice bran has been added, when to an ordinary Western palate and nasal organ they are one of the most unsavory things in existence. They taste bad and smell worse. I have tried them and know whereof I speak.

Among the fruits of the country are grapes, apples, pears, peaches, apricots, quinces, plums, oranges, strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, etc., but as a rule they are all poor and tasteless. The finest fruit in Japan is said to be the persimmon, or kaki—Diospyrus kaki—a large golden fruit on a beautiful tree. There are many varieties of it. A hard kind is peeled and dried in the sun, when it is nearly as good as a fig. The loquat is good stewed with sugar, especially its large seeds, which taste like peach kernels.

Seaweed is a great article of diet. It is obtained in large quantities on the coasts, where it is thrown upon the beach by the surf; it is gathered, dried, and carried far into the interior. It is boiled, fried, pickled, and eaten raw; it also enters into many of the combinations of pickles, mixtures, soups, etc. Pickles and relishes, as observed, are largely consumed. Cucumbers, egg-plants, and various other vegetables and roots, pickled in brine or the lyes of saké, with or without rice bran, are the main dependence for imparting a relish and giving an appetite.

Among the dishes which the Japanese know nothing of are puddings, tarts, creams, custards, and all combinations in which milk, cream, or butter are essential. They use but little sugar in cooking, though they make a great use of confectionary, such as it is, largely composed of rice flour, made pretty sweet with sugar. It is served up at the tea-houses and eating-houses, especially at night and morning. The best kinds are made in the larger cities, but every village has its confectioner, and the wares are carried around the country in boxes by means of the shoulder sticks, and also by carts. They are gotten up artistically so far as looks are concerned, but in taste they fall considerably behind our candies and sweets.

I have sampled but few cakes made by the natives which I call good, though that they don't make good cakes I will not pretend to say. They are said to have a cake called kasuteira, resembling sponge-cake, which is much in favor and fair in quality.

KAMAKURA.

We passed through the small villages constituting Kanazawa. We saw a humble temple or two, but nothing to justify stopping; we kept on in a northward course a few miles to Kamakura, which was once the capital of Japan, from the last of the twelfth to the middle of the fifteenth century. Here was laid the foundation of that peculiar system of government by the military class, the shoguns, which prevailed up to 1868. The city once covered the plain for miles around, but after being the scene of much warfare and civil contention on the part of the shoguns and big military bodies, it was destroyed by fire and unusual tidal waves from the ocean, which is not far away, and this was four hundred and forty years ago. It was partially rebuilt, and again burnt in 1526. But small fragments of the city are now left, and they are scattered here and there over the old site. It is a noted locality on account of its bloody historical associations. The temples still remain in the vicinity. The first came to was a Shinto temple, erected fourteen years ago in memory of the unfortunate prince Oto-no-miya, who was banished to Kamakura in the seventeenth century, imprisoned in a cavern, and afterward put to death by order of the ill-advised mikado's brother, Tadayoshi. The courtyard of the temple is planted with the beautiful wild cherry-trees for which Japan is greatly noted. Early in April they present a rich and lovely appearance, but unfortunately for me I am two or three weeks too late to witness the bloom. The chapel is built of unpainted wood in pure Shinto style, and is thatched with grass. Behind is the cave where the prince was imprisoned, eighteen feet in diameter and fifteen feet in hight, the roof being on a level with the top of the steps recently built at the entrance. There are tombs of dead mikados and shoguns on the elevations or hills in the close vicinity, but I will not take the time to give their history.

THE TEMPLE OF HACKI-MAN

Is the most important of all the temples around the site of the old city. In front of the wide walk or avenue which leads up to it stands a red torii, which is seen before many thousands of temples in Japan. Hacki-man is one of the old Japanese gods, with whose history I am not familiar, but he seems to have been believed to interest himself with the victories gained by successful combatants in the civil wars which prevailed from two to eight hundred years ago. The temple was constructed in the twentieth century, and in the troubles which befell the city it was partially demolished. A long flight of wide steps leads up to the main temple, which stands in a paved court, and surrounded on all sides by a lower row of buildings, in which are rooms for priests and relics of the past centuries—the sword used by this mikado, the helmet worn by that shogun, and so on. A priest went around with me, and showed these relics, but I was not hugely interested in them. The temple is largely painted red, on a ground of lacquer, and has a glaring, rich, oriental appearance. In the niches in the colonnade alluded to are two images.

The temple was re-erected in 1828, after having been destroyed by fire seven years earlier. It is in what is called the Rio-bu style, with red pillars, beams, and rafters. It is decorated with small pieces of painted carving, chiefly of birds and animals. One of the priests gave me a very small glass of some fluid to drink. I asked him if it was saké, and he nodded in return. I tasted it, but did not like it. I thought a decoction of burnt popcorn and boot-tops, sweetened with the cheapest molasses, with a little whisky added to it, would make as palatable drink. I afterward tasted of a better article here in Yokohama, but I did not like it well enough to swallow very much of it.

Before ascending the wide flight of steps the receptacle for holy water is seen and a building for treasures. By the side of the avenue leading to the temple are rows of beautiful trees, among them three huge willows, claimed to be of great antiquity. Near by are two ponds, where the lotus grows, and in August the beautiful flower is in blossom. I indulged in a wish that this were the blossoming time.

In the vicinity there are several other temples, but it is hardly worth while to describe them in detail. They are mainly connected with the past, and are not very much used now. Over the hill toward the east is a Buddhist temple six or seven hundred years old. In it are seven images of Buddha and his sixteen disciples. There are paintings on the ceilings of phenixes, on gold ground over black lacquer. They are thought to be fine, though much faded. A large wooden sitting image of Ji-zo occupies the altar, gilt over black lacquer. On the wall behind are about four hundred small gilt images of Ji-zo, dating from the tenth century. The site where this temple stands was originally the execution-ground, and went by the name of Ji-goku-ga-yatsu (hell bottom). In the time of Toki-gori a certain Salta was condemned to be beheaded, but the executioner, though he delivered a couple of heavy blows in the right place, found he made no impression on the neck, while the edge of the sword was badly injured. On examination he found that the condemned man carried in his queue a small image of Ji-zo, which had saved his head. He was pardoned, and this temple of Ji-zo was founded on the spot where the miracle occurred. So the Japanese can boast of miracles as well as other folks.

THE DAI-BUTSU.

After looking as much as I could at the several other temples, we moved on toward the village of Hase, along northeastward on the plain, hardly two miles away, and near which stands the celebrated large bronze statue of Buddha called the Dai-Butsu. The towering head is to be seen up among the tree-tops as it is approached. It is one of the most noted of the images of the kind in Japan. A temple stood on the site as early as the eighth century, though the image is believed to be of a much later date. Its age and origin are somewhat involved in doubt. There cannot, however, be any question but that it is a very large and fine image. Tradition has it that after the construction of a similar statue at Nara, the mikado Yoritomo wished to have a similar one in his own capital, but died before he was able to put his plan into execution. One of the ladies of his court undertook to collect funds for the purpose, and in the year 1252 it was cast by a skilful artist, one Go-ro-ye-men. History speaks of two such images. The first, a wooden one, was planned by a priest named Jo-ko, who collected money for it far and wide amongst all classes, and in 1228, in less than two months, the head of the image, twenty-eight feet in circumference, was already in its place, while the temple in which it stood was completed in 1241. This image is said to have represented Amida, and was destroyed by a tempest. The present image is believed to have been erected in 1252. It was inclosed in a large building, one hundred and fifty feet square, the roof of which was supported by sixty-three massive wooden pillars. Many of the stone bases on which it stood still remain. The whole temple and several other buildings were twice destroyed by inundations from the sea in 1369 and 1494, after which it was not rebuilt. The dimensions of the present bronze image are: Hight, 50 feet; circumference, 97 feet; length of face, 8½ feet; width from ear to ear, 18 feet; round white boss on the forehead, 1¼ feet; length of eye, 4 feet; of eyebrow, 4 feet 2 inches; of ear, 6½ feet; of nose, 3¾ feet; width of mouth, 3 feet 2 inches; hight of bump of wisdom, 9½ feet; diameter of bump of wisdom, 4½ feet; curls (of which there are 830), 9½ feet; diameter of curls, 1 foot; length from knee to knee, 35⅔ feet; circumference, 3 feet. The length of the two thumbs as they meet afford room enough for twelve persons to be seated on them. The eyes are of pure gold, and the silver boss in the forehead weighs thirty pounds.

The image is formed by sheets of bronze cast separately, and soldered together and finished off on the outside with chisels. The image is hollow, and inside it is a good-sized chapel, with an altar and the necessary paraphernalia for worship. The image is represented as seated on lotus-flowers, and some of the petals are to be seen both outside and inside. The expression of the image is the peculiar passive, contemplative cast for which the images of Buddha are noted. It is well executed, and presents a really imposing appearance. A movement is said to be on foot to rebuild the temple over it on a magnificent scale, and according to a new design, at a cost of 37,000 yen.

There are many large bronze images of Buddha in Japan, but this is the largest save one in Nara, three or four hundred miles further west, where is one a few feet larger than this, and in the composition of which was blended fourteen hundred pounds of gold, avoirdupois. The daimiyos of the country were called upon to contribute for it such metals as they had to help make the Dai-Butsu, and whatever was so contributed was put into the furnace and melted up. Some of the daimiyos were wealthy and gave their gold, and thus the amount named helped to make up the substance of this big god. I get this information from one who knows.

In a temple at the head of the main street of the village, in a dark room in the rear of the altar, is a standing image of some goddess, which is thirty feet in hight. It is made of camphor wood, gilt on chocolate-colored lacquer, and in the dim light of the candles, which are raised by cords to illuminate it, it presents a strange, weird appearance. It is concealed from public view by a pair of folding doors, but from the 12th to the 18th of March the doors are thrown open. At other times people are admitted, as I was, by a side door. It is several hundred years old, but during all that time it has remained perfectly passive and harmless. There are other temples also in this neighborhood, but they are not remarkable.

FIRST NIGHT IN A JAPANESE HOTEL.

When the temples here were duly inspected it was time to think about quarters for the night, so Tage Ro took me to the principal yadoya, the Japanese name for an inn, or a tea-house where lodgings and meals are furnished. My riki stopped before a two-story building of the character I described in connection with Nagasaka. The entire front was open, and a passageway a few feet in width ran through the center of the building to the rear. This is the domo, or walk on the ground, on either side of which was the usual elevation of wood, eighteen inches high, on which are fastened the neat white straw mats already described. On one side the cooking operations were being conducted, and on the other a portion of the family were seated, engaged at sewing, etc. As soon as I alighted, two or three of the inmates of the house came promptly forward and received me in the most kindly and polite manner. These were the women of the house. They bowed very respectfully, smiled sweetly, and commenced talking in quite an animated manner; but unfortunately I could not understand a word, for which I was truly sorry, as I was anxious to get acquainted and have a good chat. I, however, was well enough posted in Japanese etiquette to know that I must by no means step with my shoes upon their clean, white mats, and I at once slipped them off and left them behind, after which I was shown up-stairs to the room I was to occupy, two or three young damsels following to prepare everything properly for the distinguished guest. The sliding paper-covered frames forming the partitions (fusuma) were at once adjusted, a cloth mat placed in the middle of the floor, which I inferred was for me to sit upon. It was rather a "getting down" for me, but I placed myself upon it like a good little Japanese. Tage Ro brought up from the riki the articles I had with me, and I think he told the people of the place that I had food of my own, and only wished tea. I was sorry for this, for they looked so pleasant and clean that I thought I could eat a Japanese supper, whether it was seaweed, pickled radishes, dried fish, or whatever it might be. Soon one of the smiling young ladies brought in a small polished brass arrangement named a tabako-bon, of the capacity of about six quarts. It was two-thirds filled with ashes; in the center were three pieces of charcoal about the size of hens' eggs; three small iron uprights connected by an iron ring at the top, four inches in diameter and three inches from the live charcoal; on the ring sat a metal tea-kettle, holding a little over a pint, and the steam was coming from the spout like a very small steamboat; and this was set down beside me. Another smiling damsel came in with a bright tray of lacquered wood, on which was a neat porcelain teapot of the capacity of half a pint, and a tiny teacup that held about six tablespoonfuls; also a metal cup having some nice-looking tea in it, with a small lacquered dish, about the size of a saucer, filled with confections and sweetmeats. That was also set down close to me, and I was astute enough to understand that I could make tea just to suit myself, which I proceeded to do, the two young ladies smiling still very sweetly while watching my operations, and two or three other girls coming to help them.

While they were very polite and well behaved it did not occur to me that they were particularly bashful, for they acted much as though we were well acquainted, and had been since we were little boys and girls together. In the absence of anything else to attend to they commenced overhauling my basket of articles. One found the paper of round, hard biscuits and was very much interested with them, and she asked me by pantomine if she might have one. Of course I bowed assent, when she placed it against her forehead and bowed low in thanks. Another girl wanted one, and I bowed yes, and she returned thanks in the same manner by putting it to her forehead and bowing. I inferred that this is the Japanese mode of thanking. One of them found an American apple I purchased in town, for which I gave ten cents, but I saw she wanted the apple, and I readily bowed yes. I think I should have given them anything I had. They laughed heartily over two or three cucumbers they found in my basket, and when they reached the can of butter they looked thunderstruck, as though they had never seen any before. A piece of cheese also filled them with the same bewilderment, and they shook their heads over it. I tried to explain by pantomime what they were and what for. I presume they did not half understand me, but they smiled all the same. When, however, I had made my tea, and began to spread the butter on my bread, and break off and eat a little cheese, they caught the idea and laughed outright. I motioned to them to try some, but they shook their heads and laughed more yet.

I must say for the young ladies they were quite good-looking, though of the Japanese cast of countenance, and had they even been ill-looking, their pleasant manners would have made amends. They were not dark, but nearly as light as American women.

When I had finished my repast it was time for a light, and a Japanese lamp, or andon, was brought in and set close to me. It is constructed of a frame of four delicate lacquered posts two and a half feet high, making a square of eight inches. The upper part is covered with transparent paper, and on one side is a sliding-door, also covered with the same, which moves up as desired to adjust the lamp—an open iron dish, about half the size of a saucer, filled with vegetable oil, with a wick of pith lying in it and coming up above the edge of the iron vessel. The light it gave was small, but by having it close to me I could make out to read a little. A domestic candle was also brought; it was about a fourth of an inch in size, but it gave more light than the lamp, so I utilized it, leaving the lamp to burn all night, which is the intention. I do not think it would take more than a spoonful of oil to supply it all night.

I should observe that when they had sufficently examined my stock of articles the young ladies retired, leaving me to my own contented meditations. I realized that I was among a friendly people, and I felt quite at home, though sitting on the floor was a little out of the usual style. The man of the house came in and tried his best to hold some conversation with me, but we could not make much headway. A young Chinaman also stopped there for the night, and he was also disposed to be sociable, but the impediments were hard to overcome. I did succeed in making them understand that I was from New York, and that was about all.

In due time the quilts were brought in for my bed and spread upon the floor, four or five thicknesses, with another to cover me. The outer and inner shutters were drawn in front, closing me completely in. When I retired, though the room on each side of me was occupied by persons who know nothing about the Christian religion, and there was nothing to prevent the frames to be slid aside at any time, and no fastening of any kind on the doors, and none on the house, I felt perfectly safe and easy, as much so as if I had been in my own house, and my rest was sweet. It is not the custom for these people to lock their houses, and they scarcely know what a lock is. This certainly does not look as though thieves were very troublesome. It would hardly answer to follow that way in New York, or in any American town. Can it be because they have so much more Christianity there than here?

In the morning I found the same geniality on the part of the people of the yadoya, and after trying some of their boiled rice, on which I had placed a dressing of butter and sugar, with fresh tea, made in the same way as on the previous evening, together with some of my own eatables, I was prepared to renew my journey. I found my shoes waiting for me, and that my bill was sixty-five sen, or, in silver, forty-three cents. I felt that the charge was very moderate, and I went on my way rejoicing.

As we left, the family and waiter-girls came forward and bowed a very profound good-bye. When we had got half a mile or more from the yadoya, a lad came running after us with my spectacles, which I had accidently dropped in the room I occupied. I thought it a good deal more than some of our innkeepers in America would do; it showed the inherent kindness of these people. I gave the young man a suitable compensation, but he really seemed loth to accept it, clearly evincing the thought that he had only done his duty and wanted no reward for it.

The morning was pleasant and the landscape lovely. We passed over some pretty country. Among other things that attracted my attention were two cemeteries, where those who had closed their earthly career were placed at rest. Each grave was marked with a thick brown slab of native stone, looking like granite, and upon which characters were cut, doubtless giving the name, age, etc., of those buried there. All the stones are alike, and no effort of one to excel his neighbor is visible. I think this is a characteristic of the Japanese—they are no slaves of fashion; and there are no heart-burnings, none of the spirit of rivalry engendered, from one trying to outdo or outshine another. The tombstones are much nearer together than is common in our country, because of the dead being buried in a sitting instead of recumbent posture.

In course of an hour we reached the sea-shore, the vast Pacific, which both east and south spread away, without an obstruction, for thousands of miles. The riki sinking in the sand, and making the pulling hard, I preferred to walk, as a mile or two of the sandy shore had to be passed over to reach Enoshima, the next point of destination. It was pleasant to walk along on the clean sands of the old Pacific Ocean, on that pleasant morning, picking up seashells and pieces of cuttle-fish bone. I thought to myself, how many there are of my American friends who would like to be here this morning; and how glad I would be here under these genial skies to meet hundreds of them and talk over some of the affairs in our past experience. I think it will not now be very many weeks before I see some of you at all events. The wide Pacific stretches out its five thousand miles between us, but that distance can be traversed in twenty days or less after I leave these shores, so ere long I trust I will be able to set foot on our grand continent. I have seen many fine and interesting countries, but I have seen none that I consider equal to our own loved land, and none that I would feel like taking for a residence in place of my home among you. I look forward with pleasant anticipation toward the time when I will be with you again, only desiring that in your midst I may close my somewhat checkered career, and that some of you at heart may have reason to bear a kind remembrance of me when the struggles and storms of life are over.

As I walk along on this beautiful sea-shore I see scores of men and women wading in the surf which is constantly lashing the sands, gathering up great armfuls of seaweed and bringing it out into heaps beyond the reach of the waves. This is the seaweed which is used for food. It is a semi-transparent, gelatinous substance that seems to have considerable nourishment in it. After being dried it keeps for a long time, and is sent away in large quantities into the interior. I think I saw enough to make a hundred tons of it; and it seems a wonder where such quantities can come from. Much of it has shoots four or six feet in length, two inches wide, and as thick, in its green state, as thin pasteboard. What is unfit for food I think is used as a fertilizer. Vast quantities of it are gathered on this coast in course of the year.

ENOSHIMA,

The next point to be visited, is an elevated body of land, containing some three hundred acres, and it is about three hundred feet above the sea. It is almost an island, but not quite, for it is joined to the main-land by a narrow neck which is dry land save in very high water, when the three hundred acres temporarily become an island. There are probably a thousand people living in the village, which has a torii over the end of the street first entered. It has the appearance of antiquity. There are on the island three temples, dating from the early centuries. These are visited by climbing up a long ascent of hundreds of stone steps, while a stately bell of the most soft and dulcet tones calls the attention of the gods as well as their worshipers. The temples are not extravagantly rich, but doubtless possess to the devotees who flock there, most pious associations. In the village, and at several points on the hill-top, are remarkably fine collections of sea-shells in large variety, which are gathered in the vicinity, as well as brought here for sale from other parts of the coast. I purchased some of them. The place is most remarkable for the cave on the south side next to the sea, where the goddess Benten, one of the favorites of the Japanese, is worshiped. It is a somewhat singular cavern, the floor being nearly down upon a level with the Pacific, the entrance some thirty feet in hight, somewhat less in width, and running back three hundred and seventy-five feet, where stands the shrine of the goddess, behind which the cavern extends as much farther to other and smaller shrines, the passage being lighted with several lamps.

After climbing up to the hight of the island, looking at the different temples and shrines, and the various collections of shells and other natural curiosities, after looking upon the premises of a retired Englishman who has built up a home on the summit of Enoshima, where he can look out at all times upon the eternal Pacific, cultivating around him many plants and flowers, and after stopping at a tea-house near his place and refreshing myself with freshly roasted clams and tea (finding the clams, however, hardly equal to ours in America), I descended long flights of steps to the level of old ocean, climbed around under the shelving rocks, sometimes walking on bridgeways built over the surging and dashing waves, and made my entrance into the dark sanctuary of the celestial Benten, Tage Ro acting as my guide. The goddess named is popularly reckoned as one of "seven deities of good fortune" of the Japanese, though since 1868 three Shinto gods have shared with her the honors of being worshiped in this sacred cave. This goddess is not dependent upon this cave alone for a temple, for at Chi-kubu Shima on the Biwa Lake and on Miya-jima in the Inland Sea she holds seats of worhip. Her full name is Dai-ben-zai-ten, which means the Great Deva of the Reasoning Faculty, but owing to her being regarded as a bestower of riches, the word zai is usually written with a character which means "treasure," and for short the second and fourth syllables of her name only are used. By some she is regarded as the younger sister of Vasu-deva, or Vishnu, showing that she is a member of the Hindoo god family. Another explanation, and probably equally true, is that she is a manifestation of Dai-nichi, Nio-rai, or Vairokana, and confers power, happiness, riches, long life, fame, and reasoning powers. She is represented with four pairs of hands, holding a sword, a spear, an ax, a bow and arrows, a cord for binding the wicked, a long-handled vagra, and a kakra, or "wheel of the law." Her worship was substituted for that of one of the three miraculously begotten maidens who were recognized as daughters of Susano-no-Mikoto. She is held to be very beautiful, though I cannot admire her taste in taking up a residence in this gloomy cavern; but there is no accounting for the tastes of many of these gods and goddesses.

Tradition, which is always getting up very remarkble and improbable stories, says that before the existence of Enoshima that part of the sea now occupied by the cave was inhabited by a dragon who used to devour the children of the neighboring village of Koshigoye, and after they were thus killed they and the parents went away to dwell elsewhere. About the year 540 a violent earthquake took place, and at the same time an Apsaras appeared in the clouds over the spot inhabited by the monster. An island then suddenly rose up out of the sea, upon which the goddess descended, and marrying the monster she was able to bring him under subjection and put an end to his destructive ravages. In later times this Apsaras is said to have revealed himself to Ho-jo Tokimasa, and to have foretold to him the greatness of his descendants, but at the same time threatened that they should lose their power if they misconducted themselves.

Several Japanese urchins were around the mouth of the cave extremely anxious to dive down from the neighboring rocks and bring up sea shells, etc., for a few sen, but it is said that the little rascals have the shells concealed upon their persons, and bring no more up than they take down. I did not give them a job to dive for me.

From the top of the island is a fine outlook over the ocean and all the surrounding country. A fine view of Fuji-yama and his snow-capped summit peering heavenward is obtained in clear weather, but it was thick and cloudy on this occasion, so the grand old fellow hid his face from me.

OFF TO MIYA-NO SHITA.

Leaving Enoshima we made our course through the village of Koshigoye and other villages on westward toward the Tokaido, which is the grand national road of the country, leading from Kioto, the old capital in the west, to Tokio, the present capital in the east. The object was next to visit the warm springs in the mountainous district of Miya-no-Shita, the Saratoga of Japan, a locality to which many resort to be treated by the mineral waters and the hot springs which greatly abound in that vicinity.

I judged this must have been a sort of holiday with the natives, for kite-flying was being conducted by men and boys to an extent I never witnessed before. The air was full of kites of very large size, many of them ten or twelve feet long and two-thirds as wide. They are usually oblong in shape, with two tails. Some, however, were diamond shaped, and some, again, in the form of huge birds with outspread wings. All were fantastically painted, bearing the figures of dragons, animals, and men. Some were flown without any tails at all, the cord which held the kite being attached to the front in not less than fifty places, and uniting in one cord fifty feet or more from the kite. This I had not seen before, and had always supposed the tail indispensable to kite-flying. Among other aerial curiosities I saw what might be regarded as a kind of balloon, it being an oblong rectangular concern, like a box, but made wholly of light paper. It seemed to be filled with gas a little lighter than the atmosphere, for it gently floated along with the current of air, a quarter of a mile from the earth. There were more than a hundred of these large kites in the air at one time, and, with the figures of the fishes spoken of before, the space overhead seemed pretty well occupied.

After reaching the Tokaido the villages were larger and nearer together. In fact, a part of the way it was a continuous town for miles in extent, replete with stores, tea houses, and mechanic shops; and the streets were well filled with lively and pleasant men and women, and active but grave-looking children. The weather had now cleared, and Fuji-yama loomed up before me; and with pleasure I gazed upon its towering, massive, and frosty grandeur. The country is very populous, everybody seemed to be stirring, and all appeared pleasant and cheerful. I must repeat what I have said before, that the Japanese are the most pleasant, genial, good-natured people I have met. I saw much that interested me, but of course it is not to be expected that I can recall or describe everything.

There is a great sameness in the villages. The style of building is very uniform, and one town looks just like another. In the larger towns, however, there is a greater proportion of two-story houses, and the tea houses are larger and finer. In every considerable village is one or two fireproof buildings, called "godowns"—two-story buildings, with heavy stone walls, tile roof, and iron shutters. In these valuable articles are kept where fire cannot reach them, the same as valuables are preserved in the safe deposits in our large cities. Houses here being built of a light, inflammable material, this precaution is necessary.

In making the journey along the Tokaido several streams have to be crossed on bridges, for which a small toll is charged. A line of light stages or spring wagons make daily trips along the Tokaido from Tokio to Kioto, but the horses are rather ill-looking. With the exception of these and a few pack-horses carrying various commodities, I see but a small number of horses or cattle. Occasionally I notice a pack-ox or two. Charcoal is a staple in this country. It is put up in compact bales, something more than two feet in length by fifteen inches thick, round and smooth, and usually made of small wood, retaining its natural shape; that is to say, the coal is in the form of round limbs, and is unbroken. As almost every family uses charcoal to cook and warm by, the aggregate quantity consumed is very great. I see it being transported on the shoulders of men, on horses, on heavy carts, and on oxen. Wood is not very plentiful in this part of the island, and quite small limbs are used for charring. Those who burn wood instead of coal necessarily have much smoke and discomfort. It is singular that so neat a people have not devised some means for conveying smoke from their houses.

I frequently see over the streams mills run by undershot wheels, for freeing rice and barley from the outer skin, which is usually done by pounding with wooden pestles. I have seen no regular grist-mills or mills for making fine flour. Hand mills for coarse grinding are frequently to be seen in the dwellings, but not so often as the large wooden hammers and wooden mortars for cleaning rice. I judge very little flour is made in the country, and little or none is used by the natives, the grains they use being generally boiled and stewed. Their wheat is to a large extent made into macaroni, and the barley is partly used for distilling. No oats or rye are raised and but a small portion of Indian corn. I saw a turning-shop or two, going by simple water-power, where trays and other neat articles are made. They are small and have only two or three men working in them. The women are very industrious. I see many spinning and weaving in their open houses as I pass by. I sometimes see two or three looms going in the same house. I have also seen women out of doors with their weaving, one end of the piece which they were working on fastened around their waists, the other end attached to something else. The goods woven are largely cotton from yarns brought from England. Some silk is also seen, but it is all narrow—fifteen to twenty inches in width. The children are likewise at work at what they are able to perform, at least taking care of the smaller children while their mothers are engaged in other occupations. In the many villages I go through I note but few idlers standing at the corners of the streets watching passers by. Nearly all seem to have something to do and willing to do it. The national drink, saké, is kept in every village, however small, and there is little doubt that too much of it is used, but I have seen no intoxicated persons. This saké is kept and conveyed in tubs, with tight-fitting heads, holding about twenty gallons. I see much of it in transit. Some shops contain thirty or forty of these tubs, and I have good reason to believe that more than enough of it is imbibed. It is, however, not half as strong as whisky, and consequently not as injurious.

Passing in front of a temple perched on a pretty high eminence, and hearing the sound of a drum, accompanied by other noises, I thought I would step up and see what kind of services were being performed. Looking in at the door, I spied a man and a woman kneeling before the altar, and three priests with shorn heads were in attendance—one chanting a litany of some kind, another beating the drum, while the third was playing an accompaniment on a small metallic, ringing instrument which I could not fully understand. What it was all for or about I did not quite learn. Whether the man and woman had done something they ought not to have done, or whether the services were for the benefit of a deceased child, I had no means of knowing.

We continued on the Tokaido, until we neared Miyano-Shita, when we turned to the right up the hill-side, and came to a village where is a fine native high school, the buildings neatly painted, while everything connected with it wore a cheerful appearance. We had then arrived at the end of the journey that could be performed by jin-rik-sha, and the remainder of the road had to be traveled on foot or in a chair. I felt competent to climb the mountain path for two miles, which was yet the distance which separated us from Miyano-Shita, and prepared to address myself to that little piece of exercise, but three coolies seemed anxious that I should ride in their koga, and expressed a desire to carry me up the mountain side. Their charge was one yen twenty, but as business was a little slack, they thought one yen would answer. Being easy to fall in with such propositions, and wishing to reserve my strength and agility for the next day's tramp over the hills, I concluded to gratify them and allow them to carry me.

A koga is a large basket or tray, with a roof to shield from sun and rain, in which one partly lies down and partly sits up. A stout pole runs through the top, like a palanquin, and the whole is carried by two men. Up these mountain defiles three men are employed, the third to take turns with the others, to allow them to take a little breath. After taking my position in the koga I tried to be as light as I could, having a little sympathy for the three men who had to carry my avoirdupois; but I judge from the way that they puffed and perspired that I did not succeed in lessening my 175 pounds very much. They took me over some pretty rough and steep places, but I felt much confidence in their surefootedness, and it was not misplaced, for they made no misstep and did not let me fall. Two would carry me, say on their right shoulders, a distance of five rods, when they would place a bamboo support under the pole of the koga, steadying the same with the hand while they placed the left shoulder under the load; when they made the same distance again the third man placed his shoulder under the burden, and allowed one to rest; and in this way they took turns. They did not go directly behind each other, but one walked on one side of the pathway and one on the other, causing me to be in a quartering position, and when they changed shoulders my position was reversed, so I went up the hill, first the right side ahead and then the left, but the riding was perfectly easy. Tage Ro accompanied me on foot.

We passed several tea gardens, or lands in tea, as well as other crops. When half way up we halted at a tea-house, for those who carried the burden to rest. At length we arrived at Miya-no-Shita, where, in the narrow, steep valley, quite a pretty village, with many stores and half a dozen pleasant hotels, cosily nestles in the gorge, and presents a romantic aspect. The warm springs are close by, and the hot water is brought in in bamboo pipes of considerable size, so the bathing-houses are amply supplied with the warm fluid. My guide took me to the Nara-ya hotel, kept by Heiji Nara-ya, and I found it one of the most agreeable places at which I ever stopped.

I am sure the three burden-bearers were glad to reach the hotel, and, though I could have walked the distance very comfortably, I did not begrudge the yen (really sixty-five cents), and I noticed it did not make me puff and blow nearly so bad to draw it from my pocket as it did them to carry me up the hill; and I think I would much rather give the yen to be thus carried up a steep mountain road than to be one to carry another for the third part of that sum.

My host and hostess are middle-aged people; at all events, they have ten children, the larger portion of whom are grown, and I was charmed by the kind, genial manner in which they received me. The madame came right up to me, making me welcome, brushing the dust from my clothes, and talking steadily, as though I had been a brother who had long been absent but had now returned. I was again sorry I could not talk Japanese, for the father and mother and daughters were so friendly, and seemed so inclined to be sociable, that I really would have been glad to understand them and make them understand me. The mother could speak a few words of English in a very broken manner, while I could not speak a word of their language. Taking off my shoes at the entrance, I was ushered into a very pleasant room in the second story, commanding a fine view of the Miya-no-Shita valley below, the hills opposite, and the flowering trees and shrubs in the surrounding grounds. The shoji, or sliding screens of transparent paper, were pushed aside, allowing me to take in all the beauties of the locality.

A neater apartment I never saw; not a particle of dust or dirt was to be seen; the lacquered wood-work shone like a mirror; the fusima, or sliding partitions between the rooms, were as perfect and clean as though just made; the folding screens were of the same description; and the tatami, or mats on the floor, were as clean as newly-washed linen, if not quite so white. I was shown into the bathing apartment in the lower story, and could not deny myself the luxury of a bath in water warmed by Nature herself. Refreshed by this, I was ready for the beautiful evening meal which the daughters of the host and hostess brought in on the shining zen, a small lacquered stand, a few inches high, holding the tea-pot and other dishes necessary for a small repast; and these were not placed on the floor, for here some European habits are adopted. I was furnished with a chair and table, and at night I had a regular bed, with sheets, on a bedstead. I fear I can hardly give you an idea of the exquisite neatness of the place and the cleanliness of everything pertaining to it. I must recommend to all of you who visit Miya-no-Shita to patronize the Nara-ya hotel. It is an extensive establishment, having over fifty rooms, and all the dirt that can be found in the house could be put in a very small thimble. I was also furnished with a good kerosene lamp, so I could sit and read with as much pleasure as at home. By the bye, I see Devoe's refined oil, in five-gallon cans, almost every place in this country. In Palestine and Egypt Pratts' oil was the kind used, but in this part of the world it is Devoe's altogether—both are sent over in large quantities from America.

A DAY'S RAMBLE.

Early on the following morning, wishing to visit several places on foot, and it being May-day withal, Tage-Ro and myself made a pretty early start, and I was pleased that the weather was most auspicious, being clear, balmy, and delightful. I got pretty weary before night, but I doubt if I ever passed a more pleasant May-day. If my wishes could be answered, I think I would like to live long enough to see twenty-five more such May-days, when I will be willing to "pass in my checks" and "cross over the shining river," become a resident of "summer-land," visit the red man's "happy hunting-ground," the "Western Paradise" of the Chinese, the "Nirvana" of the Buddhists, the "sweet silent sleep of Nature," or almost any other place that it may be convenient to journey to, except it be a Christian heaven or a Christian hell. From going to either of these two I beg to be excused. They are not after my taste. But if, in the natural course of things, it should so turn out that I do not see twenty-five more May-days, I shall not complain, and will go to whatever may be in store for me with little grumbling. I shall feel that I have seen my share of May-days, and that I ought not to complain.

Leaving our charming hotel, with the tall bamboo

staff in hand which the hostess presented me, and with Tage Ro close before or close behind, as the case might be, we passed up through the village by the side of the roaring, dashing stream which comes tumbling down over the rocks, tributaries of hot water pouring into it from the mountain side; and I noticed that several new hotels are being erected, showing that the business of the place is increasing. I hope the new hotels will not detract from the Nara-ya, for I am sure its proprietors are most worthy people.

We passed up the rugged defile, with the rocks on either side, flowering vines and honeysuckles hanging in festoons, evergreens and leafy bowers in abundance; and, what was very grand, numerous cascades and waterfalls, with their rich streams of silver leaping and dashing from lofty hights and mingling their form and spray with the whirling Miyano-Shita, or mountain torrent. Some portions of this picturesque gorge reminded me of Watkins Glen, which has some of the grandest scenery in the world. Indeed there was much that was charming in that morning's walk.

Half an hour brought us to Kiga, a small village quite at the bottom of the valley, where are a few bathing-houses and more hot water rushing from the hill-side and uniting with the mountain stream, the steam from the fervent waters rising freely in the air. The mineral waters here are much celebrated for their medical properties. A temple and shrine stand on an eminence back of the town, and from them we turned our steps up the hill, over toward Ashi-no-yu, some four miles away. The hill is steep and hard to climb, and had any one been there to see, he might have taken me for Christian ascending the hill Difficulty, with his companion Faithful by his side; only I had no heavy load of sin upon my back. I traveled pretty free, and though the morning sun, together with the exercise, was conducive to a free perspiration, I enjoyed it much. The path led us over on to high ground, where extensive clearings were made hundreds of years ago, and the view of the surrounding mountains and valleys was very fine indeed. We looked off upon the side of a high hill which descended toward us three miles away, and saw men cutting wood and burning charcoal. We also met a few others erecting a house. On our upward course I met a Mr. Jourdan, a banker from Hong Kong, now stopping for a few weeks at Ashi-no-yu to be treated by the hot sulphur springs there, for rheumatism, and he informed me that he had been very much improved.

In due time we reached Ashi-no-yu, locate in a broad, pleasant valley, with hills not far away and mountains farther off. Here, as intimated, are hot sulphur springs, from which boils up water too hot to bear the hand in, and smelling so strong of sulphur as to lead one to think that the abode of Old Nick could not be far away. One of the springs is callod Koji-goku, which means "little hill." Comfortable little bathing-houses are built over the springs, or rather where the water is brought in, and convenient hotels and tea-houses are hard by. The water is so charged with sulphur that a white deposit is left upon the sides of the conductor through which it runs, and upon the stones in the stream.

HAKONE LAKE.

The walk from Ashi-no-yu to Hakone is not difficult, and leads through an interesting section of country. After climbing a considerable extent we came to a small lake in a hollow on the right, and on the left a large stone image of Buddha, with a halo in stone, six feet in diameter, around his head. Here a temple once stood, and here the shrine still remains. All along the pathway for half a mile we passed at intervals small stone statues of gods and saints which looked as though they had seen service for centuries. Still further on we passed a small lake on the left, and less than a mile more brought us to the tokaido. Here I met a man carrying by means of a shoulder-stick two heavy bales, which Tage Ro said was tea. While he was resting I walked up and placed my shoulders under the pole to test its weight, and I thought it weighed over a hundred pounds, and concluded I had much rather carry it one rod than ten, which I judged would be to the extent of my ability. This man was carrying his load to Yokohama, forty miles away. I did not envy him the job. Descending the hill I met nearly twenty other men carrying similar bales but in a different way; instead of the shoulder-pole they had a rack or ladder fastened to the shoulders and back, to which were lashed three of those bales, the upper one projecting above and over the head. They were sweating freely, and they had a good right to do so, for I estimated their loads must weigh fully one hundred and fifty pounds. They were climbing a hill of forty degrees, with forty miles still before them. Think of that, ye lovers of the "cup which cheers but does not inebriate," when you sip your fragrant tea which poor fellows have to carry on their backs in such loads a distance of forty or fifty miles! These men seemed more muscular and better developed than many of the Japanese, for as they were nearly naked I had a good opportunity to notice their muscle. Some of them had legs and thighs that even Hercules himself might envy. They carry with them a section of stiff bamboo of the right length, which they frequently place under the foot of the ladder or kind of rack on which the load is lashed, thus bearing the weight and allowing them to rest. I learn they make about fifteen miles a day. I saw two or three pack horses carrying the same kind of bales, and they had two on each side; thus men were absolutely carrying three-fourths as much as horses. Soon after I met five or six other natives in the employ of the government carrying mail, done up in packages, and conveyed by means of the shoulder-pole. They walked rapidly, and as though the loads were heavy.

Descending the hill and looking through a tall growth of the Japanese cedar (cryptomeria), native name singee, a most beautiful tree, with a straight body, 125 feet in hight, beautiful Hakone Lake, a few miles in length and surrounded by grand, picturesque mountains, burst suddenly upon the view. And between two mountains five miles away grand old Fuji-yama, with its vast area of snow, rose majestically before me. It was probably thirty miles away, but did not look to be more than ten. I could see the unevenness in the coating of snow and discern places where the earth shows between the lines of snow. It is too grand a sight to turn away from soon, and I stood and gazed upon it almost with rapture. It made a magnificent background to a grand picture—first Lake Hakone, a beautiful sheet of water, with towering mountains on each side, then a parting of the nearer summits, and there in the distance one of the prettiest and most remarkable mountains on the earth. I looked and meditated, how that perhaps fifty thousand years ago vast floods of lava and volcanic matter had flowed down those steeps, and had built up the grand old pile. I thought how grand it must have been when the old volcano was the most active, to stand where I did and view the grand effect of those internal and eternal fires. I nearly adored its symmetrical grandeur and could not wonder that the superstitious Japs had made a god of it and worshiped it. It is far worthier of being deified and adored than thousands of the gods of man's imagination. Were I here in August when the snow is nearly away I would be glad to be one of a party to climb to its very apex and look down into its extinct crater, where fire, smoke, and fused metals and earth were once thrown up in immense quantities. But at this time of the year, when such bodies of snow cap its summit and come far down its side, a visit to its top is utterly impracticable I can only stand at a distance, look, and admire and worship.

Close by the shores of Lake Hakone stand several religious monuments, or what remains of them. They are columns of hewn stone, standing upon pyramidal bases of square and heavy blocks of stone. I did not learn for what purpose they were erected, but I could see they were very well executed and had cost much labor.

The village of Hakone contains five or ten thousand inhabitants, and is situated at the lower end of the lake. There are also bathing institutions here. It is an old town, and is a place of much resort. We stopped at a tea-house and took some cha and rested our limbs a little while. The next place to visit was O-jigoku, a few miles away, and which is reached by a very rugged, and in some places dangerous, path. Stopping by the side of a mountain brook, not simply a purling or warbling stream, but where the foaming, creamy water dashes from rock to rock, which have been worn smooth by the work of the fluid for ages, we partook of the chow which Tage Ro had brought in the basket, and which with the appetite the tramp had aroused tasted especially good. I thought I had hardly at any time partaken of a meal in a grander place.

After climbing up the rocky steeps and over the verge of the summit, boiling springs of hot sulphur water are reached, and the smell, with the desolate aspect of the arid amphitheater in which O-jigoku is situated, is decidedly suggestive of the infernal regions. The scene is wild and desolate, vegetation gradually decreasing and ceasing entirely in the immediate neighborhood of the sulphur springs which line the side of the unattractive gully. Small streams of discolored water flow down the gorge, and bamboo pipes in plenty are conveying the offensive smelling but medicated water to the bathing establishments below. The name of the place means "hell," and it is not inaptly named.

But after reaching the dividing ridge a view as different in its charms from the scene of desolation left behind as can be well imagined, greets the eye. In the center Fuji-yama towers up in grandeur and beauty. On the extreme right is Kintoki-san, then the Otomi pass and the Fuku-wari pass. To the left is the head of Hakone Lake, behind which are the Hakone Hills, and the still more imposing slopes of Askidaka. Kammuri-gatake, which rises up immediately above the springs, distinguishes itself by its graceful outlines and by the dense woods which cover its sides. Here the small box grows in great abundance.

To return to Miya-no-Shita was a walk of an hour and a half, and though pretty thoroughly wearied, climbing up and down over so many rocks, the natural grandeur of the scenery made full compensation. The country is a rugged one, but the dashing streams, the beautiful cascades, and the lofty rocks by no means stint their charms. When we arrived at our hotel the sun was still two hours high, and I had walked twenty miles, much of the way climbing up and down rocks, much more laborious than level walking. We were glad to rest half an hour and take another cup of cha. Our friends at the hotel were anxious I should remain two or three days, and I would have been glad to do so, but I had two men under pay, and time being limited, I could not think of prolonging my stay. After paying the one and a half yens for the accommodations I had had, Tage Ro and I walked two miles more down to the village, where the riki and other man were. In walking among the simple but pretty wild flowers I gathered some to add to those I had already gathered, and a small boy of about five years, seeing me thus engaged, at once divined that I wished the wild flowers. The little fellow, with the native kindness of disposition, in which these people so abound, gathered a handful of white iris and other flowers, and ran after me nearly a quarter of a mile to give them to me. When he was about to start back I called to him and handed him two copper coins. I had walked on quite a distance when here came the little fellow reaching out another handful of flowers. Of course two more coins had to be forthcoming, but I told him the market was supplied, and if forced, prices must decline; but not being familiar with financial parlance, he set himself about gathering more, and after a little again he came running after me with another handful. I then told him the market was closed, and that as his selections were not of the A No. 1 grade, further offers would be withheld. After giving him one more coin and throwing his gatherings away he comprehended the situation and brought no more.

Reaching the riki, and feeling that I had done walking enough for one day, I was quite willing to take my seat in it, when Tage Ro, apparently none the worse for his mountain jaunt, and his fresh companion trotted off at a good rate, and by the time the evening shades had well set in we were twelve miles on the Takaido, on our return to Yokohama.

In the yadoya which we patronized here I was placed in a rear room, in the ell on the first floor, where the same kind attention was shown me as on the two previous nights; the same little teapot holding one good large cupful, with the spout and the handle at right angles; the tiny cup, the plate of confectioneries, the same paper covered andon, the same sliding partitions and doors, the same clean white mats, and the same soft, padded quilts for a bed; and the same smiles, low bows, and kind attentions were showered upon me. In the morning a part of my breakfast was furnished, and for all this only half a yen—33½ cents—was the bill.

It was the work of the following day to reach Yokohama, and the task was easily accomplished by three o'clock, feeling highly satisfied with the interesting trip I had had. In the middle of the day I stopped at a pretty large town and inspected a noted old Buddhistic temple, with its tank of holy water, its soft-toned bell, its usual paraphernalia of images, altars, incense, etc. I also walked into the crowded cemetery where there was more variety in the tombstones than I had before seen.

I must speak in the highest terms of my riki-man, Tage Ro. He was not only very prompt and efficient before the riki, but also as guide and vallet de chambre as well. He took care of the few effects I had with me, carried them to my room in the evening, and back to the riki in the morning. He brought me warm water in the morning for washing my hands, and looked after all my little wants with the utmost faithfulness. The only drawback was his ignorance of English and my ignorance of Japanese; otherwise I could not ask a better man.

CUSTOM HOUSE EXPERIENCE.

I had shipped to me to Yokohama from London a stereopticon, or magic lantern, with accompanying apparatus, and four or five hundred views of the most noted scenes in the various countries of the world, to show my friends when I return to my own country. I wished to get these out of the custom house to look them over and see if all was right. Of course I did not wish to offer them for sale nor to do anything with them that would in the slightest degree affect the Japanese government. Gen. Van Buren wrote a letter for me to the superintendent of customs, stating these facts, and saying that I would leave on the next steamer for San Francisco, and would take the instrument and apparatus with me. I presented his letter, and at first they talked as though my wishes should be answered, but before I left it was decided that I must pay the regular duties for the two weeks I would remain in the country, the same as if I were going to stay for life. To this decision I submitted and made application in the usual way, to pay the duties, as I wished to examine the goods. But I found that red tape has much to do with affairs in Japan, the same as in our own country. Before I was able to get possession of my goods and everything settled, nearly two days had passed. When, however, I got them I found them all right, and I was pleased. I thought, nevertheless, while I dancing attendance around the custom house, that double as many men are employed as are necessary. The Japanese officials, however, seemed to understand their business, and were as efficient as men of any other nation.

This letter has reached proportions sufficiently extensive and I will draw it to a close.

Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

Japan Continued.

CITY OF TOKIO.

YOKOHAMA, May 19, 1882.

DEAR READERS: In the remaining time I have to spend in "the land of the rising sun," of course it was the most proper thing I could do to visit the capital, the city of Tokio, and also Nikko, one of the holy cities of the empire. I have visited Jerusalem, the holy city of the Jews; the site of Heliopolis, one of the holy cities of the Egyptians; Rome, the holy city of Christians; I passed Mecca, the holy city of the Mussulmans—for no Christian or Infidel can scarcely look upon that city and live; I have seen Benares, the holy city of the Hindoos; I have been near the city of Saranath, the holy city of the Buddhists; and it now becomes a part of my duty to visit Nikko, one of the holy cities of the Japanese.

Tokio, being on the route, was the first place to be reached. On the morning of May 4th I took the railroad train for the capital, which is on the plain of Yedo, eighteen miles east of Yokohama. With the five stops at the different villages along the way, it takes an hour to make the distance. This is the only railroad in the eastern part of Japan, but it is in active operation, a train going each way every seventy-five minutes through the day. It is well constructed; the stations are solidly built, and it seems to be conducted upon the European system throughout. There are three classes among the passengers, the same as in Europe. The first-class coach is finely cushioned and morocco lined, but the rates are high, and but few ride in that class. The second-class seats run lengthwise of the car, one on each side, and are decently fitted up. More people travel in this class than in the first. The third-class coaches are plainly finished, with board seats, uncushioned, with no backs, and placed as they are in our cars. These are largely patronized by the Japanese, who take readily to railroad riding. The prices are respectively 1 yen, 60 sen, and twenty-five sen. It is said the earnings of this road, eighteen miles long, are $8,000,000 per year.

The road runs through a portion of the plain of Yedo, which is ninety miles in length, and very fertile. Here are thousands of acres of barley and wheat, though a large proportion of the ground that can be irrigated is reserved for rice culture. The fields here have the same remarkable freedom from weeds already noted.

The original name of Tokio was Yedo, at which time it was the capital of the shoguns or tycoons, and when the capital of the mikado was at Kioto; but in the revolution of 1868 the mikado removed from Kioto to Yedo, which became the seat of government, and the name was changed to Tokio, meaning western capital. The town is very extensive in size, being nine or ten miles across each way, and containing one million inhabitants. There are a goodly number of tolerably fair looking buildings, constructed after the cheap American and European models, especially in the quarter occupied by foreigners; but the bulk of the town, the native portion, is unassuming and inelegant in style of architecture, the buildings being one or two stories high, and principally of unpainted wood and sometimes of stone, plastered, and some of brick, the roofs mainly of tile. The streets are of good width, some of them decidedly wide, and regular. The city is said to be composed of one hundred and twenty-five villages, so, as may reasonably be supposed, the streets are not laid off through the whole area with regularity and precision; though they are by no means badly arranged. They usually run at right-angles, or approximately so, are not crooked, and are kept pretty clean. They are not paved with stone, but are packed hard with earth and gravel. Sidewalks are not an oriental institution, and they need not be looked for here.

There are a good many canals, or moats, here, which are full at high tide, but empty, muddy, and ill-looking when the tide is out. The lotus plant—the Buddhistic emblem of purity—is largely grown in these canals; the leaves are now abundant, and when in blossom, in August, they must present a beautiful sight. A river of good size runs through the city and empties into the bay.

TEMPLES OF SHIBA.

The time being still rather early when I reached Tokio, and deeming it too soon to call upon our American minister, Judge John A. Bingham, of Ohio, I secured a riki, of which there are twenty-five thousand in the city, and made the young man who had charge of it realize that I wished to look around the city and to visit the most noted temples. He accordingly trotted lively through many streets and to the quarter of the city in the western portion called Shiba. Here were the finest temples, and I found there were more of them than it will be profitable to describe to you. I will say, however, that there are a great number of these temples, some Shinto and some Buddhistic; and many of them blaze with gold, polished lacquer-wood, paintings of dragons, animals, etc., in most brilliant colors. They are mostly large and capacious structures, with tall, heavy, sweeping roofs, running up high, and sharp at the ridges, and concave at the eaves, which project sufficiently to cover a veranda. The timbers which support the roof are painted with vermilion, and partially gilt. The Shinto temples have the torii in front, while the Buddhistic temples have very rich gateways or portals, often of two stories and with heavy projecting tile roofs, the wood-work richly painted and gilt.

The Shinto temples are plainer than the Buddhistic, and though lavishly decorated with shining lacquered wood, they have not so much painting and gilt, not such rich altars, not so much gewgawry. In the large front courts of the temples, some of them containing several acres, are great numbers of what are called lanterns, some of bronze and some of stone. They are eight or ten feet high, with a wide ornamental cap on top, in or below which is a place for a lamp to give light to the dead when they return to earth, as they are supposed to do at stated periods. I judged these bronze lanterns to weigh half a ton each, and the stone ones to weigh from one to two two tons each, with a great amount of work upon them. In some of the larger temple grounds there must be over two hundred of these showy and singular lanterns, which must have cost hundreds of thousands of dollars, contributed by the shoguns, who had in their possession the wealth of the country. The temples in this quarter of the city alone must have cost millions of dollars. I will partially describe one of them.

The temple of Shim-mei, Shinto, dating from the eleventh century, having been plundered, and fallen into decay, was restored in the sixteenth century, was burnt in 1876, and then rebuilt and dedicated to the sun goddess. It is in pure Shinto style, and plain.

The temple of Zo-jo-je, Buddhistic, is near by, including a monastery; built in 1620; destroyed by fire in 1874, and since rebuilt. Here are preserved the mortuary temples of several of the shoguns, whose expensive tombs are near. The inside of this temple is very rich. Passing along a passage filled with cases of Buddhistic books, and up a red and lacquered gallery, one enters the mortuary temple attached to the tombs, and finds himself in a blaze of gold, coloring, and elaborate arabesques, which quite dazzle the eye with their brilliant beauty. Ascending to the altar, which is separated from the antechamber by a bamboo blind, bound with silk, of which there are numbers in various places, and which temper the brilliancy of the other decorations, here are two double-roofed shrines of the most gorgeous gold lacquer, picked out with body-color below the eaves, and held together by costly elaborate metal-work. The one on the right contains a wooden image of the seventh shogun, and the other of the ninth.

On either side of each shrine stand in couples wooden images of the Four Heavenly Kings, who, according to Buddhistic belief, guard the world against the attacks of demons. In front of them are Kwannon and Benten. The back is all gilt, while the altar and two tables in front are of splendid red lacquer. The rich decorations around are too numerous to attempt to describe. Descending into the ante-chamber, the paneling of the ceiling of the oratory is exceedingly rich and the decorations magnificent. Lions and dragons are on the walls. Lacquer boxes on the tables contain portions of the Buddhistic scriptures.

Emerging from the temple, I was conducted by a priest past a colonnade painted with red and gold, and richly adorned with open-work carvings of birds and flowers, and then through a gate, with paintings of Apsaras, or angels, on the ceiling, and out into the middle court, which contains a stone cistern of holy water, and on the left a belfry, the bell in which is rung only on the 12th and 30th of each month. All around this court are arranged in rows over two hundred of the stone and bronze lanterns already mentioned. The gate leading out from this has carved wooden columns, with dragons twisted around them, and which were originally gilt over vermilion.

The tombs of the shoguns whose ashes rest therein are very rich and expensive, in bronze and cut stone; but I will not undertake a description; but several of them are mausoleums worthy the greatest potentate that ever lived. Of the carvings and decorations in the mortuary temple too much can hardly be said. The red wall is divided into compartments, with large gilt medallions of open-work carving representing the peacock and pine, wild duck and sagittaria, and colored squares of chrysanthemums floating on the water, emblems of immortality. In the oratory the spaces between the horizontal beam of the cornice and the lintel are filled with finely painted and gilt wood carvings of white lilies, peonies, etc. The coffered ceiling is decorated with the flying dragon in gold on a dark-blue ground in a medallion on a gilt ground.

In connection with this temple and the several buildings, shrines, etc., are gorgeous gates, gilded walls, gilded paneling, huge gilded pillars, rich lacquer-work, etc., until one becomes wearied with looking at it, regretting that so much treasure should be expended in so useless a cause, and where it benefits needy humanity so little. And what is true of this temple is also true of the several others in the vicinity. One is made sad with the waste of money which might have been employed in making poor people more comfortable and happy. Here is a striking exemplification of the way in which men for hundreds of years have been lavishing their wealth upon gods and religions, and leaving their fellowmen to suffer and die. If man could have been content to do less for the gods and more for himself he would have been very much wiser and happier.

TEMPLE OF KWAN-NO.

The temple of the Chinese goddess by this name—the same as mentioned in my letter from China—probably the most popular deity in Japan, is situated in the part of the city called Asa-kusa. The edifice is of the same character as other Buddhistic temples—the same tall, sweeping, thick, heavy concave roof, with projecting eaves and continued veranda below; the same square hall in the center of the temple; the same high altar and shrine, with a figure of Buddha; the same bronzes, brasses, tablets, banners, and shrines; the same symbols, images, adornments; the same incense-burning and ecclesiastical claptrap. The foundation consists of square stones, on which the uprights rest. These are of elm, and are united at intervals by longitudinal pieces. The great size and enormous weight of the roof arises from the trusses being formed of a heavy frame built upon another heavy frame, and diminishing in size going upward. They are richly painted and ornamented with gold.

In this temple, it is said, fair and festival are kept up the year round. I did not have time to see very much of it, and will be glad to avail myself, in part, of Miss Bird's description: "A broad paved avenue, only open to foot passengers, leads from the street to the grand entrance, a colossal two-storied, double-roofed mon, or gate, painted a rich dull red. On either side of this avenue are lines of booths, which make a brilliant and lavish display of their contents, toy-shops for smoking apparatus, and shops for the sale of ornamental hair-pins predominating. Nearer the gate are booths for the sale of rosaries for prayer, sleeve and bosom idols of brass and wood in small shrines, amulet bags, representations of the jolly-looking Daikoku, the god of wealth (the most popular of the household gods of Japan), shrines, memorial tablets, cheap ex votos, sacred bells, candlesticks, incense-burners, and all the endless and varied articles connected with Buddhistic devotion, public and private. Down a paved passage, on the right there is an artificial river, not over clean, with a bridge formed of one curved stone, from which a flight of steps lead up to a small temple with a magnificent bronze bell. At the entrance were several women praying. In the same direction are two fine bronze Buddhas, seated figures, one with clasped hands, the other holding a lotus, both with the 'light of the world' upon their brows. The grand red gateway into the actual temple courts has an extremely imposing effect. Hundreds of men, women, and children passed to and fro through the gateway in incessant streams, and so they are passing through every daylight hour of every day in the year; thousands becoming tens of thousands on the great festival days, when the mikoski, or sacred car, containing certain symbols of the god, is exhibited, and after sacred mimes and dances have been performed is carried in a magnificent antique procession to the shore and back again. Under each gateway on either side are the Ni-o, or two kings, gigantic figures in flowing robes, one red and with an open mouth, representing the yo, or male principle of Chinese philosophy; the other green, and with the mouth firmly closed, representing in, or female principle. They are hideous creatures, with protruding eyes, and faces and figures distorted and corrupted into a high degree of exaggerated and convulsive action. These figures guard the gates of most of the larger temples, and small prints of them are pasted over the doors of houses to protect them against burglars. Attached to the grating in front were a number of straw sandals, hung up by the people who pray that their limbs may be as muscular as those of the Ni-o. Passing through this gate is reached the temple itself, a building of imposing hight and size, of a dull red color, with a grand roof of heavy iron-gray tiles, with a sweeping curve which gives grace as well as grandeur.

"The timbers and supports are soldid and of great size, but in common with all Japanese temples, whether Buddhist or Shinto, the edifice is entirely of wood. A broad flight of narrow, steep, brass-bound steps lead up to the porch, which is formed by a number of circular pillars supporting a very lofty roof, from which paper lanterns ten feet long are hanging. A gallery runs froms this round the temple, unmatted, and an inner one behind a grating, into which those who chose to pay for the privilege of praying in comparative privacy, or having prayers said for them by priests, can pass. In the outer temple the noise, confusion, and perpetual motion, are bewildering. Crowds on clattering clogs pass in and out; pigeons, of which hundreds live in the porch, fly over your head, and the whirring of their wings mingles with the tinkling of bells, the beating of drums and gongs, the high-pitched drone of the priests, the low murmur of prayers, the rippling laughter of girls, the harsh voices of men, and the general buzz of the multitude. There is very much that is highly grotesque at first sight. Men squat on the floor selling amulets, rosaries, printed prayers, incense sticks, and other wares. Ex votos of all kinds hang on the wall and on the great round pillars. Many of them are rude Japanese pictures. The subject on one is the blowing up of a steamer in the Sumidagawa with the loss of a hundred lives, when the donor was saved by the grace of Kwannon. Numbers of memorials are from people who offered up prayers here, and have been restored to health and wealth. Others are from junk-men whose lives have been in peril. There are scores of men's queues and a few braids of women's hair offered on account of vows or prayers, usually for sick relatives, and among them all, on the left hand, is a large mirror in a gaudily gilt frame, and a framed picture of the P. M. S. China. Above this incongruous collections are splendid wood carvings and frescoes of angels, among which the pigeons find a home free from molestation. Near the entrance there is a superb incense burner in the most massive style of the older bronzes, with a mythical feast rampant upon it, and in high relielf around it the Japanese signs of the Zodiac, the cat, ox, tiger, rabbit, dragon, serpent, horse, goat, monkey, cock, dog, and hog. Clouds of incense rise continually from the perforations round the edge, and a black-toothed woman, who keeps it burning, is perpetually receiving small coins from the worshipers, who then pass on to the front of the altar to pray. The high altar, and indeed all I should regard as properly the temple, are protected by a screen of coarsely-netted iron wire. This holy of holies is full of shrines and gods, gigantic candlesticks, colossal lotuses of gilded silver, offerings, lamps, lacquer, litany books, gongs, drums, bells, and all the mysterious symbols of a faith which is a system of morals and metaphysics to the educated and initiated, and an idolatrous superstition to the masses. In this interior the light was dim, the lamps burned low, the atmosphere was heavy with incense, and amidst its fumes shaven priests in chasubles and stoles moved noiselessly over the soft matting round the high altar on which Kwannon is enshrined, lighting candles, striking bells, and murmuring prayers. In front of the screen is the treasury, a wooden chest, fourteen feet by ten, with a deep slit, into which all the worshipers cast copper coins with a ceaseless clinking sound. There, too, they pray, if that can be called prayer which frequently consists only in repetition of an uncomprehended phrase in a foreign tongue, bowing the head, raising the hands and rubbing them, murmuring a few words, telling beads, clapping the hands, bowing again, and then passing out, or on to another shrine to repeat the same form. Merchants in silk clothing, soldiers in shabby French uniforms, farmers, coolies in 'vile raiment,' mothers, maidens, swells in European clothes, even the Samurai policemen, bow before the Goddess of Mercy. Most of the prayers were offered rapidly, a mere momentary interlude in the gurgle of careless talk, and without a pretense of reverence; but some of the petitioners obviously brought real woes in simple 'faith.' I specially noticed two men in stylish European clothes, who prostrated themselves over and over again, and remained before the altar several minutes, offering low-voiced prayers, with closed eyes, and every sign of genuine earnestness, and several women in obvious distress, probably about sick persons, who offered their prayers with a pleading agony, no less real than that which ascends to 'our Father in heaven' from anguished hearts in England.

"In one shrine there is a large idol, spotted all over with pellets of paper, and hundreds of these are sticking to the wire netting which protects him. A worshiper writes his petition, or, better still, has it written for him by the priest, chews it to a pulp, and spits it at the divinity. If having been well aimed, it passes through the wire and sticks, it is a good omen; if it lodges in the netting, the prayer has probably been unheard. The Ni-o and some of the gods outside the temple are similarly disfigured. On the left there is a shrine with a screen, to the bars of which innumerable prayers have been tied. On the right, accessible to all, sits Binzuru, one of Buddha's original sixteen disciples. His face and appearance have been calm and amiable, with something of the quiet dignity of an elderly country gentleman of the reign of George III., but he is now worn and defaced, and has not much more of eyes, nose, and mouth than the Sphinx, and the polished red lacquer has disappeared from his hands and feet, for Binzuru is a great medicine god, and for centuries sick people have rubbed his face and limbs, and then rubbed their own. A young woman went up to him, rubbed the back of his neck, and then rubbed her own. Then a modest-looking girl, leading an ancient woman with badly inflamed eyelids and paralyzed arms, rubbed his eyelids, and then gently stroked the closed eyelids of the crone. Then a coolie, with a swelled knee, applied himself vigorously to Binzuru's knee, and more gently to his own. Remember, this is the great temple of the populace, and 'not many sick, not many noble, not many mighty' enter its dim, dirty, crowded halls. But the great temple of Kwannon is not the only sight of Asakusa. Outside it are countless shrines and temples; huge-stone Amainu, or heavenly dogs, on rude blocks of stone; large cisterns of stone and bronze, with and without canopies, containing water for the ablutions of the worshipers; cast-iron Amainu on hewn stone pedestals—a recent gift; bronze and silver lanterns; a stone prayer-wheel in a stone post; figures of Buddha, with the serene countenance of one who rests from his labors; stone idols, on which devotees have pasted slips of paper inscribed with prayers, with sticks of incense rising out of the ashes of hundreds of former sticks smouldering before them; blocks of hewn stone with Chinese and Sanskrit inscriptions; an eight-sided temple, in which are figures of the 'five hundred disciples' of Buddha; a temple with the roof and the upper part of the walls richly colored, the circular Shinto mirror in an inner shrine, a bronze treasury outside with a bell, which is rung to attract the god's attention; a striking five-storied pagoda, with much red lacquer, and the ends of the roof-beams very boldly carved; its throne was fringed with wind bells, and its uppermost roof terminating in a graceful copper spiral of great hight, with the 'sacred pearl' surrounded by flames for its final. Near it, as near as most temples, is an upright frame of plain wood with tablets, on which are inscribed the names of donors to the temples, and the amount of their gifts. Among the many shrines is an Inari or Fox temple, fox-worship being one of the most universal superstitions in Japan. The foxes, however, are only the servants of a mythical personage named Uga, to whom is ascribed the honor of the discovery and cultivation of the rice plant. Popularly, however, the honors due to Inari Sama (the name under which Uga was deified) are paid to his servants. Before two gilded foxes in this shrine there was a tray, on which small bowls of rice and foxes in sugar were placed as offerings. Shinto gohei, strips of paper cut and folded in special fashion, and usually attached to a white wand, and supposed to represent the Shinto kami, or gods, who are simply deified heros, were in the same temple, and there were Shinto torii in wood and stone near the entrance.

"There is a handsome stone-floored temple to the southeast of the main building; it is lofty and very richly decorated. In the center is an octagonal revolving room, or rather shrine, of rich red lacquer, most gorgeously ornamented. It rests on a frame of carved black lacquer, and has a lacquer gallery running around it, on which several richly decorated doors open. On the application of several shoulders to this gallery the shrine rotates. It is, in fact, a revolving library of the Buddhist scriptures, and a single turn is equivalent to a single pious perusal of them. It is an exceedingly beautiful specimen of ancient decorative lacquer-work. At the back part of the temple is a draped brass figure of Buddha, with one hand raised—a dignified piece of casting. All the Buddhas have Hindoo features, and the graceful drapery and oriental repose which have been imported from India contrast singularly with the grotesque extravagances of the indigenous Japanese conceptions. In the same temple are four monstrously extravagant figures carved in wood, life size, with clawed toes on their feet, and two great fangs in addition to the teeth in each mouth. The heads of all are surrounded with flames, and are backed by golden circlets. They are extravagantly clothed, in garments which look as though they were agitated by a violent wind; they wear helmets and partial suits of armor, and hold in their right hands something between a monarch's scepter and a priest's staff. They have goggle eyes and open mouths, and their faces are in distorted and exaggerated action. One, painted bright red, tramples on a writhing devil, painted pink, another painted emerald green, tramples on a sea-green devil, an indigo-blue monster tramples on a sky-blue fiend, and a bright pink monster treads under his clawed feet a flesh-colored demon. I cannot give you any idea of the hideousness of their aspect, and was much inclined to sympathize with the more innocent-looking fiends whom they were maltreating. They occur very frequently in Buddhist temples, and are said by some to be assistant torturers to Yemma, the lord of hell, and are called by others 'The Gods of the Four Quarters.'

"The temple grounds are the most extraordinary sight. No English fair in the palmiest days of fairs ever presented such an array of attractions. Behind the temple are archery galleries in numbers, where girls hardly as modest looking as usual, smile and smirk, and bring straw-colored tea in dainty cups, and tasteless sweetmeats on lacquer trays, and smoke their tiny pipes, and offer you bows of slender bamboo strips, two feet long, with rests for the arrows, and tiny cherry-wood arrows, bone tipped, and feathered red, blue, and white, and smilingly, but quite unobtrusively, ask you to try your skill or luck at a target hanging in front of a square drum, flanked by red cushions. A click, a boom, or a hardly audible thud indicate the result. Nearly all the archers were grown-up men, and many of them spend hours at a time at this childish sport. All over the grounds booths with the usual charcoal fire, copper boiler, iron kettle of curious workmanship, tiny cups, fragrant aroma of tea, and winsome, graceful girls invite you to drink and rest, and more solid but less inviting refreshments are to be had. Rows of pretty paper lanterns decorate all the stalls. Then there are photograph galleries, mimic tea gardens, tableaux in which a large number of groups of life-size figures with appropriate scenery are put into motion by a creaking wheel of great size, matted lounges for rest, stands with saucers of rice, beans, and peas for offerings to the gods, the pigeons, and the two sacred horses, Albino ponies, with pink eyes and noses, revoltingly greedy creatures, eating all day long and still craving for more. There are booths for singing and dancing, and under one a professional story-teller was reciting to a densely packed crowd one of the old popular stories of crime. There are booths where for a few sen you may have the pleasure of finding some very ugly and greedy apes, or of watching mangy monkeys who have been taught to prostrate themselves, Japanese fashion. One of the greatest sights is a collection of tableaux, life-size figures, the work of an artist who, after visiting the thirty-three great temples of the Goddess of Mercy, was so impressed by her power and goodness that he created thirty-five groups in order to show his countrymen the benefits of her cultus. These figures are wonderfully true to life and wear real garments. In most of the tableaux the goddess is represented as a lovely and gentle woman—a Madonna, but with divine power. Mr. Griffis, in the "Mikado's Empire," gives an interesting account of each. The two most curious, as representing two articles of the Buddhist faith—future punishment and metempsychosis—are tableaux of a hungry robber appropriating the temple offerings, with a painting near him showing his coming destiny, in which there are devils and a red-hot cart with axles of fire, and one of a man suffering from violent headache, who is directed by Kwannon to the spot where the buried skull which belonged to him in a former state of existence is split open by the root of a tree which is growing through the eye-socket. On removing the root the pain ceases. The catalogue of sights is only half exhausted."

There are temples in many other parts of the city, but a small portion of which I was able to see, but I looked in at a number that I need not name, where I saw the huge lanterns, large brazen images of Buddha, with golden halos over his head, much after the style of the halo around the heads of Jesus and his virgin mother, though I saw none so large as the Dai-butsu at Kamikana. But I was more and more impressed with the ceremonies, the show and glitter of Buddhist temples and worship and that of the same in Catholic cathedrals and churches, the images, the symbols, the incense, the robes and appearance of the numerous priests, and all the paraphernalia, gewgawry, modes of obtaining mercy, the uses of beads, etc., etc., are wonderfully similar.

The Cause in Fargo.

MR. EDITOR: Once more I subscribe to your valuable paper. If you remember I am a three-year-old subscriber, which covered the time of my residence in New York. I left New York and visited my parents in England this last Christmas, when I also attended several meetings of the National Secular Society, and I was particularly struck with the zeal in which this society is performing its work, and feel sure that the Liberals of this country could learn a lesson from them.

I hav recently arrived in Fargo, which is one of the booming towns of the West. I hav been unable to find any Liberal club here, although it has a population of 7,000, and many churches—I guess one church to each thousand. What is the matter with Liberals? Why are they not at work in their towns, at least as soon as Christians? What is the good of their waiting till towns are thoroughly Christianized before Liberals commence their work? So far I hav only been able to meet one Liberal in Fargo—a Mr. Nugent, who was formerly president of a Liberal club in Lansing, Mich. This gentleman possesses rare scholastic acquirements, and seems to be well adapted for advocating, and certainly qualified for defending, Liberalism, but at present he is so much taken up with business, as everybody is in Fargo, that he does not feel inclined to undertake any Liberal work alone; but he certainly would if he had he assistance of some others. If you hav the address of some Liberals in Fargo or vicinity please let me hav them. Hoping that Mr. Bennett's health is remaining good through his travels, I remain,

NEW YORK SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1882.

The Watkins Convention.—Concluded.

The services Saturday, the fourth day of the meeting, after the morning conference was ended, began with an address upon Physical and Social Reform, by Dr. Juliet H. Severance, of Milwaukee. For more than an hour she closely held an attentiv and interested audience. She was followed by John E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kansas, in a finished oration on Thomas Paine. Everybody was pleased with both its matter and manner.

At 2 P.M., J. P. Mendum gave a discourse on Paine Hall, describing the condition of the property, explaining the flourishing condition which it is now in; that the income amounts to nearly two thousand dollars a year more than the interest on the sum due on the hall; and that $38,000 of the stock still remains untaken. It is to be hoped that this will not long be the case, for the stock will be profitable to hold, and it will seem so much better to hav the property entirely free from debt.

J. H. Burnham, of Michigan, followed with one of the ablest discourses of the meeting, upon the Design Argument, and reviewing the strongest points that the advocates of a god or gods are able to present. Some of his points were new and decidedly strong. We shall probably be able ere very long to lay this speech before our readers. Mr. Burnham's address was followed by a short but humorous speech from M. Babcock, of St. Johns, Michigan.

In the evening Mr. S. P. Putnam gave one of his earnest and finished discourses upon the "Glory of Liberalism." This was followed by some brief remarks by the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER upon Egypt, after which he presented some two hundred fine views of Egypt, the "Holy Land," China, and Japan. These views were thrown upon canvas by means of a splendid stereopticon, purchased in London, this being the first time they had been shown in public. The audience claimed to be much edified by them, and the hope was expressed that many audiences over the country may have an opportunity of looking at them.

On Sunday, the fifth and last day, in the morning conference several persons, as usual, made short speeches. Among them were James Tillson, of Elmira; R. Bacon, of Poughkeepsie, and S. D. Moore, of Michigan. The first regular discourse was by Mrs. Matilda Joslyn Gage, upon Woman's Rights and Female Suffrage. She combated the notion that on the theory of humanity women should hold a subordinate position, and she attributed to this notion in Christianity the one great fact of its worthlessness. She called woman the great unpaid laborer of the world, and accused the church of being the great robber of her sex. She claimed that each person should be a revelation to himself, and felt that she was born equal to any human being in the world. The address was an elaborate one, and was rendered with marked ability.

George Chainey was next introduced by the chairman as the formerly "Reverend," but now more than reverend. He gave a very able discourse upon Walt Whitman and "Leaves of Grass." The effort was a masterly one, displaying both oratory and a fine command of language. It was an enthusiastic tribute to one whom the speaker called pre-eminently the poet of to-day and the poet of the future. He called our government as at present a grab-bag for thieves, and said that there never was such a mass of insincerity and hypocrisy in the world as there is now in the church. He gathered some lessons from the book. A grand idea is gathered from its name. We learn from it the unspeakable worth of to-day—our true relation to nature. He thought if there is any God it is his duty to love and serve us, not our duty to love and serve him; and declared that absolute property in land will some day come to be considered in the same light as we now regard absolute property in man. His eulogy of Whitman was of a most fervid character.

The great feature of the afternoon meeting, and perhaps of all the meetings, was the address of the ex-Rev. George C. Miln, of Chicago, who arrived during the previous night. His able discourse was of a finished character, though doubtless considered by some as being not so radical as the most of those which had previously been delivered. Probably the gentleman will still continue to grow in radicalism, and by the time a few more years hav passed by will use more decided expressions with regard to the claims of supernaturalism. We hav not space for his entire discussion, but the following paragraphs are among the best:

"Having quietly withdrawn after ten years' service therein from the Christian ministry and turned my face toward another and, as I think, no less honorable profession, I had anticipated absolute silence on my part touching the old themes of debate. I hav been forced from my retreat, however, by the urgency of your invitations, and will grasp this opportunity of saying some things touching the strength and weakness of that institution in whose service all my young manhood has been expended.

"It is not necessary for radical thinkers to assert the restlessness which at present disturbs the Christian church, for Christian apologists themselves are engaged in making the confession. Andover Seminary has just revealed her "true inwardness" to the world, to the distress of a few denominational watch dogs and to the amusement of mankind at large, while but yesterday Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, one of the most brilliant and vacillating men of this century, set the ecclesiastical world agog by some theological declaration sadly at variance with the standards of orthodoxy he is supposed to support. We cannot fail to notice that the restlessness which pervades the rank and file of the gospel ministry is a poor apology for the orthodoxy of their respective creeds as dispensed to-day. Emasculated dogmatism prevails within the church — indifference and incredulity without. Christian apologists are to-day more troubled with 'fightings within' than by 'fears without.' What time, then, could be more appropriate for a just estimate of the strength and weakness of the church?

"The organized church of modern times presents many features of attractivness and strength, the presence of which accounts for its hold upon public thought despite its manifold weakness. And radical thinkers can be guilty, I think, of no greater folly than to sweepingly deny that the church possesses such elements. For my own part I most sincerely deprecate the wholesale condemnation of ministers and equally deplore undiscriminating denunciation of the church itself.

"These very features which are the boast of the church are the subject of intensest criticism for us. We do not select the weakest points in her armor, but the strongest, and against them direct our shafts.

"For example, the very antiquity of which I hav spoken is undoubtedly in our day an element of weakness Theology, unlike the juice of the grape, does not necessarily improve with age. All the pages of history are full of the story of the church, but every page is stained with blood and horrible with some ecclesiastical atrocity. I do not care to call the long list of horrors laid up against the church, but it must be said that he at least is an optimistic philosopher, who, upon balancing the good and evil achieved by the church, finds the difference in favor of the good."

After the lecture the following resolutions were read by S. P. Putnam, and were unanimously adopted by the meeting.

1. That the discussions in science, the inventions of the mechanica, arts, and the general progress of society in knowledge, refinement, comfort, and good morals which distinguish the present from the past, are the natural outgrowth of the cultivation of the human intellect and freedom in the various departments of inquiry.

2. That the only men in the world who cannot rejoice in the freedom of thought, and whose material interests are prompted by ignorance, are the clergy, who oppose it and its advocates because the spirit of untrammeled research in the field of criticism threatens to destroy the claim they make in behalf of the Bible; that it is a revelation from heaven, plainly and infallibly inspired, and that they are the divinely-commissioned and only authoritativ expounders of its contents. We owe it, however, in justice to the Bible to say that the Bible itself teaches no such doctrin. but that the claim was hoisted by the English clergy at the time of its translation to save their selfish and ambitious ends, since the only passage in it (2 Tim. iii, 1) which served to teach the dogma of plenary inspiration has been correctly rendered by the revised New Testament, and proved to teach that the profitableness of any writing is the test of its inspiration.

3. That the war upon the church, unlike the war upon us, is simply one of unselfishness; that our motto being "Equal rights for all and special favors for none," we now earnestly contend for the right to believe her creeds in all their variety, and contend for the right to reject them; that all we ask under a secular constitution of government, designed to serve the purposes of this world, is that there should be no discrimination made by the law in favor of any class of citizens or on account of their religious opinion, as in the case of the exemption of church property from taxation, and in the employment at the public expense of chaplains to say prayers for the religious gratification of congressmen, soldiers, sailors, and others who may be there.

4. That whereas the church, although a small minority of the people in point of members, exercises her power for evil by dint of her organization and the sleepless vigilance of her agents in watching their chance and carrying out their purposes, we earnestly urge upon the Freethinkers of the United States the duty of associating together in local Leagues, auxiliary to the National Liberal League, for the purpose of defending themselvs against the wiles of the church, and preserving the secularity of the national Constitution. To this end we advise the promotion of Liberal libraries for circulating Liberal books, newspapers, and pamphlets among the people, the encouragement of the monthly paper called Man, and the employment by the National League of a general agent, to be supported by the voluntary, yet monthly, contributions of the local Leagues, and whose duty it shall be to visit and encourage the Leagues, organize new ones. to increase the circulation of Liberal journals, and marshal the hosts of Freethinkers, so that the public may know who they are and what are their opinions and purposes

5. That we scorn to play into the hands of our enemies by any apologetic explanations, defenses, and disavowals on the vile and hackneyed subject of obscenity into which we are treacherously inveigled, believing that, wherever there are Freethinkers at all, they are, almost without exception, remarkable for their intelligence, purity, patriotism. and general excellence of character in all the relations of life. Neither can we condescend to retaliate upon an adversary, as we easily might, by calling the public attention to the statistics of the prisons and penitentiaries of the country, and instituting a comparison between the number of clergymen and church-members on the one hand and Freethinkers on the other who hav forfeited their liberty by forming the criminal class of society.

6. That we. as Liberals of this country, embrace the Spiritualists, Nationalists, Deists, Agnostics, and other classes of thinkers who, although honestly differing from each other in their speculativ opinions, agree in their practical opposition to the encroachments of the church and in preserving the secular character of the national Constitution and laws, and we earnestly urge that they, in their journals and public meetings and efforts of all kinds, try to cultivate mutual respect and consideration as allies in a great moral work, not using their weapons upon each other, but reserving them in all their sharpness for the common enemy.

The following, on "Woman and Her Cause," were also adopted:

Resolved, That having abolished the sovereign rights of kings and priests we believe in the same rights of labor; that it should be the sovereign of the earth; that labor creates the wealth of the world, and the wealth of the world should be justly distributed among those who produce it. We extend our hearty sympathy to those many toilers in our own land and others who do not receive their due reward. We assert that Freethought makes room for industrial liberty. It is churches and theology that hav crushed the masses. It is other worldliness that has made this world a hell to those who earn their bread by the sweat of their face. We believe in the dignity of work, and it is through work that the worship of the future shall be expressed.

Resolved, That we look with favor upon the efforts of the Liberals of the West to found a National Liberal Orphans' Home at Liberal, Mo., and we most heartily recommend the noble enterprise to the earnest consideration of our friends, and solicit their support in aid of the undertaking.

A resolution of condolence with Mrs. Ernstine L. Rose, of London, for the death of her husband, was also adopted. Mrs. Gage gave a comprehensiv sketch of the life of Mrs. Rose and the effectiv labor she performed in America as lecturer and reformer.

The following telegraphic correspondence was read and the reply warmly approved:

To the President of Freethinkers' Convention: All hail the power of Jesus' name. We are building more than one Methodist church for every day in the year, and propose to make it two a day. (Signed) C. C. MCCABE, Secretary Board of Church Extension, M. E. Church.

[REPLY.]

Let us hear less of Jesus' name and see more of his works; build fewer churches and pay your taxes on them like honest men; build better churches, since liberty, science, and humanity will need them one of these days, and won't want to pay too much for repairs. (Signed) T. B. WAKEMAN, Prest. Pro tem. of Freethinkers' Convention.

The evening meeting being the last session was well filled out. As a token of regard a Frethinkers' badge pin was presented by a few friends to Charles Bright, of Australia, whereupon he made a beautiful little speech, expressing his gratitude for the honor thus conferred.

W. S. Bell next delivered one of the best addresses of the Convention, on Christian Morality. We hope to some time be able to lay it before our readers. Mr. Palmer, acting as chairman, introduced Mr. T. B. Wakeman as the person who had most contributed to his, Palmer's conversion, and had taught him constructiv Liberalism. Mr. Wakeman followed with an excellent speech on Science, Liberty, and Humanity, taking for his text the era of man, and showing why our years should cease to date from the era of any mythical god, but rather from the era when man particularly began to set up the revelations of science in place of theological and ecclesiastical superstitions. He urged the general adoption of dating from the year in which Bruno was executed. His speech in other directions was carefully listened to and elicited the warmest approbation.

After Mr. Wakeman's address a resolution was carried, to the effect that the New York Freethinkers' Association hold its next annual meeting at Saratoga Springs. It being found that money enough had not been received to defray all the expenses, some over two hundred dollars were raised by contribution, Courtlandt Palmer very generously giving the sum of fifty dollars.

Omitting many short speeches, made in the difierent meetings of the Convention, as well as various other proceedings, it must be said the adjournment took place in the best of spirits, all feeling that good work had been perfected and much progress made.

Our ride home to New York via the Erie road, on Monday, the 29th, was a most pleasant one. The weather was as lovely as could be asked for, and the almost endless picturesque and pleasant scenery were quite enough to fill an enthusiastic beholder with transports of joy. May we liv to see many such reunions and to enjoy many such beautiful rides.

A Pleasant Sunday Excursion.

On Sunday last, friends William H. Peck, Daniel E. Ryan, and ourselvs, as per agreement, took the 9:45 A.M. steamer, Sam Sloan, for Glen Island, a comparativly new place of pleasure resort at the upper end of the East River, near where it broadens out into Long Island Sound. The ride is one of the most interesting in the world. Passing down the lower portion of the North River, or the Hudson, and rounding at Castle Garden and the Battery into the East River, great numbers of huge ferry-boats, excursion steamers, extensiv piers, vast warehouses, and depots hav a bewildering effect upon the beholder. There is not another harbor in the world equal to New York harbor, and there is not another place on the globe presenting such a water surface surrounded by such cities as New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, and Hoboken, with such a countless number of steamers coming and going in all directions, loaded ships and schooners being towed to their moorings, and hundreds of pleasure craft of all denominations at at a safe distance.

Just about the entrance of the East River on the West Side is always to be seen the greatest amount of shipping to be found at any port in the world, and lying so compactly at the docks that their naked masts look like a dense, tall forest discarded of limbs, foliage, and bark. The great suspension bridge, connecting New York and Brooklyn, which has already cost millions of dollars, is passed under, and which, looking up at the progress made in laying the roadway and floor, we are assured that many months will yet be required to complete. The execution of such an enterprise is an honor to America, and to the age of the world in which we liv.

Passing up for miles between New York and Brooklyn, Wallabout Bay and the Navy Yard on the right, much more of wealth, costly steamers, edifices, warehouses, docks, dry-docks, and all the paraphernalia of commerce, with the continuous life and activity connected with it, and which abounds on both sides of the river, is not easily described. A volume almost would be required in space, and a ready, well-informed writer to do the subject justice. It will not be attempted in this case.

With the numerous pleasure-seekers which embarked at the pier at the foot of Cortlandt street, what we took on at the landing below Fulton street in Brooklyn, and the large accession from Thirty-third street, our steamer was densely packed, with two or three thousand men, women, and children, all fondly seeking a day of recreation and pleasure.

Having a band of Italian musicians on board, the passage up was enlivened with some of the best European and American airs, and a few cents each from the generous passengers paid the bill. We had a fine view of Blackwell's Island and the vast prisons and reformatory establishments it abounds with, the larger of which are capable of providing cells for some thousands of prisoners. These large prison-houses are very suggestiv, and recall unpleasant memories. It is unfortunate that our modern and improved civilization feels the need of depriving so many men of their liberty, and some, even, unjustly. Oh, that justice and morality might more largely prevail!

The insane asylums on Ward's Island are extensiv and imposing edifices, apparently capable of accommodating five thousand patients. This is another sad commentary upon the nature of our civilization. How mournful that such large numbers, in their eagerness to obtain gold and religion, or from improper modes and practices of life, should thus lose their reason and become lunatics and maniacs! It is most sad, too, that even within these stately walls, erected in the professed interest of human welfare, many unfortunate men and women are cruelly and unjustly confined. If a true history of the experiences of the inmates of the vast piles on these two islands for the last quarter of a century could be written, what appalling narrativs would be presented to our gaze! What a record of wrong, misfortune, of heart-breakings, and human agony! But this is a day for the enjoyment of pleasure; let us not indulge in saddening meditations.

We passed very smoothly through "Hell Gate," and saw neither Charon, Typhon, Ahriman, Rackshasas, Ravana, Mephistopheles, Apollyon, Beelzebub, nor "Old Splitfoot." These evil beings have gracefully retired to the shades of oblivion and forgetfulness, and it is to be hoped they will trouble the sons and daughters of men no more.

There are many islands in the upper part of the East River, and to know their names, even, and their history is more than we can boast. Two are called "The Brothers," one is David's Island, which belongs to the government, and is used for military and naval purposes.

Glen Island, the point of our destination, is, as remarked, some eighteen or twenty miles from the Battery, and near where the East River becomes the Sound; and a ride of an hour and a half brought us to its pier. We had passed many scores of steamers, schooners, sloops, and yachts, for the day being pleasant, and a fine breeze stirring, almost everything was afloat, and everybody in pursuit of pleasure.

Glen Island contains from fifty to one hundred acres, largely rocky, thinly covered with soil; and we were surprised to see what a metamorphosis has taken place here within the three years since it has been adopted as a place of popular resort. Mr. John H. Starin, upon the purchase of the Island, has expended some hundreds of thousands of dollars in erecting dining halls, pavilions, concert halls, carousels, bathing houses, towers, pagodas, and all the appliances and auxiliaries of a first-class pleasure resort. An hour or two was very pleasantly passed in strolling over the smooth concrete walks to the various houses and places of interest. The commodious dining hall is one of the largest to be seen, and seemed capable of accommodating a thousand persons. There are also several others of smaller proportions. The facilities for bathing are good and ample, and here sea bathing may be enjoyed without the heavy surf which nearly always prevails at Coney Island, Long Branch, and similar places on the coast.

An interesting feature on the grounds are the pleasant accommodations for family parties and private groups. In the grove assigned to this are numerous tables, large and small, to accommodate parties of three and four up to twenty. Here they unload their baskets, spread their edibles, and take their dinner or lunch in true picnic style. This is a fine place for women and children to be taken to spend a day. The place is entirely orderly and is respectably kept, thus proving offensive to none. We found one steamboat load had preceded us, so two or three thousand persons were there, and every hour after other steamers in the line arrived, bringing many other thousands of those who wished to retire from the city and seek a day of pleasure and rest. Music and the chiming of bells in the pagoda upon our arrival made us welcome.

Here is also a fair collection of animals and birds, including buffaloes, gnus, zebus, deer, bears, 'coons, eagles, vultures, hawks, cranes, pheasants, owls, cockatoos, etc. There is no extra charge for looking at these; and it must be said that the prices for refreshments and amusements are very reasonable. In the artificial pond were swans and a family of seals disporting in the water, and sunning themselvs on the floats.

In a commodious building are several bowling alleys, billiard tables, etc., and it is perhaps enough to make the pious and self-righteous howl in mental anguish to see both men and women here enjoying themselvs rationally in these games on Sunday. To one of ordinary, obtuse mind it seems better than wearing a long, hypocritical face to church. And as there were at least twenty-five thousand persons on the island, with more than a hundred thousand at Coney Island, Rockaway, and other places of Sunday resort, it seems there are many others who think so. To walk around in the pleasant shade, to hear harmonious music, to look at beautiful flowers and statuary, to look upon the river, the sound, and the numerous craft flitting in all directions, cannot be harmful, and should not offend the most fastidious god ever conceived.

After "taking in" all the beauties of Glen Island (including but a small quantity of fluids), we took the steam ferry to the main-land near the noted Neptune House, where we took an omnibus to New Rochelle, nearly two miles away, and a pleasant Westchester town of some six thousand inhabitants, with many charming residences. It was in the program to take dinner at the German hotel there, and this was satisfactorily carried out, mine host setting before us such a meal as no reasonable man could complain of.

This over, our pious proclivities asserted themselvs, and we farther carried out the program by chartering a carriage to convey us two miles north on a pilgrimage to the monument of the ever-to-be-revered Thomas Paine, which was repaired, re-cut, and re dedicated in May, 1881. We found it in perfect good order, looking bright, beautiful, and new. No mutilations hav been made since the repairing, and as the corners were smoothly rounded off, it is far less easy to do than formerly. Thanks to the generous friends who sent in their little contributions for the purpose, Paine's monument is no longer a disgrace to his admirers over the country, and particularly to the sight-seers and desecrators who defaced it. It is now a credit to us all, and is decidedly a beautiful monument to one of the ablest and best of men who ever lived.

Of course, standing there in that sacred inclosure, by the side of that monument, covered with the inscriptions of the choicest quotations from the illustrious author, and there under the shade of those beautiful trees which hav now attained fine proportions, we realized the reverence and gratitude due from all loyal and appreciativ Americans to the memory of Paine. We felt that we were standing on a spot sacred to free thought and mental liberty. We felt that the faithful in our ranks—especially in this vicinity—should every year make a pilgrimage to this place to show our respect for a man who braved the world's frowns and condemnation to speak the words of truth and reason in writing the "Age of Reason." And while standing there by the side of that marble pillar, we resolved ourselvs into a committee of three to recommend this course to our friends and to see that the effort to carry it out be duly made. Were our decision put in the form of words, it would read in this wise:

Resolved, That every year after the year in the era of man, 282, on Decoration Day, the 30th of May, the admirers of Thomas Paine, or as many of them as practical, residing within one hundred and fifty miles of this place, and even at a greater distance, be recommended to make a pilgrimage to this sacred spot to spend the dav in doing honor to the memory of a great and a brave man, in listening to speeches and soul-stirring music, and in recalling to mind the valuable services of him who sacrificed so much to giv physical and mental freedom to his fellow-beings.

The locality is a very favorable one for passing an entire day pleasantly, and should the time come when the friends would choose to take tents along and make a two or three days' stay a la camp-meeting, the place will still be adapted to the purpose.

As pilgrimages are practiced in all parts of the world, and by the believers in all systems of religions, there is no good reason why the admirers of Paine should not once a year meet together to commemorate our great teacher and to strengthen each other in right-thinking and well-doing. Let this matter be not forgotten.

Upon returning to Glen Island we met our old friend Capt. George Loyd, of New Rochelle, and he took us out for a pleasant sail in his yacht Kapp; and after this we found Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., with his new and beautiful yacht "Mascot"—the genius of good luck—in which he evidently takes much pride. We looked around for Eugene, with his yacht "Sadie"—for it must be known that he proudly boasts of a yacht by that name—but he failed to put in an appearance, thereby causing some disappointment.

We arrived home just as the shades of evening were approaching, feeling highly satisfied with the pleasant manner in which the day had been spent, deeming it infinitly better than going to church to hear the old chaffy legends and claims of supernaturalism repeated. We also hoped that on many recurring Decoration Days we may meet at the monument of Paine large numbers of his friends and admirers.

In his sermon last Sunday the theological gymnast and harlequin Talmage, among his usual amount of senseless rubbish, got off the following: "Through the supernatural lens of what I might call a prophoscope dying Jacob looked down through the corridors of the centuries until he saw Christ the center of popular attraction and the greatest being in all the world, so everywhere acknowledged. It was not always so. A picture on the wall of a city, recently exposed by the archæologist, evidences the contempt in which he was held by many in his day. It represents a cross and a donkey nailed to it, and under it the inscription, 'Jesus, the Christ whom the people worship.' The most popular name on earth to-day is the name of Christ. The scoffers hav become the worshipers. Of the twenty most celebrated Infidels of Great Britain in our day, sixteen hav come back to Christ, trying to undo the blackened mischief of their lives." If more bosh and falsehood can be packed into the same number of lines we are considerably mistaken. Instead of there being sixteen celebrated Infidels of Great Britain who hav gone back to Christ there is not one. Where there is a single Infidel who has become a Christian there are hundreds of Christians who hav become unbelievers in theological absurdities. Mr. Talmage is earnestly requested to name the sixteen converted prominent Infidels, and if he fails to do so, all sensible men will justly consider him a common falsifier.

Complimentary.

The Spiritual Offering, a bright and sprightly weekly, has several times spoken very kind words concerning us, both while we were in foreign lands and since our return to our own shores. In the issue for the 2d inst, in introducing a portion of our remarks on the occasion of the reception banquet given us in this city, it speaks as follows, but perhaps too complimentary. We nevertheless appreciate the kindness:

"Next to Col. Ingersoll, D. M. Bennett is to-day probably the most popular among the many distinguished men of marked ability in America, denominated as Liberals. From being the best abused and decidedly the most hated by church bigots and envied by some would-be leaders in the ranks of Liberalism, he has by a most wonderful determination and honesty of purpose, strict adherence and perseverance in a course that he believed to be right, triumphed over his enemies; and now, on his return home, has been accorded fraternal greetings and public receptions such as hav never before been extended to any Freethinker of the world. At the reception tendered him in New York city, where were assembled a host of distinguished men of Freethought principles, he was most enthusiastically greeted."

Charles Bright, of Australia, will speak before the Liberal Club, on 15th street, Friday evening, the 8th inst. on the subject of Evolution. Those who are present will enjoy a rare scientific and oratorical treat.

The next number of the North American Review to be published September 15th, will contain a significant article by H. M. Hyndman, the English Radical leader, on "The Coming Revolution in England;" also an interesting account by Dr. Henry Schliemann of his recent very important discoveries at Ancient Troy.

Lecturing.

TO THE LIBERALS OF WESTERN NEW YORK AND NORTHWESTERN PENNSYLVANIA.

I would like to get opportunities to lecture during this fall in places within a hundred miles of my home. A few evenings since I lectured in my own town, and this is what our local paper, the Cattaraugus Republican, edited by orthodox men, said of my lecture:

"Our townsman, H. L. Green, Esq., delivered an entertaining lecture at the Opera House last Sunday evening. His theme was 'The Religion of Good Deeds,' which was treated from a Liberal standpoint. Mr. Green is a good talker and enters earnestly and enthusiastically into the theme before him. While the Republican can not indorse all Mr. Green's iconoclastic views, we certainly giv him credit for being conscientious in his efforts to demolish what he terms 'religious superstitions.' The lecture was attentivly listened to, and deserving of a larger audience than was present. The proceeds were for the benefit of the fire department."

I will make my terms satisfactory.

H. L. Green.

Communications.

The Watkins Convention.

The Watkins Convention was in every respect a representativ gathering, and will, without doubt, giv a great impetus to Liberal thought. Many aspects of the living questions of the day were adequately discussed. J. E. Remsburg, of Kansas, gave us a fine and noble presentation of the life and services of Thomas Paine, the apostle of liberty. J. P. Mendum spoke in behalf of Paine Hall, that magnificent memorial to the martyr-hero, and which, in spite of every difficulty, must be preserved for liberty. J. H. Burnham, of Michigan, gave a keen and brilliant analysis of the design argument, and showed its logical absurdity. Mrs. Juliet Severance expressed some very valuable ideas concerning physical religion. That brave little woman, Mrs. Lake, delineated the elementary forms of Liberalism and their final unity in the glow of one grand purpose. H. L. Green poured forth a dashing bit of eloquence; a shower of vivid sparks from his pioneer experience. M. Babcock was the Mercutio of the Convention, and flashed his sparkling humor, laden with truth, in the midst of more serious discourses. How he did make the parson's money fly! T. L Brown, the president, knew how to set us all to thinking, and he touched upon the origin of ideas with philosophic grasp and his usual scintillations of elastic "holy spirit." Walser, all the way from Missouri, brought the western breezes and their breathing hope for a broader and better humanity. Matilda Joslyn Gage spoke a thrilling and needed word for the rights of woman. A. B Bradford demonstrated the folly of the church's monstrous demands upon the intellect and heart of the nineteenth century. Dr. Farlin opened the poetic riches of spiritual evolution, and painted to the mind's eye the illuminated pillars of the republic. Courtlandt Palmer surpassed himself in his forcible and splendid burst of oratory, portraying the man era as opposed to the God era. Charles Bright, of Australia, thundered forth one of the culminating addresses of the Convention, the fire and spirit of which made an impression not to be forgotten. The Liberty Bell rang forth his "tintinnabulations" with awakening effect. Prof. Peck moved our Liberal pulses with the genuin music of the future.

Bennett's banquet was a supreme success. It was the flowering forth of a long captivity and arduous travels. It was a noble and heartfelt tribute to a loyal soldier. The pilgrim has received the welcoming honors, and he goes forth to the world and to his future task with the seal of manhood upon his brow.

George Chainey's lecture, "Leaves of Grass," touched the shining hights of the oratory and thought of the occasion. It throbbed with the poetry of to-day. It touched every living issue with a master's hand. It bristled with every reform. There was no half-way work or spirit. All that the world hopes for out of a new and ever-advancing democracy found utterance in this admirable discourse. His criticisms of Walt Whitman were appreciated, and, on the whole, just; though we do not think Walt Whitman is quite so great a poet as Chainey makes him out to be, for, after all, he givs us only "Leaves of Grass." He does not giv us the flowers, the beautiful artistic form and coloring. Is not splendor of form and coloring necessary to supreme art? But the grandeur of Walt Whitman is undeniable, and Chainey's lecture fully voices this grandeur, and it should be heard everywhere by all Liberals as a vivid expression of what is most glorious in our present work.

Mr. Miln's address was simply superb. Its rhetoric was of the highest order. He spoke with the silver tongue of Chrysostom. He was like a flaming spirit in some parts of his discourse, so intense was his dramatic action; yet he was perfectly self-contained, and held the audience spellbound by the deliberateness of his utterance. His attack on the church was skilful, brilliant, and effectiv. Like a veteran and wise general, he counted all the forces of his adversary. He made every allowance. No Christian could hav painted the church with more glowing beauty. All that was best and most beautiful was brought forth with fascinating speech; and then when the church was exhibited in its wondrous and mystical glory, with terrible and incisiv logic the orator struck a giant's blow right at its shining head, and the hollow brilliance fell, and the darkness and horror upon which it rested were revealed. The church was shown to be utterly weak, even at its very best. Its strength was but the outside glare of an awful disease within.

We hav no doubt of Mr. Miln's success upon the stage. He is a born actor. He is full of dramatic movement and vivacity; his vitality is abounding. He has the best elements of success—a powerful and exquisitly-modulated voice, a splendid presence, a fine physique, a world-wide reputation, indomitable pluck, and a magnificent conception of the characters he purposes to interpret. He has studied deep into Shakspere. The subtleties and delicacies, as well as sublimities, of the poet's thought are not hidden from this new aspirant. His conception of Hamlet, while essentially the same as that of all great critics, is yet in some parts so striking and original that it must command the attention of all lovers of dramatic art. We may not agree with him altogether, but the strength and beauty and intense dramatic power of what he seeks to unfold is undeniable. That he has a splendid ideal, and the intellectual and physical vigor to interpret it even to the ordinary theatergoer, will, to my mind, be fully demonstrated.

Mr. Wakeman's lecture was, as usual, the summing up of the Convention's thought and motiv in a profoundly philosophical and also, to our mind, a vividly poetic discourse. It will be published in the Alliance, and the Liberal who does not read it will make a very sad mistake indeed, and lose a glimps into the promised land that will repay him for many a hard day's toil.

Mr. Bennett's illustrated lecture went off quite successfully. It furnishes a pictorial display of his travels, which is very entertaining and instructiv. Those who hav followed the pilgrim in thought should not miss seeing these admirable views.

Finally we must remember the words of Leland, the Napoleon of our Liberal organization, who is taking us over stupendous difficulties. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," and the price of Man is one dollar per year.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Good Word for Chainey.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your reply to the strictures of the nameless "Agnostic" of Boston on Geo. Chainey was very good and right to the point. While one particle of superstition exists, while theology is taught and disseminated, while religion and Christianity curse the world, Chainey, Ingersoll, and Bradlaugh are needed, whether their methods please "Agnostic" and the managers of that impotent Index or not. What would better please the great mass of Christians in this country and England than to hav the voices of these three great iconoclasts silenced? What would giv their dying cause a chance to recuperate and regain a portion of its lost power so quickly as the extermination of Freethought organs and orators? Chainey's lectures are needed, for they are constantly heard and read by those whose eyes are blinded and intellects clouded with the essence of superstition, which is the sum and substance of Christianity. Because "Agnostic" has got out of the woods into the sunlight of science and reason, does he care nothing for those who are unfortunate enough to be in the dark? Is he unwilling that others should gain the mental freedom that he enjoys; or is he one of the managers of that semi-religious Index with a praying editor, and therefore envious of Chainey's success? The mental pabulum found in that insipid organ, which clings to Christ and religion, is like water gruel to beefsteak compared with Chainey's lectures and the contents of those Liberal journals which never had to drop part of their name to gain subscribers. The man who straddles the fence in politics or religion generally lacks backbone, and such are never very successful as leaders, for the man with positiv convictions is the one that wins and gains a following. Chainey is bold, enthusiastic, positiv, and logical; he is doing a more important work than the Index is or ever will, and those who doubt it hav only to observe that a great difference exists between the enmity of Christians toward him and that organ. We know nothing of God and hav no use for religion. All that is needed to make this world a desirable place of residence is simple justice between man and man, and that is what Chainey is trying to demonstrate. When religious persecution ceases, and social ostracism for unbelief is done away with, then will be time enough to ask Chainey to pursue a different course and feed the people with pap a la Index. Until that time, which as yet is not very near, aggressiv warfare must be sustained to prevent the encroachments of religious sects and sectarians, who would mold and shape public opinion in their own narrow channels by force, had they the power. Men will soon learn "how to liv in this world" when the principal part of their time is no longer devoted to trying to get into the next one. First free the mind from every taint of superstition, and draw the attention of man from the supernal regions to the earth below. When that is done, and he no longer creeps and cringes before an imaginary God, he will brace up and take a different view of life. Hoping Chainey will continue to meet with the success that has attended his past efforts, I am yours for death to superstition and every form of mental tyranny, C. SEVERANCE.

Prohibition Run Mad.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: As free discussion is the sifting-screen of the intellect, and THE TRUTH SEEKER the advocate of truth and not error, I beg leave to differ with your correpondent "Liberta," as to an article that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 29th, from the pen of that writer, and headed "Liberalism Run Mad," and which I think should read, "Prohibition Run Mad." I know it is unpopular to differ with those prohibition people, but perhaps not more so than to be an Agnostic; and, as the old adage has it, "one may just as well be hanged for an old sheep as a lamb." Here goes. Liberta starts in by making the wild assertion that "Liberty itself was born of prohibition in that early day when the idea of law, order, and individual right first entered the savage breast of man." Prohibitory nonsense! Liberty was not born of anything, It always existed. It was here before man was to express it. Liberty and prohibition are opposit terms. Ideas do not produce their opposits only when carried to extremes, which makes opposition necessary. Liberty is the order of nature and the birthright of every living being. Prohibition seeks restraint and undertakes to reverse nature's plan of human liberty. Comstock is a prohibitionist as well as a suppressionist. He carried prohibition to its logical conclusion when he laid his slimy fingers upon D. M. Bennett (the noblest man and the greatest light of the nineteenth century), and dragged him to state prison, to be worked for thirteen months like a brute, by the side of thieves and cutthroats. Don't prohibition work nice when carried to its logical conclusion? "Liberta" refers us to "prohibitory provision against murder, treason, larceny, bigamy, incendiarism, swindling, and gambling." Now, I claim, those laws are not strained so as to meet the demands of the prohibitionists in reference to the liquor question. The law punishes crime upon those who break the law, but does not in any sense remove the possibility of crime being committed by stamping out all the causes of crime. We hang for murder, but we cannot remove the whole human family from the man-slayer. We cannot abolish government that none may commit treason, or cease to acquire property that thieves may find nothing to steal. We cannot put all the women beyond the reach of the bigamist, nor do without houses and other buildings that evil-disposed persons may find nothing to burn. We cannot cease to do business because there are swindlers amongst us, neither can we stamp out all the instruments used by the gamblers in their different games to ruin each other.

"Liberta" next makes the sweeping remark that "the use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage causes more than three-fourths of crimes and accidents and more than seven-eighths of the poverty, disease, vice, and wretchedness?"

This is an orthodox lie. I heard it preached from the pulpit fifty years ago. Three-fourths of our criminals are not drunkards. The preachers, the great advocates of prohibition, will run as high in the criminal calendar (according to numbers) as any other class if the truth can be reached. An educated thief is a dangerous man; but must we abolish education in order to get rid of that class of men? Accidents mostly happen upon railroads, steam and other boats, in factories, and around engins attending our industries, and a very few of them can be traced to drunkenness, as claimed by "Liberta." As for poverty and wretchedness, drunkenness does too much, goodness knows; but why magnify its horrors by falsifying to mislead the public? I maintain, without fear of contradiction, that usury causes more poverty and distress, smashes more brains, sends more to untimely graves, and is the indirect cause of more crime than all other causes known to man; but our orthodox ministers and prohibitionists are as silent as death upon this subject, yet it is unnecessary, as our business can be done with a bill of exchange, without borrowing, and our financial system is financial plunder. It sets from two to three hundred thousand American citizens on to the streets annually, and Christian Shylocks scoop in those homes and then tell us whisky does it, while their clerical tools and prohibitionist dupes sing the same song. Christian blacklegs get up corners in wheat, flour, pork, butter, oils, corn, and cotton, as well as money panics, by which honest men are bankrupted by the tens of thousands, causing hunger and want in a land of plenty, driving men to suicide and lunacy; but we are told whisky does it all. Christianity has made the world a gambling hell, and Christian aristocratic usurpers hav got all the nations of honest, industrious people into bondage, holding them down at the point of the bayonet: but our prohibition folks charge it all to whisky, and the people are gulled by it. Now, I must quit; I fear I am encroaching too much upon your good nature as to room and time. I congratulate you upon your safe arrival home to your dear wife and friends. May you liv long and retain the enjoyment of your faculties while life holds out, with an abundance of this world's goods. Many thanks for the splendid letters from the east to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours truly, WALTER SIMONDS.

More of Slade.

The very long minute account given in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Slade the medium's exposure causes me to think over the contradictions of life. I ask myself, Has Slade been really exposed at last? For twenty years he has followed a career that has no parallel in all history for success. When Spiritual phenomena were derided almost out of existence on account of dark seances, Slade stepped forth into the light, doing all the old tricks and some new greater ones in broad daylight. I saw surprise and consternation gathering around those who opposed the thing called Spiritualism, then fear, then hate. Then there came exposures. I was deeply interested, not that I had the slightest belief in a future state, but because of the continued existence of the "humbug of Spiritualism" for so many years in spite of the open, glaring exposures of its mediums. I was in the habit of thinking that "truth crushed to earth rises again," but here was error crushed and recrushed, yet rising again. So I examined carefully the exposures and concluded they did not amount to much. Then came more wonderful accounts of phenomena through Slade, and still more exposures. Finally, after investigating the exposures and finding them more unsatisfactory than the tricks themselvs, I concluded to go and call on Slade suddenly some day without letting anyone know about it. I reached New York, where no one knew me that I was aware of, and visited Slade one afternoon. He had just moved into the house, and things were in confusion. The person who came to the door told me that he could not see me at first on this account. A voice from above called out to know "who was there." The door-opener replied, "A gentleman to hav a seance," or some such words. The voice said, "Let him come up." I went up and met a feeble-looking, mild-mannered man, who bade me enter a door just at the head of the stairs. I did so and was in a room perphaps 24x10 feet in size. The man turned around facing me; the room was light, the time about 2 P.M., November; the sun shining, window blinds all up. As he turned to me, just as I had gotten midway into the room, none but ourselves visibly present, he asked me what kind of a seance I wanted—was it medical aid or his services as a doctor? I replied that I wanted what was called a "spiritual seance," and we both laughed. He said something briefly, and stood perhaps five feet from me, but my attention was taken up with a very singular occurrence just as he began to speak. It was this: something like a hand caught my right sleeve and jerked it, and as soon as I looked at the sleeve the left one was taken in the same way, just as if some one had taken it in his fingers and pulled it. I saw the cloth pinched up as though held by invisible fingers, and I saw it pulled out from the wrist; then it began on the right sleeve again, and as soon as I looked it began on the pants, down where the pants join the boot on the right leg, and then passed over to the left. I observed the cloth of the pantaloons to be pinched together. I said to myself, "This is perhaps some trick, and a good one too." Then the hands, still invisible, took hold of one of mine. All this occurred in two seconds, and while Slade was offering me a seat, or rather was asking me to sit down. When the hand took hold of mine I said to myself, "This is something like the big things we read of—this is a good thing." I had lately seen the Davenports so thoroughly exposed that I had lost all confidence in the genuinness of the phenomena, and had come to see Slade in a frame of mind little disposed to credit anything I might see. I sat down, saying nothing to Slade about my feeling anything touch me. No sooner had I sat down than seeming hands repeatedly clasped mine, large and small hands, but no sooner did the idea present itself to me to grasp them tightly than they let go. Evidently the movers of the hands knew my mind sooner than my hands could obey it. The hands would rest confidingly in mine so long as I was content to hold and lightly press them, but evidently the owners did not desire me to imprison them. Finally one came and clasped my hand tightly and I returned the clasp. No effort seemed made by it to withdraw. I held tightly, and noticed that my hand was evidently around some invisible material. The hand, after pulling and shaking a little, seemed to melt away. All of these hands felt like healthy human ones, but perhaps a little cooler than the average human hand.

Now I do not intend to go on and tell you minutely all that occurred. About everything of the kind that usually occurs as reported at Slade's seances happened, except visible materializations. Slate writing, bell ringing, accordion playing, table moving, etc., etc., all happened. But the point I make is this—that I held the slate alone, after thoroughly cleaning it off; held it on my head and close to and under the table; yet though Slade was so far from me he had to reach as far as he could to put the slate into my hand, I reaching also as far as I could to take hold of it, the writing took place every time I held it on my head or under the table, and the names of deceased relativs, certainly never heard by Slade, were signed to the communications. The communications amounted to nothing—the usual twaddle and nonsense. My grandmother had certainly become a most angelic fool to giv me a no more satisfactory message. Then, again, although Slade seemed to try to hold the accordion, it was violently jerked from him on to the floor, and he cried out, "Don't do that, you'll break the instrument," and I remember thinking he was very careful of his old ragged accordion, yet I took hold of it, saying, "Let me see if I can hold it." So I sat down holding it tightly in one hand, bracing my wrist with my other hand, with the keys toward me. The other end of the instrument was grasped and violently pulled and pushed with great rapidity, while the keys rose and fell so as to play "Home, Sweet Home." After the tune was played through and it was beginning to go through it again I silently requested the tune "Hail Columbia" to be played. I continued to silently repeat the request over and over again, and that tune was then begun and played through. I remarked to Slade, "I think I will hav to charge you for this seance, for I seem to do it all." He replied, "You of all men ought to be best satisfied, for nearly always I hav to touch the table or hold the slate or instrument." "Then," said I, "do you believe it is because I am a medium?" "No," he replied. "It is because your friends are determined to convince you. You hav investigated earnestly. You hav long thought of coming here, and they were prepared." Then he said: "But you can settle the question if you are mediumistic; go to the table and put your hand on it, and see if it will come up as you raise your hand." I did so, while he cried "Up, up;" but no result. Then he came and placed his hands on it calling to me to notice how far he stood off from the table; and, raising his hands, the table followed up some three feet.

When I came home I read in the New York Sun of a great exposure of Slade that happened a week or so later. Some people came to me and said what a pity Slade had been exposed. I asked myself how it was possible to expose him in such matters as I had experienced. Since then I hav read of his being exposed repeatedly. In one case he was exposed and arrested while in London, and came near to being put into the penitentiary on account of his being detected. After that he went to Leipsig, Germany, where the famous Zollner and three other learned and famous professors investigated in broad daylight at various times during a whole month. Incredible and impossible things occurred. Not only was the invisible made visible, but the visble and tangible tables and chairs were made invisible and intangible. Impossible knots were tied, and solid rings of wood were placed around the stems of stands whose tops and bottoms are much larger than the rings. The knots and rings are there to-day with the living witnesses to swear to the facts. Some of the most expert slight-of-hand men in the world hav witnessed these performances of Slade's, and do confess they cannot understand them to be connected with the illusions of their profession. Meanwhile, if we believe anything, we must believe that there are some little children, and some very simple, ignorant old women who do the same kind of works that Slade does. Is it possible that Slade and these old ladies and children hav learned an art more delusiv than the necromancers at which they are expert enough to deceive the Boscoes and Haydens of the profession? Singular thoughts crowd on my mind while reflecting over these exposures of Slade. Had it not been that so many great and famous men hav been deceived by such men as Slade equally with myself, I would be very shy of expressing the fact that I also hav been fooled.

But will some one please explain to me how he did those tricks I hav described? How did he do the hands? How did he do the slate writing? How did he play the accordion? How did he get the names of my friends? for I will swear that I neither gave my own nor my friends' names to him. Will some one please expose this to me? CLARKE IRVINE.

Were the Jews in Egypt?

Much uncertainty seems to envelop the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt. In Genesis xv, 13, we read: "Thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, ... and they shall afflict them four hundred years." And in Acts vii, 6, this is repeated. Exodos xii, 40, and Gal. iii, 17, would appear to fix the period at four hundred and thirty years; while the chronology of King James's version makes it two hundred and fifteen years.

Josephus says (Antiquities, Book 2, chap. iv): "They left Egypt in the month Xanthicus, on the fifteenth day of the lunar month, four hundred and thirty years after our father Abraham came into Canaan, but two hundred and fifteen years only after Jacob removed into Egypt." This would settle the matter if Josephus's testimony was conclusiv, but experience has taught us to accept Josephus's statements with a large grain of allowance.

The real question at issue is not "How long were the Jews in Egypt?" but "Were they in Egypt at all?" Moses, the putativ author of the story of the sojourn in Egypt, omits to state under which Pharaoh the transactions recorded took place; but it is stated, Gen. xlvii, 2, that "Joseph placed his father and his brethren . . . . in the land of Rameses." And in Ex. xii, 37, it is stated: "And the children of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth," by which it would appear that Rameses was the name of the particular part of Egypt which the children of Israel inhabited. But in Ex. i, 2, we read: "And they built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithon and Raamses," which would indicate that the Israelites originated the name Rameses. How far these allusions tend to confirm the conjecture that Rameses was the reigning sovereign in the time of Joseph must be a matter of opinion. According to Bible chronology Israel journeyed into Egypt in 1706 B.C.; but according to Manetho this was during the reign of the kings of the seventeenth dynasty, and Rameses I. did not reign till four hundred years later.

If the Jews occupied Egypt at all, some account of it should appear in the records of that country, as well as in the records of the Jews themselvs. Unfortunately the material at our command is very limited, and so far has thrown no light on the subject. Josephus, it is true, makes a desperate effort to bolster up the Bible narrativ, but with very indifferent success. In his essay, entitled "Against Apion" (Book i, sec. 14), he quotes Manetho's account of the conquest of Egypt by the Hyksos, or "Shepherd Kings," as evidence of Jewish occupation of Egypt. That this is a blunder, both as to time and circumstance, is evident to every scholar, nor is he more fortunate in his quotations from Phœnician and Greek authors.

Daniel Wyttenbach in his "Opuscula," vol. ii, pp. 416 to 431, says: "The Jews first came into notice among the Greeks after the time of Alexander the Great; and the historial monuments preceding that period make not the slightest mention of any Jewish transaction. Homer (the contemporary of Solomon) mentions nothing whatever of the Jews. Thales, Solon, Pythagoras, Democritus, and Plato, led by the love of wisdom, visited remote countries, as Egypt, Phœnicia, and Babylon, yet their writings contain no mention of the Jews whatever. There is no mention of the Jews in any part of the works of Aristotle. Herodotus and Xenophon make no mention of the Jews. All the historians of the transactions of Alexander who are worthy of any credit, are totally silent as to the Jews." And he further says: "Josephus's arguments and citations prove nothing in support of his position, that the name, the religion, and the rites of the Jews were generally known abroad."

To this testimony of Wyttenbach I will a add note from "The Lion," published by Richard Carlile at London in 1829. The Jews first became known under Ptolemy Lagus, who over-ran that coast of the Mediterranean, and when the rage for making collections of books and literature took place at the new-built city of Alexandria. Previous to the collection of Jewish and Chaldean tracts then made, and translated by the Jewish translators of the Septuagint, no mention can be found in any ancient author of any of the books in the collection now called the Old Testament, or of any of the facts related in them. Now, with the Bible and Josephus on the one side, and the negativ testimony of all authentic history on the other, how shall we decide?

Under these circumstances the words of Mariette-Bey are of peculiar significance: "It is certain that if ever one of those discoveries that bring about a revolution in science should be made in Egyptology, the world will be indebted for it to a papyrus." May not Mariette-Bey's prophecy be fulfilled by a careful examination of the papyri discovered by Herr Emil Brugsch in June, 1881, and deposited in the Boulak Museum at Cairo? As these papyri were found with the bodies of the Theban sovereigns, it is fair to presume that they may throw some light on the period of Egyptian history immediately preceding, or that in which the Jews are supposed to hav inhabited the country. With the fact of the mutilation which Manetho's history suffered at the hands of Christian fanatics before me, I confess to a feeling of solicitude for the safety of the Boulak treasures. Hav they only escaped Cambyses to be destroyed by Arabi Pasha? or if so fortunate as to survive the present "unpleasantness," can the scientific world afford to allow them to fall into the hands of the Christian Procrusteans?

My object in writing is to call attention to the present state of the case, and I hope those who hav the facilities, and are competent to examin into the subject, will do so.

Pittsburgh, Pa., Aug. 18, 1882. HARRY HOOVER.

An Open Letter to the Book Burner.

FRIEND EPPERLY: I hav been thinking for a week or more that I would write to thee, and ask thee if thee really thinks it is honest, upright, and brotherly to "purchase" goods from a fellow-man and then refuse to pay for them?

Now those books thee bought of Mr. Barnes were purchased by thee in a fair trade. He did not demand of thee that thee should read or believe them, and thee was perfectly right in burning them, so long as thee thought them harmful and injurious, providing thee owned them as thy personal property. I never think a thing is mine till I hav paid for it. And as thee owns to not having fulfilled thy contract with Mr. Barnes by delivering him the promised wool, it looks to me as if thee had burnt what belonged to another.

Is this honesty? It may be Christianity, for I think Christ taught his followers to take no thought for the morrow, but to help themselvs to grain, horses, and whatever they might desire as they tramped over the country, preaching and preying, and ranting and condemning all who did not believe precisely as they did.

I think if thee had studied the "Sages" and the "Humphrey-Bennett Discussion" thee would hav learned how much wiser, better, and more honest were most of the heroins and heroes whose biographies were contained in the "World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," than were Christ and his disciples.

I hav known a great many men and women who once believed in Christianity, but who found it was only myth and delusion, and so they abandoned it, and became Infidels and Atheists; but never one of them grew more dishonest, untruthful, or immoral from this change of opinion; but, with added light, knowledge, and truth, they grew wiser, better, and happier. They grew more honest, more kind, and more loving. Christ wanted his enemies brought before him and killed. We Infidels want our enemies to become good, honest, and lovable humanitarians. We do not believe in murder by law any more than by private individuals.

We do not desire that any harm should befall thee for burning the books belonging to the old man, who is trying to make a living for himself and his little family. His sick wife may hav a few less comforts in her humble home because of the loss of the dollars thee has robbed her husband of, and he may hav to deprive himself of needed rest, so as to try and sell a few more books or yards of goods to some honest purchaser who will pay for what he buys. Does thee suppose the truth can be burnt up? If thee had quietly payed thy honest debt, and then quietly burnt the books, thy church would hav been the gainer and a little more truth suppressed a little longer; but now every one of the thousands who hav read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of thy dishonest act, and every one who hears of it in thy own neighborhood and wherever the story goes, will mark thee down as guilty of a great wrong to an innocent man. There is, moreover, a gain for Infidelity in the whole proceeding.

An inquiry is going about as to the nature of the burnt books, and to-day I am ordering copies of them both from the publisher; and I hope to hav the pleasure of selling great numbesr simply from thy advertisment of them.

"Never a truth has been destroyed—
You may curse it, and call it crime,
Pervert and betray, or slander and slay
Its teachers for a time:
But ever the wrong is proved to be wrong,
And ever justice is done.

Snowville, Va., Aug. 21, 1882. ELMINA.

A Plea for Infidelity.

Has it ever occurred to you, my dear coadjutants, what a courteous, condescending, conciliating class of creatures we Infidels are? Deferential, reverential, even, 'umble as Uriah Heep, yet never a word of thanks. Crouch, cringe, and cower as we may; repudiate, humiliate, and dissimulate, meekly stand with uncovered heads as the herd of "respectability" go by, and not the shadow of requital for the sacrifice. An Infidel is an Infidel, distinctly marked as the "man with the branded hand," and there is no use in playing the pharisee, nor hiding within the covert of a pseudonym.

Under this bete noir of an over-cowardly faith, in the silent catacombs of meditation, minds hav unremittingly labored for mental liberty. By this irrepressible energy little is heard to-day save the roaring and crashing of creedal convulsions, breaking in upon and reverberating along the weakening lines of belief. Due to the unflagging exertions of Infidelity, impediments once making progress an impossibilty hav been swept away, as has the sunlight of reason dispelled the lurid gloom of preceding centuries. In the execution of its lofty purposes, sovereignty, so long maintained as a kingly right, has become a common heritage; imperialism has been shorn of its purple, and the galling bonds of feudalism unriveted. In the name of freedom it is sounding the knell of despotism, heard in the voice of Ireland's discontent, in the doleful plaint of papacy, or the groans of exiled Nihilism, reaching far beyond the green Isle of Erin, the vine-clad vales of Italy, and Siberia's steril wastes. It has distributed wealth hitherto concentrated, scaled the inhibited walls of learning, unwrapped the esoteric veil of secrecy, and ungrudingly dispensed its discoveries. In contributing to humanity it has humbled arrogance, changed contumely into respect, and in defiance of time-honored codes accorded pre-eminence to the peers of intellect.

In compliance with the dictates of justice, it condemns duplicity, honors sincerity, criminates guilt, exonerates innocence, drags corruption from its lurking-places, and avenges it victims. That such results are inuring to the benefit of the world, candor at least will not deny, and just now they are boldly challenging reluctant recognition. Of this brave champion, wearisome hav been the efforts, herculean the task, with no indemnity save the conciousness of well-doing. Treading the paths of obscurity, eating the crust of penury, dwelling in the deserts of isolation, yet forced to witness the purloining of its benificence. Let us hope there will not be a renaissance of such ghostly portraitures as Bruno at the stake, Galileo in torture, or philosophy expiring under the edict of pagan antipathy.

This word Infidelity, so long the synomym of obloquy, shall yet be the shekina of history, as it has ever been of reason, science, and philosophy, the mare clausum.

Concord, Ky., 282. OLD VIRGINIA.

BATTLE CREEK, Aug. 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: For more than a year, during the whole time of your absence in making the tour around the world, I hav refrained from giving any notes for THE TRUTH SEEKER, in part because of the superabundance of other and perhaps more important matter constantly pressing upon its liberal and open columns. Although I hav been silent, I hav not been indifferent or inactiv, but I hav been constantly "on the wing," passing from place to place, and laboring in the general interest of Freethought and reform, in the lines in which THE TRUTH SEEKER is at work.

Just previous to coming to this place I visited the old conservativ town of Marshall, and I obtained a good list of subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER in that town among the most wealthy and intelligent inhabitants of the place. And I hav also received a liberal list of subscriptions in Battle Creek—fourteen new subscribers in each of these places. And the probability is that a goodly list of permanent subscribers will be established here as in Union City, Kalamazoo, Jackson, and numerous other places which I hav visited during the past two years in the interest of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the various standard works published at THE TRUTH SEEKER office. I believe I hav taken about five hundred trial subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER since January, 1881. And no person can possibly measure the beneficial results of this large list of new subscribers to such a reformatory journal as THE TRUTH SEEKER. In fact Liberalism and Freethought are becoming quite respectable. It is largely a matter of numbers with Mother Grundy. There are very few minds among the masses who can look beneath the surface of popular opinion, and popular opinion is simply the faith of the multitude. As H. L. Green once remarked of R. B. Hayes—"Mr. Hayes would as soon be in affinity with Freethought and Reform as with the Christian church if Freethought becomes as common or as popular as the Christian system of religion has been." The advocates of constitutional rights hav never sought to institute systems of torture and inquisition. In these times the defenders of constitutional rights hav been far in advance of the Christian church. My own opinion is that we cannot be saved in, and through, or by the Christian church, but rather we must hope to be saved from it and its bloody persecution.

There are very many classes of professedly free worshipers, but none of them seem as a body to care for the imprisonment and persecution of many of the best and most intelligent people we hav in our own country. The lines of demarcation, however, are being more intelligently and more closely drawn, and by and by it will be more clearly seen, and more definitly understood, that the fundamental principles upon which the American government was founded were not upon the same basis with the Christian church, but directly the reverse. This government was established to authorize and inaugurate the era of human rights, and not to glorify the gods or to stigmatize the devils.

I go from Battle Creek to Kalamazoo, where THE TRUTH SEEKER and its proprietor has many earnest and very intelligent friends.

Fraternally yours, C. S. ROWLEY.

HARDISON'S MILLS, TENN., Aug. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find two dollars, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER three months, fifty cents, and the balance please use as directed.

There are very few Liberals in this vicinity, and a man who does not blindly indorse all the absurdities and contradictions of the Bible is looked upon with great contempt by this Christian and enlightened community; and, unfortunately, I am not possessed of sufficient hypocrisy to accept their unreasonable dogmas, but speak my opinions boldly, and think I hav a perfect right to judge according as reason and facts may dictate, and not by the precepts of an ancient and superstitious tradition which has been handed down from age to age and been transmuted to accord with the individual caprices of the rulers and philosophers of the multifold nations which hav had their minute existences at some period of the world's age, and which has been so thoroughly disseminated throughout the human mind that there remains to-day scarcely a single individual who has not at some period of life been astonished at the readiness with which the world accepts the monstrous doctrin, and had himself almost decided to believe, without pausing to consider or question even the possibility of a doubt as to its real existence. But, fortunately, a few less credulous minds have denied its truth, and by reason and a constant study of the laws of nature proven its gross monstrosity and mythology. And I think Liberalism is vastly on the increase, and at no great distance in the future man will require evidence instead of faith to establish any fact. However, any creed, no matter how unreasonable, taught to the infant mind, clings to it almost with the tenacity of life itself; but the truth is mighty and will prevail, in spite of ecclesiastical compulsion and a sweet promis of a happy and everlasting domicil in that bright and beautiful lake of hell-fire and brimstone.

Yours for truth and liberty of thought,
W. M. HARDISON.

Letters from Friends.

CENTRALIA, ILL., Aug. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Welcome home, from a long and tedious journey faithfully accomplished for Freethought and mental liberty. Well may we all welcome you home again. Long may you liv in the hearts of the people. MRS. MARGARET JONES.

CLEAR WATER HARBOR, FLA., Aug. 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Welcome home, faithful Truth Seeker, and many thanks for many truths and more light which your trip round the world has brought to your readers. I want your books, and will hav them, but must deny myself until winter when I sell my orange crop. Yours, etc., M. C. DWIGHT.

ELMWOOD, ILL., Aug. 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: We are more than glad to welcome you to your nativ shores again—the so-called land of the free. After having filled your mission so well, and giving to the world an extended history of your travels, we again say thrice welcome to D. M. Bennett, and may his influence liv forever in the hearts of the American people! F. WATKINS.

DETROIT, July 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like your Liberalism. I am glad you hav got home again safe and sound. You hav certainly triumphed over Anthony, Colgate, Crosby, Benedict & Co. most grandly. I am glad of it. But I am afraid it will be a long time before the hold of superstition on our government will be broken, in spite of all D. M. Bennett, R. G. Ingersoll, T. B. Wakeman, and all the rest of the friends of Freethought, free mails, and free press can do to break it down. I expect this government will become so corrupt that it will fall to pieces, and that anarchy and ruin will follow, and then every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost; and that is, in fact, about how it stands now, so far as our politicians are concerned.

Yours truly, JAMES HALE.

THE MAGNOLIA-BAY-TREE.

CROCKETT, TEXAS, Aug. 21, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: This beautiful tree, of Southern growth, needs no description to persons living in the southern portions of Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, and Texas; but it would be a rare treat to many persons living in the states to see one of these trees in full bloom, dotted with their large white flowers in contrast with the dark green leaves of the tree. This tree I regard as one of the most beautiful evergreens of the South, and it seems strange that there should be so few of them found in the yards of our Southern people. This tree I think could be grown in hot-houses at the North, until it got too large. For the benefit of your readers I make this proposal: All who will send me their post-office address and fifteen cents in stamps, I will keep a record of their names and address, and send them a package of the seed in the fall. I hav applications now from persons living in twenty-three different states for seed to be sent in the fall.

Truly yours, ALEXANDER KING.

HAMPTONVILLE, CAL., Aug. 8, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I was in hopes to hav taken you by the hand as you passed through California, but I could not, and now I suppose I never shall. I hear that you are getting some mud and slush flung at you by your enemies, but you are getting more than enough honor and praise to counterbalance anything they may do. Their malice is of envy and spite. You hav nothing to fear. It is the duty of every person to leave a record in this world that they will not be ashamed of. You hav left a mark that you and your friends may well be proud of.

Now let me say to you, welcome home! You say that the man is blessed who loves only water for drink. If that is so I hav the blessing, for I hav not touched nor tasted any intoxicating fluid for fifty years, and for the last twenty hav only drank water, with a little milk. I work some every day, and my health is good. I never used tobacco in any form, and hav passed seventy-nine years, and expect to pass many more. Yours truly,

GEORGE PADDINGTON.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Aug. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I see a paragraph in THE TRUTH SEEKER recommending the formation of Liberal libraries. I think more good may be done by advertising that the Liberal League will donate or sell at a nominal price the works of Voltaire, Paine, and other Liberal writers, to any well-established library which will place them on their shelvs for general circulation. I got the idea from an advertisment of the Swedenborgian Society, New York, which agreed to giv the whole of the works of Swedenborg, twenty-one volumes, on these terms. I being president of the committee of I. O. O. F. Library of this place, at once accepted it, and now hav the works on our shelvs. Our society is not sectarian, and we already hav Joe Cook's Boston lectures and Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" side by side with Bishop Colenso and McElvaine's "Evidence of Christianity," and Paine and Colenso are read five times to one of the others. I should like to hav the idea laid before the National League Convention at Watkins, but it is too late for that, I suppose. I am satisfied that Liberal works of all kinds will find more readers in a regular library than in one exclusivly Liberal or confined to Liberal works, as many men, and women too, and even preachers, come to us and take out Paine or Colenso or Renan that would be afraid to be seen going to an acknowledged Infidel library.

Very respectfully yours, JOHN DOWNES.

OAK BAR, CAL., July 28, 282.

FRIEND BENNETT: I herewith send the two dollars, for which I want credit on THE TRUTH SEEKER account. And as thou hast just returned from a trip around old Grandmother Earth, and hast rode the elephant, escaped from the swift waters of the River Jordan, and the poisonous fangs of the cobras, etc., I just thought I would trouble thee for thy opinion about that scripture called the Golden Rule: "As ye would that others do to you, do ye even so unto them." This seems to me an imperfect, precarious rule, left to our minds and judgment. The rule extends to mind as well as body. Then if a subject of this rule is in difficulty or distress about religion; a Catholic and Protestant would giv him antagonistic advice; a Calvinist and Methodist, ditto; and so on through the whole four hundred and fifty different denominations of the Christian orders. He would soon be confused enough to kill him. If he needed medical aid the same differing would exist. One would want to giv him a big dose, one a little one, one bleed and calomelize him, one steam him, and one pass him over to the spirits. They, too, might confuse him to death. So I don't take much stock in the Golden Rule. What's thy opinion of it?

I don't want thee to wrongly take me for some drone of a preacher, or an Anthony Comstock spy. I am a member of the National Liberal League. I vote the Greenback ticket and read THE TRUTH SEEKER. Besides I hav long since learned that the ignorant may look in vain to the learned for knowledge of the existence of a God, either in or out of nature.

Thine fraternally, T. M. KELLY.

[Our friend's criticisms on the "Golden Rule," hav point, though the maxim as a whole has hardly been surpassed; but it was not original with Jesus. The same sentiments were enunciated hundreds of years earlier by others.—ED. T. S.]

FLEMING, N. Y., Aug. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: This communication to you is from a true friend of long standing. With the writer you are not personally acquainted; perhaps you never heard of me until you arrived home. I see a statement in your paper of your safe arrival, and I am glad to learn you sailed into the port where you started from all sound and in good order, and was welcomed and warmly received after sailing around the world. Mr. Bennett, you must allow me to express my feelings in regard to you. I am not a flatterer, and I do not want you to receive this in that way. I never saw you; only a shadow of you, your portrait. I hav read your writings. You are the greatest hero of the age—honest, brave, noble-minded. You are doing and hav done more to enlighten the people than any other man that ever lived on this globe that I ever read or heard of. Your travels, investigating the different kinds of gods and religions and hells that poor, ignorant, fallible being, man, has made, if I mistake not, will clear away some of the fog and mist that hav beclouded poor inhumanity's eyes so many thousand years; for inhuman they are to use each other as they are now doing, and hav done in the past, making their imaginary tyrant gods and all kinds of hells for others to eternally suffer in, and themselvs go free. I do not wish those hell-makers any harm, but I am in favor of some kind of a hell after we pass from what is called this life, so that some of these god and hell-makers will get their just reward for torturing and persecuting the innocent here. How that will be of course I know not; but Mr. Bennett, if you keep on you will put out the fires of the Christian hell certain. It is about smothered now, and I will help you all I can. I hav been fighting the flames of hell all of my life. I would like to grasp your hand; perhaps I may some time.

From your friend, GERARD DOAN.

THE TRUTH SEEKER AROUND THE WORLD.

Aug. 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading Vol. II. of these wonderful books, and I think I appreciated the volumes better and better as I read them over and over and marked their strong superiority over any other book of travels ever penned by priest, missionary, or pietist; and even other Liberals who hav traveled hav never dared to tell the plain truth about the religion and morals of the heathen. They knew it would make their books unpopular, and so tacitly assented to keep up the farce that "our religion, our God, and our Bible" were far superior to all others of all other nations, and, consequently, our morals and merits were also the best and nearest perfection. But these books tell the plain, unvarnished truth, and tell it so simply, earnestly, and pleasantly that conviction strikes every reader. I am glad to see these large, handsome, and instructiv volumes selling so rapidly. They ought to be in every League library and every home library of the land. I take great pleasure in lending mine to pious neighbors. This is a realistic age, and travels are just the reading that most interests the average man and woman. To know just what the people of other lands are doing, thinking, and feeling; to see right into their minds, hearts, and homes, is precisely what we all like and enjoy, and no other man has ever given us so perfect and yet so simple a picture of the whole as is to be found in these books. They are the cheapest, best, and most comprehensiv books of travel ever placed before the people. They take the reader right there, and all is as plain and distinct as if seen with one's own eyes, and more so in many cases, for the educated eye sees so much more than one that is untrained.

Many will read these books for the history in them, and in doing so they will, all unaware, imbibe much of the truth of our philosophy.

That they may sell like "hot corn" is the wish and hope of Thine truly, ELMINA.

PIPESTONE CITY, MINN., Aug. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav the pleasure to inform you and the Liberals of America that Mr. E. C. Walker, of Iowa, so well known in the Infidel ranks as an earnest, thorough, unflinching worker in the cause of Freethought and its organization, has been here among us sowing the seeds of liberty, and already they hav taken root and grown into an organized Liberal League of twenty-four members, embracing, among the number, several subscribers to your excellent paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

If we could hav a few such men as E. C. Walker speaking to the people of southern Minnesota upon the question of theological tyranny and usurpation, it would kindle such a flame of liberty in the hearts of her people as would forever destroy the power and business of Christ, Holy Ghost & Co., and establish in the hearts of her sons and daughters that principle of justice, humanity, equality, fraternity, and love which would ere long spread the blessings of liberty over this fair earth.

Oh, the incomparable love and kindness of our Christian friends! How freely they do manifest it at times toward us!

An exhibition of heavenly love was so marked on this occasion that it demands special notice from us. Mr. Walker in the commencement of his lecture most cordially invited any criticism they thought proper to present, which they withheld until the last evening of his lecture; they then came forward with the strongest argument that they hav ever been able to present—rotten eggs. But most fortunately the talented and gentlemanly speaker was not struck with any of them, though thrown directly at him through an open window. Some of the audience were spattered with one. That was all at the schoolhouse, but after the lecture five or six men followed Mr. Walker, myself, and family some distance, and threw more eggs, but none of them struck any of us. But I need not mention such argument; it is as old and rank as orthodoxy.

Hoping this communication will find our beloved brother Bennett home again to his faithful wife and waiting friends, I remain yours for the cause of truth and justice. JOB WHITEHEAD.

GRATTAN, MICH., Aug. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I congratulate you on your safe return. Probably a journey of the magnitude you hav just accomplished is seldom completed with less reverses than you hav experienced. You hav seen and learned much that has been a source of enjoyment to yourself, and I hope, in future years, may prove a benefit to the world through the increased amount of good and truthful information you may be able to giv in your valuable paper.

Our people need all they can get from every source that will make them wiser and better every day. You will be able to giv them much from the large fund you hav accumulated; and your good judgment, discretion, and common sense, ripened by mature years, it may be hoped, will giv an impetus to the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER that will giv you pecuniary reward, and be a blessing to many who are seeking to know and do more for the good of people in this life.

I hav been an invalid so long (eleven years) that I hav reason to feel and know, more than many others, the importance of learning how to liv and less of how to die. During my invalid life friends hav been very anxious that I should learn how to be prepared for death. I hav given the matter much serious thought, and hav formulated a little creed of my own, which, in short, is about as follows:

A RELIGION OF DEEDS VS. A RELIGION OF CREEDS.

"All men, women, and children should try to learn everything that will tend to make their lives better, brighter, and happier, and should do what they can to assist others. Discountenance enmity and strife, bigotry and superstition; cultivate honesty and economy, industry, temperance, charity—everything that will tend to make this a happier life and the world better for our having lived. So much then will be gained for this life, of which we hav some knowledge, and that we know we possess. This should be a stimulus to cultivate a hope for future and immortal life, because it can do no harm, and often givs pleasure. In case, then, that there proves to be a future state of existence, if eternal justice rules and controls all things, we may reasonably expect that we shall start out in that life with just as much more good capital as we hav accumulated by good acts and deeds here. By acting and living thus much will be gained." Yours truly,

CONVERSE CLOSE.

THE CLIMAX OF HUMBUG.

CINCINNATI, O., Aug. 16, 1882.

Perhaps there is no other man living to-day who hath seen more to convince the unprejudiced mind that religions over the whole earth are unmitigated humbugs than D. M. Bennett of the New York TRUTH SEEKER. His traveling experiences are complete, and ought to be quite sufficient to expel every doubt as to any kind of religion being any more than a miserable invention of priestcraft in different places, according to the drift of the ignorant conceptions of the mobs. There is not one particle of divinity in or about any of it. The whole business are so many put up jobs, and run in the interests of the swarms of idle lying priests, monks, friars, nuns, etc. There is but little variety in the different systems, in one respect, they are on a par, and that is the scheme of plunder. Nothing can be more clear than that. Religions hath been foisted on the world for a twofold purpose, plunder and power. The great masses of the people had to be enslaved in order that the church, temple, and priest power may control and dominate over them; and this is what all religions are doing to this day. The people are like soft wax in the hands of the crafty, designing priesthood. They and their minions mold and fashion their dupes from infancy to maturity, for no other purpose than grinding the almighty dollar from them, or any other money in circulation on this planet. Greed and avarice is the chief trait in the character of clerical drones. They peddle all kinds of religions, and you pay your money and take your choice; and if you do not pay you can go to hell gratis. Such are religions.

But, oh! what fools these mortals be to invest a red in such insipid trash. None of their jargon is worth a snap. It's the thinnest of shams, and the sooner they make the discovery the better, for it is by no means desirable to liv and die a fool, and certainly there is no wisdom in the rites, ceremonies, and mummeries of any of the vast number of religions now inflicting the world with their whimsical and nonsenical humbug. Everybody should read Brother Bennett's book of travels round the globe. It will spread your eyes wider open to the deceitful practices of priestcraft than any other process, and fill your knowledge-box chock full of the best sense that man can acquire during the term of his natural life.

Yours for a grand success,

THOS. WINTER.

BIGGS, Aug. 6, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I received a letter to-day from friend Garwood, of Baltimore, and I was truly surprised at the attention and respect of one so far away, and whom I never saw. I hav often heard advocates of mental liberty denounced from the pulpit as unfriendly, cold, and selfish, but my observation teaches the reverse, for the pursuit of truth invariably inspires and establishes a sort of Free Masonry, while the propagation of error and supernatural dogmas is prolific of dissension and strife.

I desire through your columns to thank the brother for his expression of civility and congratulation elicited by my letter ot July 22d, which I expected would be consigned to the domain of the waste-basket, as it was my first. I feel glad that I hav joined the ranks of such a noble army, and henceforth my exertions shall be directed to the cause of truth against priestcraft and ignorance, for my Bible, THE TRUTH SEEKER, has taught me that it is my duty to my fellow-men. Throughout the United States to-day we are addressed by 70,000 men, styled reverends, right reverends, elders, fathers, priests, parsons. preachers, pastors, bishops, and archbishops, upon a subject that is enslaving, degrading, and disgraceful. They are teaching, engendering, and fostering fear, a deadly, hideous weapon that has assassinated the joys and peace of millions, and is still murdering the hearts and minds of our children by wholesale. All worship of the unknown is the emanation of fear; although they teach that it is the offspring of love, the serpent of fear is coiled within. These 70,000 men are all employed to feed and keep alive a crawling, deadly, slimy serpent of superstition and fear to poison and destroy all human joy. The page of history amply proves that its destructiv influence has embittered the lives of the human race. Men hav been led to inflict upon their poor bodies the most excruciating tortures. They hav tormented themselvs with strifes, hunger, and thirst, and every conceivable method of suffering has been resorted to in the vain hope of appeasing the wrath of a villainous bloodthirsty God, the baseless fabric of fear. O Freethinkers, this corrupting and disgusting cancer is still upon the body politic. This horrid skeleton is still stalking among us, making our nights hideous and our days sickening and sad. The gloom and terror of a false fear is still nursed by 70,000 men whose black robes are symbolic of the monster they cherish. Our sweet lovely chileren are still within reach of its poisonous fangs. Let us arouse ourselvs to duty; let us stand upon the watch-tower as sentinels; let us array ourselvs in battle with our illustrious captain, D. M. Bennett, leading, displaying our standard, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Victory for truth, freedom, peace, love, and happiness will be the result. The hideous form of fear will take to itself wings and fly from the habitation of man. The pallid, ghostly skeleton of superstition will crouch no longer among us. We shall be a free people. O hasten, glorious age! I hear the sound of distant drums.

Millions on millions, a countless people rise,
A vast, wide-spreading, and all-conquering race,
Whose gorgeous banner, floating to the skies,
All other earthly emblems shall displace.

A myriad people boldly climbing far
Above the groveling of the past;
Before them glistens victory's glorious star,
And echoes wide the joyous trumpet blast.

So in the van fair science richly shines,
And radiant over all reigns white-winged peace;
The bigot's intolerance in the dust declines,
And superstition's power henceforth shall cease.

Their industries fill every smoking vale,
Their lofty mansions crown each verdant hill;
Their bounteous yellow harvests never fail,
Joy circles all, and bloody strife is still.

Yours in truth, JOHN D. STANLY.

EXIRA, IOWA., July 31, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: First of all, I will congratulate you on your safe return to your home and friends and family after so long and perilous a journey. I must further commend your industry in furnishing your appreciativ patrons such a storehouse of useful and authentic information of the many wonders of foreign lands and of ancient and modern times. Your description of the "Holy Land," so called, interested me very much, as I had never read a pen picture of that country, written by a man who was at liberty to tell the truth as it presented itself to him. Men with "Rev." prefixed to their names are nothing more or less than slaves, whose masters are a set of ignorant dupes who feed principally on superstition and the wonderful, which they draw from mythological history written in uncritical ages by men who believed more in witches, ghosts, and dreams than they knew about philosophy, honesty, and the true nature of things. When these "Revs." go over there they are obliged to write just such a description of the "Holy Land" as their non-progressiv readers at home will like, or they will lose their fat positions and their ease and social life. It is a conceded fact that the learned men of to-day who are at liberty to write what they think discard the mythological nonsense and unscientific trash written in books by ambitious priests, ignorant dreamers, speculators in unknown and unknowable things, whether these books be called bibles, mythologies, revelations, or what not. But those who are not at liberty to write what their study and researches hav brought to light (the clergy, generally), are still feeding the people on the superstitions emanating from the ages of midnight darkness.

But I started out to not only congratulate you, but to commend, with sincere thanks, "Liberta," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 29th, for his or her criticisms on E. C. Walker's attack on the prohibition movement in our state. This is characteristic of Mr. Walker. He is always attempting to drag down Liberalism by attacking the principles held dear by a large number of our best and worthiest friends. As good Liberals as the sun ever shone on stood at the polls and worked for prohibition all day, and, thanks to their energies, we carried the measure. And, let me inform Mr. Walker, we did not work for a "sumptuary law" either. We worked for a law to protect our homes, our wives, daughters, and friends from the insults of drunken wretches staggering from a dirty hell-hole by the wayside, the lives and honor of our children, and to preserve the respect, peace, and dignity of our towns and communities. Walker votes for a law to protect his property. I vote for a law to protect the honor and life of my son, and neither of us are voting for a sumptuary law; it protects his son and his home, his wife and daughter, as well as mine. If he will persist in taking into the stomach a substance that will steal away his brains and make him a senseless, raving, dangerous animal, it is my duty, as a good citizen, to prevent him from endangering society with his drunken fits of lunacy. The groggeries and hell-holes that this amendment will close up are nothing but way stations on the road to misery and ruin; and to vote for a law to close them is not voting or enacting a law for a class or a few, but it is general in its character and as broad as our great commonwealth. This idea of Mr. Walker's is a borrowed one from the Democratic platform of last year, and possesses just about as much patriotism and true philanthropy as that party has been able to muster for the last quarter of a century.

Please pardon this long communication, but I could not hav said less concerning this attack upon our prohibition amendment.

Yours for Liberalism and temperance,

J. A. HALLOCK.

CHENEY, WASH. TER., Aug. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am proud of the recognition and kindness that hav been shown to D. M. Bennett on his way through the continent home, and that we did not let the other nations get ahead of us in appreciating true service in freedom's battle. How sad that many otherwise intelligent people do not understand or value this service! A California correspondent tells me the San Francisco papers, with the exception of the Jewish Times and the German paper, did not even mention the arrival of Mr. Bennett. The German notice speaks only patronizingly of Mr. Bennett, saying he is inoffensiv looking, no speaker, and told his audience nothing we were not aware of before, etc., was not the man, in the opinion of the writer, to take the lead of the Freethinkers of this country—as if he had not done so already. Who of us hav braved and done so much for Freethought? His philosophical and historical works will liv after him. [Possibly the scurrilous pamphlets sent from Boston to all the Pacific press may hav had some effect.—ED. T. S.]

When U. S. Grant, a man of only ordinary ability, incapable of research and depth (another of his party doing work of book-making), arrived at San Francisco from around the world, he was treated like a royal personage, the streets being decorated with banners and flowers in profusion in his honor, the daily papers being filled with nauseating accounts of this flattery of one who happened to be in the winning battle of the late war. But a man many years older than Grant, who has fought a more bitter war for freedom than the latter, who is capable of instructing his fellow-beings, whom the thinking portion of the country delegated to inform them of facts concerning the rest of our common earth that we cannot see ourselvs, and if we did would probably not learn one-twentieth of what we now hav from the acute D. M. Bennett, with his wonderful perceptivs and memory—when this man touched his nativ shore after his ten months' hard writing, after being recognized for his intellectual worth abroad, not even the common courtesy of a general announcement was given him. I told my correspondent (who thought the German paper probably spoke the truth, thinks Bennett has been much overrated, etc.) that in my opinion these silent editors of San Francisco, as well as the German scoffing one, were afflicted with the same disease as Underwood & Co.—jealous envy. No other editor in the country has been commissioned as has D. M. Bennett, and I think all are more than satisfied. His name will go down to posterity with that of Paine, Voltaire, Ingersoll, and other friends of humanity. Everyone I loan my book of travels to is perfectly delighted with it, of whatever belief they may be.

I agree with Mrs. Lake and Susan Wixon that women should cease merging their identity after marriage; and this is just as sure as all the other reforms, to happen. I think there would be no trouble, as some fear, about naming the children. Giv the name of both parents, and one surname, as many do now.

Much as I admire E. C. Walker and his noble industry, I think he is mistaken in not taking stand for the prohibition of the liquor traffic. It was long before I came to this conclusion—hav only now done so. Even if it is a Christian movement it may be good (though I realize they hav never before been the first in real reform). So let us not only help but take the lead in it. Are not all laws prohibitory? If this vile stuff composed of a hundred ingredients, called whisky, is not made or sold, we shall prevent the weak fools who drink it from making themselvs bold enough to be criminals, as they are doing almost hourly. Not forgetting, too, the blood of future generations is being poisoned. This is the saddest feature of all. Self-defense demands prohibition of adulterated food or drink.

In a controversy with a Christian lady I am holding in our suffrage journal, the New Northwest, my opponent referred me, in order to get rid of the Bible in all its teachings, to a tribe of savage Indians in South America, who torture their medicin women to death when a chief dies, advising me to become one of these. I proudly pointed to Liberal, Missouri, in the center of our own country, where I could, and shall, go to get rid of the Bible in all its teachings. I showed her it was superstition that caused these ignorant people to blame their women for nature's laws, and superstition caused her to be so uncharitable toward myself, etc., that this Liberal colony had no churches or saloons, accepted only the good and moral from all sources, without the superstition necessary for god-worship, etc. This lady's abusiv throwing down of the gauntlet to me, finding that I was an Infidel, after I had corrected a few of her misstatements as to the treatment of English women, was not approved even by many Christians. The Duniway Publishing Company proprietors wrote me they would be pleased to hav a reply, and I regarded this, from a paper with so many Christian readers, as a grand compliment, not personal, but to the advancing spirit of progression.

Dear readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, be sure I did my best, quoting from Draper and others, and from the indorsements I received think I proved my position.

I am sorry we can no longer boast of our strictly secular Liberal. If Christians wished to remain to themselvs, and as an experiment in morality hav no Liberals among them, would the latter thrust themselvs in and refuse to allow the Christians a hearing in public? As Mr. A. L. Andrews exhorts, let us redouble our defense. ANNIE EVEREST.

My String of Pearls.

BY AUGUSTA E. NICHOLS RICH (ETHEL ETHERTON).

I had a string of lovely pearls;
Two noble boys, two wee. fair girls;
Strung on the rainbow-ribbon—hope;
A clasp beneath each sun-white throat—
A golden clasp—strong, pure, and fine—
Wrought from the gold of love divine;
A love eternal as the song
Upon our savior's natal morn,
Sung by the angels, clear and sweet,
While kneeling at Jehovah's feet;
And o'er the earth the blessed refrain
Fell soft and sweet as April rain.
Alas! my rainbow-ribbon, hope,
Was frail as fair; too soon it broke—
And half my pearls, despite my tears,
Slipped off. The agony of years
Seem crowded into those few hours,
When first I saw my pearly flowers
Lie crushed! O God! those hours of pain!
Oh! may their like ne'er come again!
So sudden fell my first sweet pearl—
My little, loving, lisping girl—
I could not feel that it was death;
Not even when I saw her breath
Was gone—her heart was still—
I did not say, "Father, thy will,
Not mine, be done." Nay, do not chide,
For the kind angel by my side
Said it, and gently sealed my lips,
While o'er me passed death's first eclips.

Yet once again that angel hand
My string of lovely pearls unbound,
And took my laughing boy away
For "Lexia's" sake. What could I say?
I bowed and strove to kiss the rod—
The angel said, "Thy will, O God!"
These shadows, like the ocean spray,
Damp all the blooms of sunny May—
Or, like the breath of the simoon,
Waft echoes only from the tomb.
But through the mist bright forms are seen,
Sweet voices mingle with each dream;
And still each day I count my pearls—
One—two—three—four—two boys, two girls.

Mind—What Is It? Spiritual or Material?

Mind, as a spirit, an immaterial nothing, is so devoid of being characterized in any comprehensiv language, that Webster—in his Dictionary—is obliged to resort to a palpable contradiction in naming spirit as "an immaterial substance," which so muddles all possible meaning as to become ridiculous. And how can it be otherwise than ridiculous to attempt to depict or define nothing, a spirit-nothing, an immaterial-nothing, which he names as two opposits, that is, "an immaterial substance;" which is an immaterial-nothing and substance-something, at the same time? Therefore, any attempt at a conception of nothing, i. e., immateriality, is idle twaddle; and so should not be entertained as a rational thought of an existence. In other words, mind should not be called a spirit, as such word is devoid of any meaning; without any comprehension, or connection, to associate anything with such nothingness.

Then there is only one other mode of conceiving of mind as an actual existence—which we know it to be—and that is as the function or quality of a material (however subtil), an actual something, with which other somethings or materials are in interdependent connection; in mutual relations of impression and expression, as dynamical effects—matter acting upon matter, the one upon the other.

There are two kinds of material-minds supposed—the one is that mind has its origin in our organization, as the product of brain-matter, growing with and dying when brain dies. Such doctrin is illogical, as that would degrade mind to the level of unintelligent matter, when we know that mind is infinitly different and superior to unintelligent matter, and therefore cannot be the product of such unconscious materials. That unintelligent matter cannot generate intelligence; but must be the product of conscious materials, is self-evident.

The other and only logical conception is that mind is a function, or quality of a separate entity of a subtil-material, foreign to our organizations, and so existing without and independent of our organizations, but capable of associating with and being instructed of our environments, by such connection, through sense-nerves. In more explicit language, that there exists in the universe only two kinds of matter, the one as having the function or attributes of intelligence, and so is capable of conceiving, inventing, and designing purposes, with will-power to execute or enforce its behests upon that other matter, which is not intelligent; and so such unconscious matter, having no discrimination, has its laws of action from and thus yields to the paramount force—called potentiality—of mind-matter, only, in forcing such unconscious materials into all phenomenal arts; just as our minds force all unconscious materials to perform our behests. Such are the dynamical relations of the two kinds of cosmic matter. Unconscious matter having no volition, no choice, has no impetus to action without mind co-operation. Such subtil mind-matter as a separate entity associated with our organizations, may be as readily conceived to be attracted to and associate, temporarily, with our most delicately prepared sense-nerves (which center in the brain); as that oxygen, which is equally foreign to our organizations, should be absorbed by our prepared lungs; or those other foreign elements, solar-light, heat, actinic effects, food, and liquids, should be incorporated into our prepared bodies, for their sustentation. And in proportion to the sensitiveness of our nerve-structures, is cosmic mind-matter attracted to and developed by such organizations; which, in their diversity of perfection, fully and as rationally account for the diversity of minds in all grades of animals, from classes to families, and marked variations in their individual differences. All finite—animal—minds being alike in kind, but differing in degree of developments, by their varying impressiv and expressiv effects, from varying sensitivness.

Such subtil-materiality of mind, as existences and separate entities, having their independent individual lives—apart from all organisms—from the infinit to the lowest finite minds, are the only material forces in nature, as the exclusiv origin and only coherent incitements to action of common matter, which we call its potentiality, whether developed in nature or by art, in the uses of unconscious matter. And as such minds are all functions of a cosmic mind-material, they never can become immaterial; therefore all such minds are by necessity, as well as scientifically, thus proved to be immortal and eternal dynamical forces in the universe, and are its most important element.

Cosmic mind-matter constitutes the infinit mind, and its individualized parts constitute all finite minds—being of the same kind, but infinitely differing in perfection and scope. The first is the universal potential forces, or creator in the disposition of unconscious matter; and the last are limited potential forces, or co-creators, to promote their own advancement, and as aids in perfecting worlds. Thus the infinit cosmic mind element, individualizes and animates its own organic creations, as the most conclusiv scientific truth of induction.

Thus, and thus only, are explained the wondrous discrimination, in the co-operation of nature's unconscious elements, as the evident products of intelligent action, in design and controling power, to force all the coherent actions of unconscious matter, through its discriminating co-operation—the exclusiv domain of mind. This conception of cause, alone accounts for the unconscious elements combining in definit proportions for varied effects, differing in each, and embracing coherent adaptations, in productions, for coming needs; wondrous mechanisms and evolutional progress in everything, as foreseen purposes; with the crowning glory, in prepared organisms, for finite mind attachments, or association. And such material-mind associations, are alone explanatory of the origin of finite minds, their relations to unconscious matter, in impressions and expressions; by which, interdependently they become acquainted with their environments, and manipulate as well as control—more or less—surrounding unconscious matter; including mind attachments in other organisms.

I hav prepared for THE TRUTH SEEKER, a much more elaborate and complete confirmation of these views, than is here given; which will be furnished as soon as desired—entitled "The Universe, Materiality of All Minds; Their Origin, Attributes, Immortality," etc.

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR,

The oldest reform journal in the United States,

Is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.,

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer 3m53

A Short History of the Bible.

Being an Account of the Formation and Development of the Canon.

By BRONSON C. KEELER.

Price, cloth, 75 cents. Paper, 50 cents.

This book should be read by every clergyman, layman, scholar, and Liberal.

I hav read Mr. Keeler's book with great pleasure and profit. He gives, in my opinion, a clear and intelligent account of the growth of the Bible. He shows why books were received as inspired, and why they were rejected. He does not deal in opinions, but in facts; and for the correctness of his facts, he refers to the highest authorities. He has shown exactly who the Christian fathers were, and the weight that their evidence is entitled to. The first centuries of Christianity are filled with shadow; most histories of that period simply tell us what did not happen, and even the statements of what did not happen are contradictory. The falsehoods do not agree. Mr. Keeler must hav spent a great deal of time in the examination of a vast number of volumes, and the amount of information contained in his book could not be collected in years. Every minister, every college professor, and every man who really wishes to know something about the origin and growth of the Bible should read this book.—R. G. Ingersoll.

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentivs and motivs, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the hygiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANT ED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY 129 East 28th st., New York.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, and thoroughly and permanently cured by an which is the Doctor's latest and greatest med[illegible] discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful [illegible]plaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case [illegible] some of these were in a terribly shattered condition—had [illegible] in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; o[illegible] a upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had becom[illegible]bolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Gems of Thought.

IF we are to be deterred from answering a well-considered conclusion of our own on the subject of religion by the circumstance, the grave, learned, and good men deliberately reject this conclusion of ours and abide by the contrary of it, we shall indeed be the sport of the winds, without the possibility of any stable ground for our minds to rest on. The many upright and able men who conclude against Christianity will then, by the very fact of their so concluding, forbid us to be Christians; and if you confine the argument to the Christian world it will debar us from every sect and opinion in turn because of the weight of wisdom and excellence arrayed in opposition.—Waters's Through Rome On.

AN able man who thinks there is something to be done here, and who has therefore every day to strive, to fight, and to work, leaves the future world to itself, and is activ and useful in the present world. . . . . I could be well content that, after the close of this life, we should be blessed with another life; but I would beg not to hav in it for companions any who believed in it here.—Goethe.

O RURAL retirement, when shall I again behold thee? and when shall I be able to pass through the pleasing oblivion of a life full of solitude, one while with the books of the ancients, another while in sleep and leisure? . . . . Then—after supper—conversation arises, not concerning other people's villas and houses, nor whether Madame Lepes dances well or ill; but we debate on what is more to the purpose, and what it is pernicious not to know—whether, for instance, men are made happy by riches or by virture; or what draws us into friendships, interest, or moral rectitude, and what is the nature of "good," and what is its highest perfection.—Horace's Satires, Book II., Sat. 6.

WHEN one has so effectually hushed his reason as to believe that a man like unto other men, walking, talking, sleeping, eating, handled, suffering, failing, despairing, giving up the ghost, was the Supreme Being, the absolutely uncaused or eternal one, there is thenceforth, for that believer, no absurd or incredible doctrin whatever, provided it lie within the pale of his own education and traditional sympathies A believer in the incarnation and proper deity of Christ is estopped from pleading reason againt transubstantiation. . . . . A god-man is as monstrous and irreverent as god-bread.—R. N Waters.

THE only freedom which deserves the name is of pursuing our own good in our own way, so long as we do not attempt to deprive others of theirs or impede their efforts to attain it. Each is the proper guardian of his own health, whether bodily or mental or spiritual. Mankind are greater gainers by suffering each other to liv as seems good to themselvs than by compelling each to liv as seems good to the rest.—Mill's Liberty.

A PEOPLE which takes pride in the noble achievements of remote ancestors will never achieve anything worthy to be remembered with pride by their remote descendants.—Macaulay.

THIS England never did, nor never shall,
Lie at the proud foot of a conqueror,
But when it first did help to wound itself
Now her princes are come home again,
Come the three corners of the world in arms,
And we shall shock them. Nought shall make us rue,
If England to itself do rest but true.
—Shakspere's King John.

THOSE actions that are in wide discrepancy with good breeding, such, for instance, as singing in the forum, or any such absurdity, are so easily discernible that they require no great degree of reprehension or advice. But faults that seem to be inconsiderable, and such as are discernible only to a few, are to be more carefully avoided. As in lutes or pipes, however little they may be out of tune, it is perceived by a practiced ear; so in life we are to guard against all discrepancy, and the rather as the harmony of morals is greater and much more valuable than that of sounds.—Cicero

THE lightnings of heaven fall as frequently on granaries as on slave-ships. It is better at all times to abstain from exposulating with God, and more especially on the righteousness of his judgments and the delay of his vengeance.—W. S Lander.

MANY a Christian will say he is not afraid of any truth, but is ever willing to follow it wherever it leads. But, alas! how few know truth when they see it? All manner of errors, delusions, and falsehoods, are stalking abroad, robed in the stolen garments of truth, adopting her name and pasing for her very self. Every mythology, every erroneous philosophy, and everything "that leads to bewilder and dazzles to blind," comes in the guise of truth and seems righteous to those who believe.—Elmina D. Slenker.

THERE are no reformers but Freethinkers, who are willing to giv themselvs up, as German philosophers do, to the consequences of logical argument and reasoning, which alone can sustain the true balance of the mind and prevent mental and moral insanity from suspending their drawn swords over the human intellect. Some persons reiterate the idea that none but splendidly organized persons must marry. But the worst evils are more than skin deep, sympathies are more powerful than laws, and if all men and women are pure and benevolent, we shall soon hear very little about diseases or bad marriages. It is selfishness which prevents a man from giving up animal food, and if his diet is plain, he can sometimes divide it with a poor neighbor. A greedy stomach will never produce an affectionate heart, although the land were filled with Christian benevolent societies, who talk much and do little. A savage, isolated temper can, by a system of neglect, fill the land with small-pox, cholera, and all other diseases, while a woman who really loves her own sex could fill a city or village, as Mr. Graham did, with happy and industrious females, but not by greediness, meddling, or disdain.—Alhaza,

Odds and Ends.

NO DIFFERENCE.

"What's the difference between a waxed mustache and a young lady's crimp net?" asked Miss Summerbreeze's youngest brother of her beau, while he was waiting in the parlor.

"Well, I really never gave this highly important subject very much consideration," replied the young man rather pompously.

"Never did, eh?" snorted the young hopeful. "Well, when you and sister sit on the back parlor sofa, I'll be darned if I can see any difference."—Judge.

ARCH-STREET CHURCH (Presbyterian) clergyman coming out, encountering a backsliding young man passing.

Backsliding young man: Ah, doctor, how d'd do? Fine weather.

Clergyman: Bad weather; hot; empty benches.

B. Y M. (seeking to propitiate): I had the pleasure of hearing you preach last Sunday.

C. (suspiciously): Me? Preach! Eh? What was my text?

B. Y. M. (floored, but recovering): Why, doctor! Is it possible you hav forgotten? (Catches a car.)

A HAPPY NEIGHBORHOOD

"Mr. Jones," began Smith, the other morning, as they met at the corner to wait for the car, "is it positivly necessary that your son must play the accordion until midnight for six nights a week?

"Not at all, Mr. Smith," was the prompt reply. "Not any more necessary than it is for your daughter and her beaux to sit on the front steps seven nights per week and keep us awake until 1 o'clock in the morning."

"My daughter, sir, has a perfect right to hav a beau!"

"And my son, sir, has a legal right to play his accordion!"

"Gentlemen," began Mr. Thomas as he came up, "I don't want to offend you, for we are neighbors; but if you, Mr. Jones, would clean out your alley, and you, Mr. Smith, would poison your nuisance of a dog, I believe I would gain five pounds of flesh per week."

"Hello, Thomas!" saluted Brown from the rear platform of the car for which they had waited, "I've been waiting to see you for a week past. Your confounded old horse stands and stamps all night long, and none of us can get a wink of sleep. Just for a change, and to be neighborly, suppose you knock him on the head with an ax.—Detroit Free Press.

DUCKWATER JIM, a battered and tattered Piute, who claims to be a forty-second cousin of Captain Sam, has of late taken a good deal of interest in things beyond this vale of tears. He likes to hear about heaven, the "place of the long rest," as he calls it. Cocking his old and battered plug hat on one side, and almost closing his eyes in his effort to obtain a realizing sense of this very desirable place of rest, Jim says: "White man up there no more wuk um mine—no more run um railroad?"

"No, Jim, no; no more work at all."

"What white man do?"

"Well, Jim, play all the time on a big golden harp."

"And Injun, what he do?"

"Well, he will hav a big harp, all the same as the white man."

"Guess not," says Jim, shaking his head dubiously; "Injun maybe play little on jewsharp. But what you tink 'bout catch um plenty watermelon?" and Jim opened wide both his eyes and looked as though much depended on a favorable answer to the question.

THE NEW COMEDY.

The touching episode of Mrs Langtry's departure from Albion's shore, next November, has been hit upon by a popular dramatist as a splendid subject for a new comedy. Already he has outlined it, as follows:

Scene:—The steamer's deck. Mrs. Langtry and the Prince of Wales discovered by the rail.

Mrs. Langtry: Good-bye, Albert.

Albert Edward (taking her hand and compressing it royally): Good-bye, Lily.

Mrs. L.: You are sorry I'm going, aren't you?

A. E.: So sorry!

Mrs. L: And you'll write often?

A. E.: Every steamer.

(Enter Mrs. L.'s Maid)

Maid: Man wants to see you.

Mrs. L.: Who is it?

M.: Mr. Langtry.

Mrs. L.: Tell him I'm busy just now.

M.: He says the steamer leaves in ten minutes.

Mrs. L.: I'll be with him in a moment.

(Maid retires.)

Mrs. L: You must not forget all your promises.

A. E.: Never fear, sweetheart. In case I should miss a mail, you will recollect that I'm pretty busy making a bluff about going to Egypt and getting my royal mother to prevent me.

Mrs. L: Yes, I know. But you musn't go and run the risk of getting shot. Oh, I should die if you did.

A. E: Never fear. Indigestion and gout are all the perils of war that will bother me, and I can find them in London.

(Enter Mr. Langtry.)

Mr. Langtry: The bell is ringing, dear, and everybody must leave.

Mrs L (tearfully): Good-bye, Mr. Wales. You've been very kind to me, and I'm sure I never shall forget your courtesy.

A. E: Good-by, madam. I'm greatly pleased to hav met you. Bon voyage.

Mrs. L. (composedly): Langtry, did you bring down the steamer chair?

Mr. L.; Yes.

Mrs. L.: And the champagne?

Mr. L.: Yes.

Mrs. M.: And you havn't forgotten any of the parcels?

Mr. L.: No.

Mrs. L.: Well then, you may kiss me. (Kisses her.)

Mr. L.: Good-bye.

Mrs. L.: Ta-ta.—Dramatic World.

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?
BY
Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,
A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogatives of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adqocated.

The strong commendations of the secular prass show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

HISTORY
OF THE
CHRISTIAN RELIGION
TO A. D. 200.
By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

Verdict of European Scholars.

The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religio Jesu." "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupfferschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."

One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

SUNDAY is a great day for base ball games in the West, immense multitudes gathering to see contests between professional clubs.

A RELIGIOUS newspaper can always be distinguished from others by the way it steals paragraphs and has its sermons copyrighted.

YOU don't often hear of a self-made woman. Fact is, as a lady friend assures us, no woman who had her own making would make herself a woman.

PREACHING Protestant sermons is a very unhealthy occupation. Nearly every man engaged in that business is obliged to go away for his health in the summer.

THE Rev. Andrew J. Rope, of Taylorville, Ill., is under arrest on a charge of forging a note for $200, with which money he paid the expenses of his wedding tour.

FLORIDA has a preacher who does his best while under the influence of liquor. He is not "poor in spirit," therefore his hopes of a heavenly inheritance are extremely slim.

"TOTAL DEPRAVITY" was the subject of the sermon of Rev. Mr. McDonald of San Rafael, Cal. While he was preaching it a thief stole his lap robe from the buggy in the horse shed.

REVIVALIST BARNES says that he is now divinely commissioned, not only to save souls and cure the sick, but to cast out devils. He has returned to Kentucky to try his new power.

"YES, sir," said the Louisville man, "I argued with Ingersoll for four hours and made him admit that a man could be in hell." And the Louisville man didn't understand why the listeners laughed.—Boston Post.

A PROSPEROUS Michigan baby-carriage factory had its origin in the birth of fifteen babies in the town in thirteen days. A carpenter got the job of making carriages for the whole number, and from that start the business grew.

A NORTH CAROLINA clergyman has been living for the past eleven years on a salary of three dollars per week, but now announces that he must hav a raise of a dollar or ten shillings, or be compelled to accept a call to do cooper work.

OWING to the frequency of suicides from the summit of the Vendome Column, Paris, the authorities hav thought fit to exclude the public from that building. In thirty-two years eighty-two visitors hav thrown themselvs from the gallery.

IT is stated that ex-Rev. Miln, the Chigago Agnostic, has ordered a full wardrobe for the roles of Hamlet, Iago, Othello, and Richelieu. If he appears in all the characters at one time everybody will be satisfied and justice will hav been meted out.

ONE of the iron-workers in Pittsburgh, arrested for stealing potatoes and cabbage, explains that he was driven to theft because his family were starving, and the strikers would not let him go to work. There is a world of suggestivness in a story like this.

EVA BRIGGS, of Lawrence, Mass., who was claimed to hav been relieved of hip disease recently by the faith cure, at Old Orchard, Me., was taken to the Danvers Insane Asylum in a crazed condition, owing, it is said, to religious excitement. Possibly some prayed too hard.

TWO sons of a Presbyterian minister in Ohio, aged respectivly twelve and fourteen years, chloroformed and robbed their father of $4,000 recently. It is said that they had been reared up to that time under exceedingly rigorous religious disciplin, which is no doubt true, but from the number of ministers' sons who turn out bad one is led to believe that less religious disciplin and more trunk strap is what is needed in that branch of the human family.

MRS. A.: "We had a beautiful sermon this morning, didn't we?" Mrs. B.: "Beautiful, and did you notice Mrs. Smithson's bonnet?" Mrs. A.: "Notice it? Well, I should say I did. I couldn't keep my mind off it the whole service." Mrs. B.: "Nor I, neither."

"BUT I pass," said a minister, recently, in dismissing one theme of his subject to take up another. "Then I make it spades," yelled a man from the gallery, who was dreaming the happy hours away in an imaginary game of eucher. It is needless to say that he went out on the next deal, assisted by one of the deacons.

THE Salvation Army is in bad repute again in Paterson, having refused to abandon their outdoor meetings, although requested to do so by the city physician, who is trying very hard to prevent the spread of the small-pox. The so-called army may be very zealous, but its zeal should be tempered by discretion—else the law may step in.

A PUBLIC Sunday performance in Lima last month consisted of a terrific fight between two dogs and six large cats that were shut up together in a cage. The sport came off in one of the public squares, and was witnessed by a large multitude, who enjoyed it, by way of variety, much more than a bull fight. Most of the spectators had been to church in the morning.

THE hatred of Chinamen in San Francisco is not so invariable as to prevent Wun Lung's restaurant from becoming rather fashionable. Wealthy people go there to drink tea, which is served without sugar or milk, in the most delicate of decorated cups, and closely covered to precent the escape of aroma. Chinese dried fruits and other dainties are also attractions.

AT Rotherham station, Eng., the other day, a porter promptly offered the bishop of Sodor and Man all possible assistance with his luggage. "How many articles, your lordship?" "Thirty-nine," said the bishop, with a sly twinkle in his eye. "That's too many, I'm afraid," replied the man in good faith. "Ah," said the bishop, "I perceive you are a Dissenter."

YEARS ago, Long John Wentworth, then in Congress, once told a Methodist chaplain of the house: "I am not going to vote for you again. You giv us too much hellfire in your sermons. Now, there's a man at Cincinnati who promises to save the whole of us. He's the man for me." "Ah, Mr. Wentworth, but he doesn't know you as well as I do, or he wouldn't undertake to save the half of you."

DR. HOWARD CROSBY'S Business Men's Moderation Society has made a formal demand upon the Lager Beer Brewers' Association for the $1,000 reward offered by the latter for the detection of adulteration in beer. The demand is founded upon the alleged discovery that the brewery of Gluck & Scharman, in Brooklyn, uses large amounts of glucose in the manufacture of its lager. The money demanded is to be paid to various charities. This is business, and the brewers will of course keep their word.

"GLORY! Glory! Oh! Hallelujah! Hallelujah!" shouted an apparently devout and enthusiastic worshiper at Ocean Grove, in the crowded tabernacle when the camp-meeting fervor was at its hight. If the shouter had not been quite so demonstrativ as he was, the fact that he was stealing a watch from the man next to him might hav escaped observation. As it was, he overdid the business so greatly that he was easily caught. The crowds at Ocean Grove during the camp-meeting which has just closed were so thick that many pickpockets reaped a quiet harvest and then silently stole away.

WE hav among us some men possessed of considerable ability and culture, who, because they hav acquired some reputation as pulpit orators, or men of letters, assume to solve offhand the most profound and intricate political problems. If they were not often persons for whom, in the line of their specific vocation, we entertain respect, we should be disposed to designate them briefly as cranks; for they propound their political or social nostrums with the headlong zeal and serene complacency which are characteristic of a warped rather than a sound intelligence.—Sun.

THERE is a deplorable split in the Austin Blue Light Colored Tabernacle. A visiting clergyman, who is chaplain to a colored militia company, and much given to using military phrases, preached a very eloquent sermon, in which he continually repeated the words, "I tells yer, brederen and sistern, hold fast to yer colors." About a dozen very dark "sistern" left the building, leading out their light saddle-colored children. One of them, who was as black as the ace of spades, was heard to remark, "Hit's pretty late in de day for dat pasture to be preaching dat ar strange doctrin to an Austin cullud congregation."

AT the Watkins Freethinkers' Convention the following-named individuals were appointed a committee to consider the feasibility of establishing a Liberal institute at some place in the United States, and to report upon the same at the Freethinkers' next Convention: Col. Waite, Illinois; G. H. Walser, Missouri; ex-Gov. Charles Robinson, Kansas; Hon. John F. Engles, North Carolina; Hon. A. B Bradford, Pennsylvania.

THE Salvation Army is not going to hav a monopoly in the saving trade. The Salvation Navy, under Admiral Tug, possibly a connection of the illustrious pugilist, has been started, and those ranging themselvs under its flag are cheered by a parody of a famous old sea song, viz.:

"Come all you sinners young and old,
With hearts once cast in 'eaven's mold
And join our Christian Navy bold
On board of the 'Allelujah!
We're bound to floor the forts of sin
And the devil himself will soon cave in;
Then join the side that is sure to win—
On board of the 'Allelujah!"

A NATIV of Cairo, N. Y., describing a recent revival there, says: "They had not made much headway, but the Widow Van Cott came along and she made the gospel fur fly, I tell you. She preached in the Methodist church, of course, for none of the others would hav her. She set it right down to 'em hot, now, and no mistake. Them as she couldn't coax or drive into Zion she grabbed right ahold and yanked 'em in by the hair of their head. She made Cairo a regular gospel-tent, and every boy and young man in the place was praying like a Chinese prayer machine. But there must hav been something the matter with the virus, for it didn't take very well. There was something over two hundred converts, but they all backslid."

BEFORE Congress reassembles there should be a strong expression of public opinion in favor of reducing the postage on letters from three cents to two. This would be in accordance with precedent in the growth of the postal system, for only a little more than half a century ago letter postage for distances of over four hundred miles was twenty-five cents, and at the shortest distances was not less than six cents. That was the rate as late as 1825. During the successiv reductions in postage since that date the postal revenues invariably increased soon after the reductions were made. It is well known that the post-office department is now self-sustaining. Good authority estimates that it will show two millions of surplus at the end of the present fiscal year. It is not desirable that this department should be a money-making one. All its earnings should be expended in giving cheaper postage and greater conveniences to the people. Shall we hold out these prospectiv millions as a bate for Star route jobbers and other plunderers, or giv the benefit of them to the people?—Sun.

WIDOW STEVENS, of Morris, Conn., has established a prayer business, getting rain on payment of $10, and doing various other things equally remarkable. What share of the profits the silent partner of the concern gets is not stated. She has taken a contract to convert a skeptic of her town, but so far her success is not flattering.

The jury in the Star route cases convicted Miner and Rerdell, exculpated Turner, and disagreed on J. W. Dorsey, S. W. Dorsey, Brady, and Waite. They were then discharged from further consideration of the case. The two guilty ones were taken to jail, the Dorseys, Col. Ingersoll's clients, drove off in their carriages, and the rest scattered to take what consolation they could in the fact that but for three jurymen being suspiciously obstinate they would all hav been in the penitentiary. Mr. Merrick, of counsel for the prosecution, gave notice that the government would continue the fight to the bitter end, and it is probable there will be another trial before long. Charges of bribery are made against the jury, but nothing definit has been elicited as to which side is concerned in the dirty business.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Japan Continued.—Tokio and Nikko.

THE AMERICAN LEGATION.

After spending as much time with the temples as I felt like devoting to them, I directed my riki-man to the American Legation. I found a pleasant brick residence near the shores of Yedo Bay, surrounded by capacious grounds and a full growth of flowers and shrubbery. An addition is being made to the residence, which seems already large enough. Judge Bingham received me pleasantly and gave me considerable information relative to Japan, particularly with regard to the embarrassment under which the government labors, from the nature of the treaties which England and other European powers forced upon Japan, by the conditions of which Japan is precluded from levying more than five per cent duty upon her imports, which practically prevents her from realizing any revenue from imports, as it costs about the entire five per cent to collect it. He deemed it very unjust to Japan that, while in the United States and other countries the duties upon imports average from twenty-five to thirty-five per cent, the Japanese are compelled to charge but five per cent. He seemed decidedly of the opinion that the British government is too officious and dictatorial touching the affairs of Japan.

From oriental and European politics we somehow glided into the question of Christian civilization, on which subject we did not quite agree. The Judge being a decided believer in the Christian claim that the world is indebted to that system of religion for all the civilization and learning it has, I combated the position with such arguments as I had at command, and aimed to show that we have the civilization and education which we now have in spite of Christianity, rather than from its procuring. He is positive and rather dogmatic in treating the subject, and perhaps did not quite like my opposing his ideas. I did not, however, call upon him to discuss religion, but more particularly to obtain a passport preparatory to my visit to Nikko. That little matter being arranged, I left him to meditate upon how the Christian church had aided Copernicus, Bruno, Vanini, and Galileo in their scientific investigations, how much the art of printing in its incipiency was encouraged by the church, and how much the church was to be benefited by the science and learning which were conserved by the Moors and Saracens, from whom Christian Europe derived the elements of much of the learning which she is able to boast of to-day.

ABOUT TOKIO.

Leaving the American Legation, I called at the large new Shinto temple in the vicinity, which was erected in memory of the victory achieved by the reigning mikado in subduing the rebellion which was inaugurated to overthrow him. The temple is an imposing structure, being two hundred feet square, with steps over a hundred feet wide leading up to the main hall, in the center of which is the long altar not far from a hundred feet in length, before which a dozen or two men were kneeling and bowing in worship, with two or three score of people lounging around the exterior. The interior is exceedingly plain though neatly finished, and with the exception of a few rich-looking narrow banners, I remember seeing no ornament or symbol save a large circular steel mirror, hanging in front of the altar, which, had it large teeth cut in its circumference, might have passed for the largest-sized circular saw, with an extra degree of polish given to it. The contrast between its plainness and the gilt carving and images of the Buddhist temples is very striking. Shintoism is unquestionably a plain religion, and does not trouble itself much about devils, gods, and invisible worlds, whether of pleasure or pain.

I visited a few of the better class of stores where Japanese manufactures are sold, and looked into hundreds of others, as I rode through the principal streets. I took particular interest in looking through a very extensive establishment called the bazar, which occupies the two floors of a block of buildings completely filled with almost every article of Japanese handiwork, including articles in silk, cotton, wood, lacquer, porcelain, and earthenware, bronzes, metals, etc. The railings and divisions are so arranged that visitors enter at one point and wind through the wilderness of exquisitely ingenious manufactures and wares, first on one floor and then another, seeing all, and making the egress at a door at the opposite end of the building from the entrance. A similar institution is in Yokohama, and at either place purchases can be made of any article desired.

I visited the quarter of the city called Ueyno, in which are located public gardens, parks, and the new museum, all of which are a credit to the city. The museum is a new brick building, which I estimated to be six hundred feet in length by one hundred and fifty feet in width, with two high stories. I cannot give anything like a detailed description of the antiquities and fine manufactures it contains, and will not attempt it, but will only say it is replete with nterest and compares very favorably with the museums in the cities of several nations which make more pretensions than does Japan. I was particularly interested in the department of agricultural implements, and was fully impressed that in almost everything in this line Japan is far behind us. There were many kinds of plows, but not one of them would turn a furrow; they are merely steel hooks or points, to be dragged along four inches under the surface, simply disturbing the upper portion of the soil, but not turning it over. I saw no reaping or mowing machines, no threshing machines, no churns, no cheese presses, no root cutters, no corn shellers, very few carriages, a few seed sowers, a few queer-looking cultivators and inventions for stirring the surface of the ground, a full line of queer and clumsy-looking hoes, mattocks, pruning-knives, etc. The products of the country by way of crops are fully shown, as well as large numbers of beautiful woods, grasses, seeds, fruits, etc. The display of Japanese manufactures is very fine. Natural history is well represented, but the great exhibit of Japanese antiquities is the most interesting feature.

There are other museums in Tokio connected with the educational department, and some of them of a very creditable character. If the three or four museums of the city were united, the collection would be excelled in but a small number of countries; as it is, the partial spirit of rivalry between them in maintaining a separate existence prevents such consolidation.

Tokio is justly noted for its parks and gardens. The climate is favorable for luxuriant vegetation, and the soil on the plains of Yedo is fertile enough to produce almost any growth. Few Asiatic towns have public grounds and gardens so attractive. The parks are not so highly cultured and trimmed as our Central Park, nor is landscape gardening so well understood here. The parks of Tokio are far less artificial, and nature less controled than in our Central Park, and it cannot be denied that nature has its charms as well as art.

There are necessarily many places in Tokio I could not visit in the brief time I had to spend there, but I put in the day to the best advantage. But as the shades of evening drew on, I retired to the hotel. Rain fell freely during the evening, and I feared the prospects for starting for Nikko, nearly a hundred miles away, were not cheering.

In the morning, however, though the rain was still slowly falling, the clouds began to break away and I concluded to start on my pilgrimage, though to commence a journey of one hundred miles in a hand-cart, with a pretty good chance of the roads being muddy, was not quite so promising as a ride by rail. I wished, of course, to have one riki-man with me who could understand me, and whom by some possibility I could in part understand. I made a contract with a pleasant-looking Japanese named Setallo, with an assistant, to convey me to Nikko and return for fourteen yen. He could partly speak a few words in English, and I had not much difficulty in making him understand my wishes. He said he had been to Nikko eight times, so we duly started out with the best wishes for a pleasant trip.

We trotted off pretty briskly. The whether improved, the streets were firm, a little water standing here and there, but no mud. My fears and forebodings passed away with the clouds, and I hoped for the best. But we had not got more than six or seven miles, not yet to the city limits, when Setallo said he would have to abandon the journey for his knee had become lame and it would not do for him to go. As his assistant could not speak nor understand English, I felt a little discomfited at this intelligence. I was at a loss what to do. I had advanced three yen to the assistant, whose name is Sangedo, whose wife was sick; he had sent the money home, so, of course, I could not discharge him; he must go with me to Nikko. We had got too far on my journey to turn back, and the only way was to make the best of the situation. An oldish man, named Rocha-kee, was secured by Setallo to take his place, but he could talk less English than Sangedo, and this fact I contemplated with uneasiness. I was very sorry that Tage Ro was not with me. I fancied Setallo was playing false with me, pretending that his knee was lame when it was not. As his legs were naked, I looked at his knee and could see nothing the matter with it, and as he walked without a limp I told him I feared he was "one bad man." "No, no," said Setallo; "me knee hurt; it lame very bad." So I had to part with him, trying to take a charitable view of his thus early forsaking me. I am inclined to think his representations not wholly unfounded, for upon my return to Tokio I met him, and he had a bandage around the knee, though I could not see that he showed much lameness.

Well, Sangedo and Rocha-kee and myself set our faces firmly toward Nikko, which is almost due north from Tokio. It seemed to take a long time to get out of the far-reaching city, the suburbs seeming to extend away out into the country; but as the roads were level and pretty hard, we made good time. At length we got beyond the limits of the town and found thrifty-looking barley and wheat fields on either side, presenting the same regularity, the same thriftiness, and the same cleanliness from weeds before spoken of. I noticed several additional crops, peas, beans, rape, etc. Numerous fields are being prepared for rice, of which grain a large acreage is grown. Numerous beds of the young plants look green and promising, and much ground is being prepared for it, with the usual dykes or banks for confining the water.

Where the land can be irrigated rice is the favorite crop; its yield of fifty or fifty-five bushels per acre pays better than any other general crop, and it is the great staple of food which the people are more fond of than anything else. Some nine or ten varieties of rice are grown in this country, but with the exception of one kind, which grows on dry land, they all require abundance of water. Where sloping land is terraced in narrow benches, and streams of water are elevated enough to flow the upper levels, it is very easy to inundate all; but on this almost dead level the water has to be raised from the river and canals near, by means of wheels from four to ten feet in diameter, according to the hight the water has to be raised. The wheels are light, and may be carried on a man's shoulder; the journals of the wheels work in two upright pieces of bamboo, and they are operated like a tread-mill, the operator stepping on the floats on one side and the water being raised into a short trough on the other.

The broad plain extends far on each side, with but a low ridge of hills to be seen in the far distance. For this reason the same continuous plains of wheat and barley fields grow a trifle monotonous, making one wish for a few hills by way of change. We had scarcely left the city behind before the villages grew frequent, and to watch the busy tide of life, the steady plodding in the various avocations pursued by this industrious people, offered sufficient room for observation and study, though the similarity which one village bears to another is marked. The various manufactures such as hewing out and shaping the wooden clogs, the braiding of straw shoes, the making of baskets, and scores of other kinds of industries seem to be conducted in these country villages the same as in the city. The women are no less industrious than the men, and weaving is the most noticeable industry among them. I often saw in the open houses I passed, two, and in a few instances as many as five or six, weaving in one large room, the beating of the looms keeping up a lively rhythm. The children also seem to be utilized in taking care of those still younger than themselves, and their old-manish and old-womanish looks are often enough to provoke a smile, as they move sedately and demurely around, clad in the same padded over-garment, with big flowing sleeves hanging nearly to the ground, worn by their fathers and mothers. I met many heavy man-carts, by the means of which from two to four men transport charcoal, lumber, timber, rice, grain, vegetables, saké, wood, stone, and whatever commodities require to be transported. These loads often seem enormous in proportion to the amount of muscle employed to propel them. Several times I have also seen women hauling these carts with loads heavy enough for men. Pack-horses and pack-oxen are met in moderate numbers, while men carry-heavy loads by means of shoulder sticks are plentiful.

There are no fences here at all, nor hedges, save now and then before a private lot or garden in a village. I saw a few live bamboo-line hedges cropped close, and sometimes a short piece of fence, made of small bamboo cut in proper length, set close together, and then held by being laced one to another. In fact, bamboo is worked into fences in very many different ways. In a letter from India I gave some of the uses to which bamboo is put, but I scarcely enumerated one-tenth part of them. Scarcely a day passes that I do not see new uses to which this very valuable material is applied. It grows abundantly here, its neat feathery foliage presenting itself almost continuously.

The sameness of the dwellings, the sameness of fashion in wearing apparel, and the cheapness in the cost of the food of this people lead me to realize the great difference in the cost of living here in the Orient and with us in America. The food which sustains a Japanese or Chinese costs less than a fourth of what the food for an average American costs. And fashions in dress never change here; the blissful Japanese do not have to worry their lives away in anxiety as to what the latest style of dress is, and garments never have to be cast aside because they are out of fashion. Fashions remain the same year after year. The tastes of the people are simple in all things, and one cares not to outshine his neighbor. It is the same with their dwellings. There is no rivalry as to which shall have the most stylish residence; there is little difference in them, and new styles of architecture are not sought for nor desired. Could our people be content to live in this way, they would not need to work half as hard as they do now, and would probably be quite as happy as they are with their numerous wants and desires, some gratified and some not.

My riki-men, every four hours or thereabouts, call at a chaya, a roadside tea-house, and take a bowlful or two of rice or macaroni, some pickles, and a cup of tea, after which they take a very brief smoke. It takes but a very little tobacco to constitute a Japanese smoke. Their small metal pipes hold about the third part of a little girl's thimbleful, and three or four whiffs finish it; the ashes are knocked from the tiny affair, and the job is over. I sometimes join them in taking a small cup of tea, but not in the other luxuries named.

About five o'clock in the afternoon we reached a point where we had to cross the river, by the side of which for hour after hour I had been bowled; the riki was placed in a moderate sized boat or scow, with room enough for us also, and two ferrymen poled us over a somewhat rapid stream twenty rods wide. The ranges of hills ahead had grown a little nearer. We then trotted along for another hour between an avenue of tall pines to the large village of Kona, if I understood it correctly, where we stopped for the night.

I realize not a little difficulty in communicating with my riki-men, and what little information I obtain from them is accomplished with much earnest and repeated effort. Let me give you an instance. Upon arriving in a village where the men and women are busily at work, and where the young damsels wear ruddy and smiling faces, I naturally wish to know the name of it. I endeavor to obtain the information in this wise:

"Sangedo, what name this town?" He looks at me very intelligently, and deliberately answers, "Yes." Then I renew the effort.

"But, Sangedo, you misunderstand me. This village—what is its name?"

Again the reply is, "Yes, yes."

I do not like to fail in any laudable undertaking, and so make another trial.

"But see here, Sangedo, this place, this town (throwing my hands around very comprehensively), what its name? What you call it?"

"Yes, yes, yes," says Sangedo. Then having tried three times without avail, I conclude it does not make much difference whether I know the name of the town or not, and very soon have my attention attracted in another direction. This is a fair sample of my average success in speaking and understanding Japanese.

I was not quite as well pleased with the yadoya which I stopped at in this town as those where I had put up on previous nights. It was conducted on the same general plan, but my room was on the ground floor in the rear, and the surrounding odors were not quite as lovely as might be desired, and the attendance was not quite equal to what I had had before. Besides, Sangedo is not so genial and intelligent as Tage Ro had shown himself on my former trip, and the difficulty of making him understand anything, or to understand anything from him, made traveling among those who know but a word of English somewhat embarrassing.

On Saturday morning, May the 6th, we started betimes, it being not later than six o'clock when we rolled out of the town on our way north toward Nikko. The air was a little cold, so much so that an overcoat was not uncomfortable. The roads, however, were very smooth, and we glided along the avenue between the pine and cryptomeria-trees, which continued thirty miles in extent. The riki men seemed to have rested finely through the night, and were in good condition for traveling. Our road was pretty well lined with villages and residences, and a general air of industry and contentment seemed to pervade the country.

In the forenoon we passed a moderate-sized village where a festival was being held, and toward which hundreds of the Japanese were bending their steps from various directions. The grounds where the gathering was taking place was highly decorated with fantastic-looking banners and flags, and those there assembled seemed to be intent on getting out of the affair all the pleasure possible. I heard some native music, but it did not strike me as being a first-class article. The Japanese, like most of the orientals, know little about regular tunes, and their music seems to be a medley of sounds without meter or rhythm. Probably the people were decked out in their gayest attire, but Americans can discount them some in display. The Japs, however, seem fond of brilliant and strong colors. The dresses of the women have a rather clumsy appearance, which probably arises from the thickness of the material and the looseness of the garments. They wear no corsets and do not need dress reform. They are not deformed, nor placed in torture by tight and excruciating garments.

It is very pleasant riding along this fertile plain to look off and see the low mountain ranges, both to the right and left. The highlands, in the north in the vicinity of Nikko—the point of destination—and beyond, raise their heads far above the plain and afford a very good object upon which to fasten my gaze as my human horses trot steadily along. Even Fuji-yama, some seventy-five miles toward the west, so rears its lofty head and snowy summit that its stately proportions loom skyward far above all surrounding objects, and command respect before all the highlands of Japan. I sit in my riki as Sangedo and his companion haul me along and fondly keep my eyes upon Fuji-yama, revering it as one of the grand objects in nature.

We passed this day about the usual number of villages and tea-houses along our journey. We called at some three or four of these institutions, as my two men feel the need of occasionally refreshing themselves with rice, pickles, and tea. I sometimes joined with them in the rice and tea, and as five or ten sen pays for all one wants of these luxuries the expense is very moderate. In most of these tea-houses I find the people very genial, and could I only converse with them I could pick up many little items of information and while away fifteen or twenty minutes with them very pleasantly. I often have occasion to realize what I miss by being unable to converse with these genial, friendly people.

An hour or two before sunset we reached quite a populous town, the name of which I understood to be Yama, though that, I think, is the Japanese term for mountain. From the book I should judge the name of the place to be Imaichi, though from the natives I cannot learn that such is its name. It is a rather unsatisfactory state of things when a traveler cannot learn the name of the town where he stops over-night. At all events, the yadoya which gave me accommodation was a most excellent one, and I was treated with marked respect. I was taken through a pleasant court, beautified by flowers and shrubbery, and through which a stream of clear water bubbled and gurgled along, and conducted up one flight into a pleasant room, where I had a fine view of the town, the surrounding country, and the mountains at a distance. We had traveled forty-five miles during the day, and though I was not particularly weary, I could well understand that the two men who had wheeled me that distance were quite willing to enjoy a long rest.

Mine host and all the attendants of this yadoya were unusually respectful and attentive. The master of the house visited my room, and, dropping upon his knees and bowing his head twice to the floor, commenced to talk in a rapid and animated manner, and kept it up almost without intermission for ten or fifteen minutes. He seemed to have an important message to deliver to me, or some essential information to impart, but while I was most attentive sitting there beside him on the neat white matting, I could not, greatly to my regret, understand a word he said. At one moment I thought it might be my passport that he wanted, to take the same to the proper official, but, upon my producing it, I learned from his motions and manner that the passport was not what he wanted, though at a subsequent visit he took the document I had obtained from Judge Bingham and bore it away with him and returned it after a time. At one moment I imagined that he was trying to learn what I wished for supper, and I tried to tell him some rice and tea would suffice, as I had some food with me, though from his earnest manner and his continuous talk I was led to think that some subject besides supper was upon his mind. But, owing to my utter ignorance of his language, neither you nor I can ever know what important matter he communicated to me.

My bed at this yadoya was the richest I had seen. It consisted of several soft quilts with silk exteriors, giving them a costly appearance. The covering was a large loose silk overcoat, thickly padded and reaching down below my feet, and very warm withal. Several calls were made upon me during the evening to see what my wishes were, and even after I had retired to rest other calls were made. A greater desire to be useful and to render satisfaction could hardly be evinced. It would seem by the attention they paid me that I was regarded as more than an ordinary person.

In the next room to me was an apparently well-to-do Japanese, with wife and daughter, who also seemed to be traveling. The gentleman was very polite and social, shoving one of the partition frames aside and entering my room to interview me and engage in some conversation with me. But from our ignorance of each other's language we could do little more than to exchange cards, with which we were forced to be content.

On Sunday morning, May 7th, we were up betimes, and, after partaking of a very fair breakfast of boiled rice, and tea with some of the food I had with me, we were soon upon our journey toward Nikko, which was now only five or six miles away. The thirty or forty miles of avenue, with tall pine and cryptomeria-trees on either side, still continued, though the grade now became ascending, having to rise a few hundred feet to reach the city of Nikko. Several moderate-sized villages had to be passed on the way, and a brisk stream of mountain spring water, rushing along by the side of our road, tended much to enliven the scenery.

NIKKO AND ITS TEMPLES.

Two hours of steady but gradual ascent brought us to the ancient city of Nikko, with its rich, grand temples and holy shrines in great numbers. The town has much greater length than width, being principally one continuous street rather more than a mile long, lined on both sides with shops and stores where Japanese manufactures and curios are largely disposed of to the numerous pilgrims and visitors who make their way to this quiet, antique city. A strong, clear stream of mountain water rushes down the middle of the descending street, confined by planking which keeps it within proper bounds. This is the water which supplies the town, and all along through the place numerous women and children are at all times dipping out the fluid for domestic use, and by the side of the stream women are seen doing their family washing. The buildings of the town, aside from the temples, are by no means imposing, being usually but two stories in hight, and uniformly of the plain Japanese style of architecture.

On the east, north, and west pretty lofty mountains rear their heads, the tops of which through the greater part of the year are covered with snow. Some of the taller ones are worshiped as gods, and are really more worthy of worship than the ill-looking images with which the temples abound. Nantaisan is the highest of this group of mountain tops, and he is particularly revered as the most powerful among the mountain gods, and patches of snow are to be seen upon his upper surface during all the months of the year, save perhaps July and August. The surrounding forests are bountifully supplied with magnificent timber. The surface of the surrounding country is greatly diversified, deep ravines, mountain gorges, and leaping cascades abounding in large numbers.

The meaning of the word Nikko is "sunny splendor," but the name is really appropriate for the town but a portion of the time, as it abounds much in rainy weather. This morning the bright-red sky in the east portended rain, and we had not much more than reached Nikko when the drops began to gently fall, though not with sufficient vigor to prevent sight-seeing, particularly the grand temples principally located just above the city. A good-sized stream comes down from the mountains, and at the upper end of the city dashes along over and between the rocks and boulders in a most picturesque manner. In the vicinity are many beautiful waterfalls, celebrated for their grandeur, wildness, and attractiveness. "The deep abyss of Keyon into which the waters of Chiuzenjii plunge from a hight of two hundred and fifty feet; the great beauty of the falls of Kiri Furi; the loveliness of the gardens of Dainichids; the somber grandeur of the passes through which the Daiyagawa forces its way from the upper regions; a gorgeousness of azalias and magnolias, and a luxuriousness of vegetation perhaps unequaled in Japan, are only a few of the attractions which surround the shrines of the great shojuns."

It is hardly to be expected that I shall give a full description of the many rich temples and shrines for which this holy city is so distinguished, but I must of course give some account of them, though I do not do these sacred edifices full justice. Suffice it to say many of the temples are extremely rich, not being surpassed in size, grandeur, carvings, gold and lacquer work by the magnificent temples of Shiba at Tokio. In gazing upon these structures of the past one is thoroughly impressed with a feeling of pity for the poor people who were forced to contribute the funds necessary to erect them, rich in gold and ornamentations of all kind, but really of so little real use to either gods or men.

The holiness of Nikko has an ancient record. In the year 720 a priest named Ku-kai (canonized after his death as Ko-bo Dai-shi), visited the place, and made a road to the neighboring cavern, and he it was who gave the name Nikko to the locality, because he deemed it "a mountain of the sun's brightness." And it is claimed by the devout that from that moment fearful storms ceased to devastate the locality.

Up to the close of the seventeenth century a family of Shinto priests named Ono were in the habit of paying semi-annual visits to this now sacred cavern, to perform certain exorcisms, the secret of which had been imparted to their ancestors, by Ku-kai, and the effect was to keep the hurricane winds quiet. It is with pleasure, however, I am able to state that since these exorcisms have been discontinued the high winds have prevailed to no greater extent than when they were kept up. A cavern situated high up on an inaccessible cliff, on the way to Chui-zun-ji, is solemnly pointed out by the guides as the very place where the strong winds were so effectually stayed. Two volcanoes are in close proximity to the Holy City, one of which has shown life within the past ten years, while the other has remained quiet as long back as the memory of the living extends.

From the earliest ages of which any reliable record remains, a Shinto temple seems to have existed at Nikko. In the year 767 the first Buddhist temple was erected there by Saint Sho-do Sho-nin. Later on, in the beginning of the ninth century, Ku-kai, and in the middle of the same century the priest Ji-gaku Dai-shi added to the holy places. Sho-do Sho-nin was born in 735, in the eastern portion of Shimo-tsuke. His parents had long desired to have a son, and at last their wish was granted by the great goddess, the thousand-handed Kwan-non, of the Idzura caves, to whom they had offered up their prayers for an offspring. Various miraculous portents are said to have accompanied his birth—loud thunder was heard, an unnatural cloud hung ove the cottage, flowers fell from heaven into the court-yard, and a most agreeable perfume permeated the air. From his earliest years this holy saint was devoted to the interests of the Shinto religion, and probably of no Christian saint could more be said for his piety and zeal in promoting his religion. When even a small child he amused himself by rearing toy pagodas and shrines of earth and stone to the honor of the gods. To such an extent did he carry this that he received the name of "temple-builder." In his twentieth year he secretly quitted his father's house and took up his residence in the cave of the thousand-handed goddess, Kwan-non, at Idzura. After passing three years at this secluded place, which were spent in prayer and meditation, he had, in mid-winter, a remarkable dream of a great mountain north of Idzura, on the top of which lay a sword more than three feet in length. On awaking he left the cave and endeavored to make his way in the direction of the mountain of which he had dreamt, but he found the snow so deep as to present almost insurmountable difficulties. But he vowed to sacrifice his life rather than abandon the enterprise, and he struggled through the snow until at last he reached the summit, where the sword was awaiting him. This story is almost as remarkable as that of Moses and the burning bush, and of Jesus when he went up into a mountain to be tempted of the devil.

This saint, Sho-do Sho-nin, remained at the top of this holy mountain for some time, and gave himself up to austere self-discipline, and was sustained by most delicious and heavenly fruits brought to him by supernatural beings. After passing three years in this extraordinary manner, he returned to Idzura, and visited the temple Yak-u-shi-ji, where the attendant priests admitted him as a novice. Here he remained, leading a most devout life for five years, when he journeyed once more to the sacred mountain, Kabu-ga-hara. From the summit of this holy place he beheld amongst the mountains farther north four miraculous clouds of different colors, rising straight up into the sky, and he at once set off to reach them, carrying his prayer-books and godly images in his bundle on his back. Upon reaching the place whence the clouds had seemed to ascend, he found his way barred by a broad river, which poured its torrents over huge rocks and looked utterly impassable. The holy man fell at once upon his knees and offered up a prayer, when a heavenly personage appeared upon the opposite side of the river; this being had a string of skulls hung around his neck, and was dressed in blue and black robes. He shouted to the praying saint that he would assist him in crossing the furious river, as he had assisted other saints before him. He then threw a pair of green and blue snakes which he still held in his right hand, and in an instant a long bridge spanned the river like a rainbow, floating among the hills. What a fine thing it would have been if our people of New York and Brooklyn could by prayer or any other means have secured the services of this wonderful being in constructing a bridge between the two cities over the East River; it would seem so much better to have a bridge made in a minute than to be under the necessity of working five years to accomplish it. But after all perhaps the work of this rapid bridge-builder would not have answered the purpose for steady wear, for the structure which he built for this holy saint did not last any longer than was necessary for the saint to make his transit upon it, and as soon as he had crossed the snake bridge it suddenly vanished, as well as the god who had constructed it. But Sho-do Sho-nin was on the right side of the river, and he at once pressed on his way, and hard by built himself a hut in which to practice his religious devotions.

One night a man appeared to him in a vision and broke to him the intelligence that the hill on the north was called the "Mount of the Four Gods," and was inhabited by the Azure Dragon, the Vermilion Bird, the White Tiger, and the Somber Warrior, who respectively occupied the east, west, north, and south peaks. In consequence of this important information the saint set out upon another journey. He climbed these four summits, and found that he had at length reached the goal of his ambition and desires, for there were the four clouds rising up around him. The first thing he did was to build a shrine, in which he placed an image of the thousand-handed goddess, and named it the "Monastery of the Four Dragons"—Shi-hon-rici-ji. In the year 767 he undertook the enterprise of ascending the highest peak of the group, and after duly preparing himself by fasting, prayer, and other religious exercises for two weeks, he began to make the ascent. After proceeding the distance of forty ri (equaling ten miles), he came to a great lake, Chin-zen-ji, on the flank of the mountain, Nah-tai-zan, but notwithstanding all his prayers he found it impossible on account of the deep snow to proceed any farther; and the terrific peals of thunder which burst around his head frightened him not a little. He therefore prudently retraced his steps to Nikko, where he passed fourteen years in fitting himself for a repetition of the task he had been compelled to abandon. This he did by repeating countless prayers and performing numerous penances. This course had such a marvelous effect upon the invisible beings that in the year 781 he renewed his attempt to reach the summits. He was chagrined, however, to discover that he had not prayed and fasted long enough, and he found himself compelled to return and wait for another year, when, accompanied by some of his disciples, he finally reached the summit. The place pleased him very well, and he regarded it as a fit residence for the gods; in fact, another Olympus, and he proceeded to build two temples—one Shinto and the other Buddhist. In the latter he placed the image of the thousand-handed goddess, and in the former an image of the god Gon-gen. He also built a shrine to the "Great King of the Deep Sand," at the very point where he had formerly crossed the stream. This great saint lived till 817, where he died in the odor of sanctity. The Catholic church can scarcely produce a greater saint than Sho-do Sho-nin.

Now we will make a jump of nearly eight hundred years. In 1615 the priest Ten-kai, acting upon the dying injunctions of his father, sent two holy priests to Nikko to find a resting-place for the dead Iye-yasu, the great mikado. They located a site for his mausoleum on the southern slope of a hill called Hotoke Iwa, behind the hill where the temple of Gon-gen had stood from ancient times. They returned from Yedo on the 21st day of the ninth month with a plan of the spot. Kadrusa was appointed chief superintendent, and the buildings were commenced in the eleventh month of the same year. In the next year the chapel and some of the surrounding edifices were completed, and the corpse was removed from Kuno-zan, where it had been temporarily interred. An imposing funeral procession accompanied the corpse. Shoguns and other dignitaries visited the mausoleum to pay their respects to the dead. New titles of honor were conferred upon the departed hero by the orders of his successor, the mikado. Elaborate religious ceremonies were performed at the tomb, and among other things during three successive days the Ho-ki-kio (the Sutra of the Lotus of the Law) was recited ten thousand times by a crowd of priests. Many court nobles and a priest belonging to the imperial family took part in the ceremonies.

Down to the revolution of 1868 the abbot of Nikko was always a prince of imperial blood. He usually resided in Yedo, and visited Nikko three times a year. As a historical fact it may be mentioned in connection with Nikko that in 1868 the prince-abbot was carried off to the north and proclaimed mikado by the remnants of a political party. After the capture of the castle of Wakamatsu in Aidzu in November of the same year, he surrendered to the imperial forces, and having been subsequently admitted to the mikado's favor, was sent to Germany to attend one of the institutions of learning in that country.

At the upper end of Nikko one of the objects which most attract attention is a somewhat quaint red bridge spanning the rushing Daiya-gawa, about forty feet wide between the stone walls which confine its waters at this point. It is supported on stone piers of great solidity, fixed into the rocks between which the stream flows, and its color forms a picturesque contrast with the deep green of the cryptomeria grove on the opposite bank. It is, of course, a sacred bridge, and was formerly closed to all persons save the shoguns and pilgrims to the holy shrines in the neighborhood. Its name, Mi-hashi, simply means the bridge; and, according to the legend, it occupies the exact place where the great saint Sho-do Sho-nin crossed the river when on the way to the holy mountain. The present bridge is eighty-four feet in length, and was constructed in 1638. It is said not to have required any repairs since that time. The gates at each end are kept constantly closed and locked except for pilgrims, when at certain times in the year visiting the shrines. Another bridge a short distance below, which lays no special claim to holiness, is used for common sinners, and is largely patronized. Near the north end of the sacred bridge is the shrine of the god Jin-Ja Dai-O, which, as may well be supposed, abounds in sanctity.

Crossing the lower bridge and turning to the left, the visitor ascends the Naga-sake through a grove of cryptomerias, and arrives at the back of Man-gwan-ji, a monastery occupying the site of the Hombo or abbot's residence, a magnificent building, destroyed by fire in 1871. On the right is a monastery, the rooms in which are often let to visitors, and where stood a rough stone erected to the memory of the trusted servant of Yoritomo, the same who cheated his master into marrying Masago, the famous nun Sho-gun. The road passes along the south wall of the Man-gwan-ji inclosure and up its west side. In the north part of this inclosure the Sam-butsu-do, or hall of the three Buddhas, is erected. These three Buddhas are the thousand-handed Kwan-non and Amida Nio rai; with them is a wooden statue of Sho-do Sho-nin. The thousand-handed, as a matter of fact, has but forty arms, which, however, are utilized by holding out Buddhist emblems, such as the lotus flower, the wheel of the law, the sun and moon, a skull, a pagoda, and an ax. In the pair of hands folded on its lap is the bowl of the mendicant priest. The horse-headed Kwan-non is an image with three faces and four pairs of arms; two are clasped before its breast in a form emblematic of the lotus flower; another pair hold the axe and wheel, which are symbols of the cutting off of worldly cares; another pair grasp two variations of the vaga, or diamond club, with which the foes of the Buddhist church are to be crushed; of the remaining pair, the left holds a cord to bind the wicked with, and the right hand is extended open emblematic of alms-giving. It takes its name from a horse's head carved above the forehead of the central face. Amida Nio-rai is represented with hands lying on the lap with thumbs placed end to end. The spot on the forehead is emblematic of the wisdom which streams forth from this Buddha, and the bare space in the hair is the sign of his humility. Close by is a pillar called the Sorinto. It consists of a cylindrical copper column forty-two feet high, of a black color, supported by horizontal bars crossing through its center, which rest on shorter columns of the same material. The top is adorned by a series of six cups in the shape of a lotus flower, from the petals of which depend small bells. Just below the lowest of these cups are four small medallions, formed by the Tokugawa crest of three asarum leaves in gold, of which precious metal the Nikko people believe all the brass work to be composed. This pillar is one of the six which are said to exist in Japan, and was first erected by the tomb of Iye-yasu in the year 1643.

Ascending some broad steps between two rows of cryptomerias planted on stone-faced banks, a granite torii is reached, or Shinto archway, erected in 1618. Its total hight is 27½ feet, and the diameter of the columns 3½ feet. On the left is a five-story pagoda of graceful form, painted in bright but harmonious colors. It is 104 feet high, and the roofs measure 18 feet on each side; it was erected in 1650. Round the lower story are placed the twelve animals of the Duodenary cycle, to wit: the rat, bull, tiger, hare, dragon, serpent, horse, goat, ape, cock, dog, and pig, carved in wood and painted in a life-like manner. On each side of the gate is a gilt monster called Ame-inu and Koma-inu. It is probable they are meant to represent lions. There is much carving about this gateway, somewhat variable in character, but there is too much of it for me to weary you with a description of it.

Passing through the gateway a court-yard is entered, high above the approach, inclosed by a timber wall and painted a vermilion red. The three handsome buildings arrayed in a zig-zag are storehouses in which are kept utensils used at the religious ceremonies performed in memory of Iye-yasu, together with pictures and furniture used by him when alive. In a sumptuous stable hard by a sacred pony is kept expressly for the use of the god Jimme. Yes, by Jimme this horse is supposed to be driven, when exercised at all. Immediately under the roof are some cleverly-executed groups of monkeys, severally represented as closing their ears and mouths, and shading their eyes with their hands. They are called the monkeys of the three countries, India, China, and Japan. The next building is a guard room. A very interesting object is the on-chodza-ya, containing the holy-water cistern, made of a solid block of granite and protected by a roof resting on twelve square pillars of the same material. It is so constructed that the water, conducted through a long series of pipes from the cascade behind the hill, bubbles up and pours over the edge in exactly equal volumes of the holy fluid, so that it seems to be a solid block of water rather than a piece of stone. The pediment of the roof contains a pair of winged dragons, carved in wood and painted. The beautifully decorated building beyond the holy water basin is called the Kio-zo, and is the depository for the complete collection of the Buddhistic scriptures, which is contained in a fine revolving octagonal cupboard, with red lacquer panels and gilt pillars. In front stand the figures of the god Fu-daija and his sons. In the center of the court stands a torii with the Toqu-gawn crest in gold on the tops of the pillars and on the tie beam.

A flight of wide steps leads into another court, along the front of which runs a stone balustrade. Just inside are two stone lions, just in the act of leaping down. On the right stands a bell tower of beautiful workmanship and decoration, a bronze candelabrum, and a bell presented by the king of Corea. On the left stands a bronze lantern, also from Corea, and a candelabrum from Holland; a drum tower to match the bell tower is opposite. Behind these is a temple dedicated to the god Yaku-Shi Nio-rai. Seventeen birds are here carved with decided skill. The whole number of lanterns, and presented from different sources, amount to one hundred and eighteen.

Ascending another flight of steps, another court is reached, and on the platform here stands the beautiful gate called Yo-mei-mon. The columns which support it are elaborately carved and painted white. The capitals of the columns are formed by the heads of the fabulous beast called ki-rin. The architrave in the second story is adorned with dragon's heads where the cross-beams intersect, and in the center of each side and end is a magnificently executed dragon with golden claws. Above the architrave of the lower story projects a balcony which runs all around the structure. The railing is formed of groups of children playing various kinds of childish games. Below again is a curious net-work of beams and groups of Chinese sages and rishi. The roof is supported by gilt dragon's heads, with gaping crimson throats, and from the top a gilt demon looks down. The outer walls of the cloister are decorated with carvings of trees, birds, and flowers, colored and otherwise patterned after nature—fifteen compartments on the right and eight on the left.

Passing through the gate, a second court is reached, on three sides of which is the cloister mentioned, where the candidates for the honors of the Buddhistic priesthood used to say their prayers. One of the two buildings on the right contains a stage for the performance of sacred dances called kagara. In the other building is an altar, on which are burned sacred odors while the prayers are being offered up. On the left is the building containing the cars carried in the procession on the first of June, when the deified spirits of Iye-yasu, Hidayoshi, and Yoritomo are supposed to occupy them. In the midst stands the inclosure called the Tama-gaki, which contains the hai-den, or oratory, and the honden, or chapel. The Tama-gaki forms a quadrangle, of which each side measures one hundred and fifty feet, and is constructed of gilt trellis, with borders of colored geometrical decorations running along above and below. Above and underneath these, again, are carvings of birds in groups about eight inches high and six feet long, with backgrounds of grass, carved in relief and gilt. The gate called Kara-mon, through which this inclosure is entered, is composed of Chinese woods inlaid with great skill and workmanship. Visitors are here required to take off their shoes, for this is indeed holy ground. The folding doors of the oratory are beautifully decorated with arabesques of lotus flowers in gilt relief. Over the doors and windows of the front are nine compartments, filled with birds carved in relief, four on each side of the building. There are also four more on each side of the corridor, in the rear, and leading to the chapel. The interior is a large matted room, fifty-two feet long by twenty-seven feet in width, with an antechamber at each end. The carvings in the ceilings of the main compartment and in the antechambers require more description to give them in detail than either you or I have the patience to attempt, but that it is elaborate and extensive enough you may safely rest assured.

From this very rich edifice, on which has been expended a vast amount of labor and wealth, some two hundred steps lead to an inclosure on the hill-top where is the tomb of Iye-yasu, who was a man while living, but now, since his death, has become a god. After passing through the torii of the last flight an oratory is reached, which is to be used when the one below is undergoing repairs. The tomb is a single bronze casting of a light color, said to be produced by the admixture of gold, and is of the same shape as those of the late tycoons of Shiba at Tokio. In front stands a low stone table, bearing an immense bronze stork with a brass candle in its mouth, an incense-burner of brass, and a vase with artificial lotus flowers and leaves in brass; the whole is surrounded by a stone wall, surmounted by a balustrade, the entrance being through a bronze gate, the roof of which, as well as the gate itself, is a solid casting; before it sit imposing bronze images.

A word more should be said in connection with this magnificent temple of Iye-yasu, and that is with reference to the masonry of the vast retaining walls, the stone gallery, the stair-case and its balustrades, all put together without mortar or cement, and so accurately fitted that the joints are not even affected by the long rains, the perennial damp, or the aggressive vegetation of two hundred and sixty years. The steps of the stair-case are monoliths, and the coping at the side, the massive balustrade, and the heavy rail at the top are cut out of solid blocks of stone from ten to eighteen feet in length.

THE TEMPLES OF IYE-MITSU

Are near the temples of Iye-yasu, just described, and though not quite so magnificent are quite as bewildering. They are still in Buddhist hands, and are crowded with the gods of the Buddhist pantheon, together with the paraphernalia of Buddhist worship, the same being in striking contrast with the simplicity and plainness of the lonely Shinto temples, with their simple mirrors without the flare, the glitter, and the gorgeousness of the rich Buddhist sacred edifices. There is nearly as much difference between the Buddhist temples and the Shinto as there is between a Catholic cathedral in Milan or Rome and a Methodist chapel in the newer countries of America. There are, indeed, scores of points of resemblance between the Buddhists and the Catholics. And inasmuch as Buddhism is six hundred years the senior of Christianity, it is not strange that when Father Huc paid the oriental countries a missionarying visit he was surprised to find so great a resemblance between the ceremonies, the dress of the priests, the paraphernalia of the altars, the litany, the images of saints, and all the rest of it, that he had to resort to the claim that the devil, the most knowing creature in existence, and who, hundreds of years before Christianity came into existence, knew precisely what its feature were to be, and got up a prophetic counterfeit or fac-simile of it centuries before Christianity was born. What a knowing devil the Christians have, to be sure; there is scarcely his equal in all the devils the different nations are able to boast of, with all the gods thrown in, for that matter.

In the grand entrance gate of the temple, now attempted to be described, are gigantic Ni-o—the Buddhist god—and Moyog, vermilion colored, and enriched with draperies painted in imitation of flowered silk. A second pair of these gods are painted green, and set in niches within the gate. A flight of steps lead to another gate, in whose gorgeous niches stand monsters almost hideous in appearance, though in human form, which represent the forces of nature, wind, and thunder. Wind has crystal eyes and a half-jolly, half-demoniacal expression, and perhaps that kind of representation befits the character of wind with considerable correctness. He is painted green and carries a wind-bag on his back, which is a long sack tied at each end. The ends of the same are brought over his shoulders and held by the hand. The conceptions of the Grecians of the god of the winds was not much better than this. The god of thunder is painted red, with purple hair on end, and stands on clouds, holding thunderbolts in his hand. The thunder of the Grecians and the Scandinavians was not superior to this.

More steps, and another gate contains the Tenno, or the gods of the four quarters of the globe. These are boldly carved and represented as in fierce action with strong eye-teeth. The forces of nature have nearly always been represented by fierce and powerful gods or images. After this the principal temple is reached. Within is a gorgeous shrine, and when the curtain of cloth of gold is drawn aside the imposing interior is exposed to view. Buddha and two other gilded figures of brass are seated cross-legged on lotus flowers, with rows of petals several times repeated. The same look of eternal repose is depicted on their countenances that beings in Nirvana may be supposed to wear. It is the same that is attempted to be reproduced in every temple and in every roadside image. In front of the shrine several candles are constantly burning, and here are the floral offerings of such devotees as wish prayers to be offered up for their benefit. A dim, holy light pervades the place. And here is a devil also, for it seems there are few systems of religion able to carry on business without a devil, and here he sits uneasily crouching upon the steps of the altar. Though he is represented as being subjugated, his face wears a look of grim irony, and he is made to carry at all times a heavy incense-burner. Perhaps it is not strange that a devil who has no faith in any such nonsensical paraphernalia should wear an ironical look, when compelled to be constantly on hand before the dumb and silent gods. Here are a hundred gods, standing in rows, many of them life size, some of them trampling devils under their feet, and showing their anger toward those infernal beings. Is it not curious that though the gods are forever trampling down the devils and overcoming them in their unceasing conflicts, the devils still remain just as powerful as ever, and no more subdued than they were a thousand years ago? Why, a devil over in America is said to be more powerful now, and to be wielding more influence, than ever before, for he is said to be drawing fully nine-tenths of the people after him, and even three-fourths of the very elect seem to be more under the influence of the devil than that other personage. If the godly powers succeed no better in destroying the devil in the future than in the past, what assurance have we that the devil will be put down and destroyed a thousand years in the future? Are not the "good times" we hear so much about always coming but never get here?

The truth is, the gods never kill the devils, nor do the people who believe in gods. The devil's are too important in the systems which these sustain to ever be got along without. The system of religion in our country could not live a year if the people could be thoroughly convinced that the devil is dead. The devil is fully as important as the god, and will maintain his existence just as long as his big brother, the god, does. They both belong to the same system, and that system must hopelessly collapse when either the god or the devil no longer exists in the belief of the duped people. So long as the priests make fat livings by holding to gods and devils, so long will they preach them, and so long will the deluded men and women, who ought to have more sense than to bow down before these invisible conceptions, continue to do so. But, thanks to the increased knowledge of our age of the world, this mistaken faith is rapidly losing ground; the devil is losing his grip, and the god is also fading into irrecognition. Even these Japanese priests readily admit that they do not believe in these gods and devils as they used to do. As science and knowledge increase in the world, the gods and devils must inevitably retire to the shades of forgetfulness and non-existence, the same as the belief in fairies, genii, nymphs, byaderes, witches, hulders, and gnomes has almost entirely passed away, save in the haunts of ignorance and darkness.

It is only two hundred years since these impossible existences were strongly believed in in nearly all religious countries, but now it is impossible to find a well-informed person who will admit that one of them ever existed. The gods and devils are doomed to the same fate. Nature has no need for gods and devils, and in time the people will find out this fact. A high order of intelligence and the diffusion of science will bring this state of things about when all the monstrosities which in the dark past have been persistently believed and feared will no longer trouble sensible men and women. The gods will never kill the devils. They may still be pretending that the gods are trying to kill the devils, but it is only a sham; the devils will flourish as long as the gods. It is men and women who are to kill the devils. These devils and monstrosities simply mean ignorance. When ignorance is thoroughly dispelled the devils will take their flight; they will exist no more, and the gods will go with them. When this fully takes place a host of priests will be thrown out of a fat job, and they will be compelled to look to some other means for obtaining a livelihood. But a few generations have passed away since a great number of witch-finders and witch-punishers were kept constantly occupied in looking after witches and in putting to torture and death the thousands and millions who were supposed to be in alliance with witches. And the aggregate of human agony which was thus produced can never be fully portrayed, for no less than nine millions of human beings, largely women, were tortured to death in Christian Europe, to say nothing of those whose lives were not quite taken; but now a person of intelligence cannot be found who believes that such a thing as a witch ever existed. Let the gods and devils fear and tremble, for they are doomed to take the same road.

But I see I am wandering a trifle. I was talking to you of the temples and godhouses of Nikko, particularly the temple of Iyemitsu. Great muscular development is given to these gods of the temple; their legs and arms are swelled with immense muscles, and their very eyeballs seem almost ready to leave their sockets with sheer strength, fury, and indignation; but it is all sham. They have not a particle more strength or power than any other dead block of wood or stone. These exaggerations are simply lies. The poor gods and devils are perfect imbeciles, and have not even the strength of a child but one year old. It matters not how these gods and devils are represented, whether carved out of wood, cut in stone, painted on canvas, or delineated and described by designing and imaginative priests and preachers, it is all the same. All alike are the creatures of invention, all alike are unreal and untrue, and all alike are doomed to be submerged in the waters of oblivion. Let the good time hasten on, say I, for the world has long suffered from the rule of these gods and devils. Their reign has been long and cruel. Their exactions have been most heavy. They have caused human blood to flow in countless rivers. Their legions of priests have been a most expensive incubus—a costly luxury—drawing for thousands of years from the tillers and toilers of the earth at least a tenth of all they could produce. They have even so impoverished some countries and some peoples that to-day they are in a state of physical, financial, intellectual, and moral degradation. But let it be hoped that the time for gods and devils is short, and that the time is close at hand when in all countries the gods and devils will no longer be believed in, and when the great evils which they have produced will no longer exist. A greater degree of happiness will then prevail over the earth than poor god-bewildered man has ever yet enjoyed.

The teeth of the Japanese gods are unpleasantly conspicuous; but these teeth, after all, possess no force. They are no more to be feared than the teeth of an old dog just in the throes of death. They can no longer bite. But the priests of Japan still find dupes among the people of their country, who are still strong of faith, and to them they sell small pieces of paper, on which are inscribed the names of the particular gods in this temple (and it is the same with the others), and these bits of paper are supposed to act as charms to keep away the evils of life, such as shipwreck, disease, famine, and the failure of the rice crop. This mistaken piety is much the same as that which prompts Christians to buy candles, amulets, etc, which the priests have blessed, and which are supposed to be productive of all sorts of good luck. There is little difference in these senseless delusions, whether of Hindoo, Chinese, Japanese, or Christian origin. They are all equally absurd, and equally degrading to the human intellect—the highest result which nature has produced, so far as we know anything about it.

The roofs of these temples are fringed with wind bells which, in furious storms, and in commotions of the earth from earthquakes, are made to ring. On such occasions the priests rush into the temples and beat the drums and ring the holy bells with the soft dulcet tones, to inform the gods that they are derelict in duty, and are not duly attending to their business. But can it be thought very strange, since these gods have become so stupid and helpless that they have to be often reminded of the duty which they are so prone to neglect.

The tomb of Iye-mitsu stands upon the top of a high hill and is reached by a long flight of steps, much like that of Iye-yasu. The style of both tombs are much the same, save that the gates in front of the tomb of Iye-mitsu are inscribed in large Sanskrit characters on bright brass. Perhaps one of the most beautiful of the many views is the temple. When the sun shines upon it, the bright tints of the surrounding cryptomerias is said to present a most beautiful effect. Yes, the rays of light, and the various intricate forces of the universe, are infinitely superior to all the monstrous and clumsy gods that man ever devised.

There are other rich temples and shrines at this holy city of Nekko; there are other pagodas; other storehouses of holy things; and they are massive, rich, and gorgeous, bountiful in vermilion, in lacquer and gold, rich in carvings and gilding, and bountifully supplied with gods of all calibers to preside over the different offices, but I am sure you will excuse me if I do not enter into a prolonged description of them. The similarity between them is great, and when you have had the details of one or two, you may be as well satisfied as though I described a dozen. Tickets of admission are sold to enter these holy places, and after one has paid to enter half a dozen or so, and realizes how little the gods have done for ignorant man, he is content to let the others pass with merely an external and superficial inspection. While one feels assured that the money paid for looking into these holy places is for the benefit of the gods, or rather for their hungry priests, he still feels little inclined to be too generous in his contributions in this direction, thinking it no hardship for this celestial aristocracy to do as the most honest men have to do, earn honorably their own bread. If the gods really are gods they ought not to have need of the help of man, and if their priests are not paid by the gods for the service they perform, they had better seek other employers who can pay them for what they do. That the honest workers among men should be compelled to make up the deficiencies of the gods to pay their worthless priests for their useless services will not always be tamely submitted to in Japan, in Europe, nor in America. It is indeed a pretty poor sort of god that is not able to pay his own taxes and the wages of those in his employ, without calling upon his enemies, or those who feel indifferent toward him, and do not count themselves as his saints.

Some of these temples and sacred storehouses are roofed with sheet-copper, though the larger portion are covered with a fine article of tiles. It has been justly said that tiling has been elevated to a fine art in Japan. The tiles are of a coppery-gray color, with a coat of metallic luster. They are slightly concave, and the joints are covered by others quite convex, which come down like massive tubes from the ridge of the roof and terminate at the eaves in disks on which the Tokugawa badge is emblazoned in gold, as it is everywhere on these shrines. The roofs are massive and heavy, and require great strength in the timbers below, which are also heavy and massive, and as they are in full sight from below they are usually carved and painted in vermilion and profusely gilded so as to produce a dazzling and gorgeous effect when the eyes are cast upward.

The shrines are believed to be the most wonderful work in Japan and in their stately setting of cryptomeria, many of which are twenty feet in circumference at the base, almost as straight as an arrow, with their tall tops reaching to a hight of one hundred and twenty-five feet, are enough to inspire the grandest emotions of admiration. In spite of the seeming incongruity in the use of colors by these people, when measured by Western taste, one is compelled to acknowledge the beauty of forms and combinations of color not hitherto known, and that lacquered wood is capable of lending itself to the expression of a very high art. Gold, as remarked, has been used in profusion, and black, dull red, and white have been employed with a breadth and lavishness hardly to be conceived.

The bronze fret-work is of itself a study, and the wood-work requires weeks of close study to take it all in and do it full justice. The ideas and details almost baffle the closest observer. One screen or railing has sixty panels, four feet in length, carved with marvelous boldness and depth, in what is called open work, representing peacocks, pheasants, storks, lotuses, peonies, bamboos, and foliages of different kinds. The accuracy in form and color, and the reproduction of the gracefulness of motion call for the highest praise. The flowers are perhaps the best executed of all. Here the artists reveled in their congenial labor without let or hindrance. The lotus leaf retains its dewy bloom, the peonies their shades of creamy white, the bamboo leaf with exquisite feathery neatness almost trembles on the graceful stem, in contrast with the rigid needles of the pine, and countless corollas, in all the passionate coloring of teeming life, unfold themselves amidst the abundant leafage of gorgeous tracery. These carvings are from ten to fifteen inches in depth, and single feathers in the tails of pheasants stand out not less than six inches in front of peonies nearly as prominent.

It is hard for the memory to long retain a vivid recollection of the picturesque masses of black and red lacquer and gold, gilded doors opening without noise, halls laid with matting so soft that not a foot-fall is ever heard. Across these rich works of art the morning and evening sunbeams fall aslant on exquisitely arabesqued walls and panels, carved with an endless variety of birds and flowers; and on ceilings paneled and wrought with elaborate art, of inner shrines of gold, with golden lilies six feet in hight, and curtains of rich brocade. Further, should be mentioned the incense fumes, the colossal dulcet-toned bells, the golden ridge-poles, of the mythical fauna, the mythical dragons, together with the elephants, apes, tigers, inter-blended and mingled with flowers, trees, golden tracery, diaper-work on golden ground, and lacquer screens, pagodas, not to omit bronze lanterns in the courts, shorn priests in gold brocade, Shinto attendants in black lacquer caps, monumental urns, and back of all a mountain side covered a with majestic cryptomeria forest with rose-azalias lighting up the sacred shades. These are the beauties, the attractions, and the fascinations of the Nikko temples to which thousands of pilgrims annually flock to pay their devotions to the holy shrines. It is difficult to decide whether the professed followers of Buddha or of Christ excel the other in the gewgawry, glitter, tinsel, and lavish expenditure of money in their places of worship.

SURROUNDINGS OF NIKKO.

It was my wish to spend two or three days in the vicinity of this holy city visiting the several noted places within a few miles in various directions, for here, even in short distances, are places of natural scenery rarely surpassed in any country, among which the following may be mentioned: One hour's walk from the town takes one to Jakko, where there is a temple, and what is better, a Nama-taki—a beautiful cascade far in a recess of rocks. It consists of three falls of about fifty feet each.

Nearly as far in another direction brings one to Yama, an eminence whence is obtained splendid views of the surrounding country. An hour and a half's walk over an undulating country takes one to Kiri-feori-no-taki, a picturesque cascade of the falling mist. At the source of the Inari Kawa, a small stream which empties into the Daiya-gawa, are seven cascades, where the water pours over a line of low cliffs. Urami-ga-taki is another fine cascade. A picturesque view of the basin, overhung with trees, the cascade and the deep pool into which it tumbles, with the various streams gushing out of the rocks around, are said to be interesting.

There are other places not far away where tourists make it a point to visit, but after I had finished looking at the temples, and had taken in their grandeur and magnificence, the rain had set in and the horizon was closed as though a three-days' storm was in store; so, after looking some more over the town, and purchasing some Japanese curiosities and works of art, I indicated to Sangedo that the carriage might be brought up and we would turn our faces toward Tokio. This was but a short task, and, after bringing up the paper apron to my eyes to keep the rain from annoying me, my team were soon trotting down the street and the descending road to Yama, or Imaichi, here thinking it desirable to return to Tokio by a road different from the one which we took in coming out, as it is, of course, desirable to see as much of the country as possible rather than to pass twice over the same thoroughfare. With this view we took the right-hand road at the village where we had stopped over-night, and this took us a few miles further west than the one we patronized in coming out.

This western road took us over several active streams spanned by good bridges. I noticed in several places what I had seen on my former trip to the mountains, an invention for preventing embankments and piers from being washed away by high water. These were long tubes of open basket work, made of bamboo, some twenty-five or thirty inches in diameter, and fifteen or twenty feet in length. They are filled with round stones of the size of a child's head, and the ends being secured or braided together, the whole is rolled wherever wanted and piled three or four tiers high as necessity dictates, forming an excellent breakwater—nearly as good as a solid wall, save that after a certain number of years the bamboo splints must decay and cease to longer hold the stones in the same round form they now occupy.

We passed through several towns on our homeward way, among which were Kasawara, Kanuma, Nireji, Kassembra, and others. We had gone but a mile or two before the rain had entirely discontinued and farmers were out in the fields at work. I absolutely saw two instances of men plowing with horses, or, rather, with a single horse in each case; but the fields being plowed were little larger than a common family garden, and the plowing was of the most indifferent kind. The plows were of an antique pattern, little better than a hook, which really did not turn a furrow, but made a scratch in the soil a little better than a stiff boot if well loaded might do, or the knot of a tree made of proper shape. I passed several fields of hemp, now three or four inches high, and the rows some sixteen inches apart. The fields, like those I had seen before, looked remarkably clean of weeds, and the soil being mellow and fertile, the prospects of a good crop are promising.

In the night we stopped at the village of Tochigi, over twenty-five miles from Nikko, and fully fifty miles from Tokio. We had made splendid time after leaving Nikko, though the rain attended us a part of the way. Kassembra, the last town before Tochigi, is noted for its houses of prostitution. It is said there is no town in Japan of its size that has so much of that sort of thing. Let me repeat, however, what I have said before, that prostitution is not so debased in Japan as it is in Christian countries. It does not seem to degrade the females to the same extent it does in our country, nor does it disgrace their lives as it does the lives of American women, for girls who live here that sort of life for a year or two very often succeed in marrying good husbands, and are afterwards as much respected as though they had all the time been at home with their parents. In fact, it is thought they stand a better chance of picking up husbands in these houses—where they are often hired out by their parents, the same as girls with us are hired out to do hotel or factory work—than though they were living at home. This may seem incredible to many American people, but it is nevertheless true.

Though this is the Christian Sabbath, the people hereabouts seem to know nothing about its being a holy day, for they are working the same as though it was not God's day, or was the devil's day the same as the other six. I to-day met an unusual number of men hauling heavy man-carts loaded with different kinds of material, including charcoal, lumber, stone, saké, etc. I do not mean that all these commodities helped to form the burden on the same cart, but that I met different carts having loads of one article only, and in the aggregate embracing all the articles named. I also saw women pulling heavy carts the same as men. It is almost astonishing what large loads they thus haul over the country.

My night's lodging at Tochigi was not unlike the others I had experienced on other occasions. I met with the same neatness, the same respectful attention, the same obsequiousness, the same politeness, the same low and profuse bowing. My bill, however, was somewhat higher here than I had been charged at other places, and it is possible the landlord of this yadoya may consider his house the bon ton establishment of the neighborhood.

Monday morning, May 8th, we were, as usual, up with the sun, and a breakfast of boiled eggs, boiled rice, some tea, and also a drink of warm water with a flower floating in it was promptly dispatched, when we were again rolling away toward Tokio, which place I hoped to reach before again seeking rest. The air was clear, pleasant, and balmy, and upon turning my eyes back toward Nikko I saw that the higher portions of the mountains were white with snow; while it had rained in the valleys, it had snowed at the higher altitudes and remained white and hoary throughout the day. But I was most interested, as I was riding southward this pleasant day, to keep my eyes upon Fuji-yama, seventy-five miles or more away in the southwest rising up like an eternal sentinel as it is, its snowy, conical summit making a beautiful contrast with the blue sky. Yes, I love to gaze upon it, if not regarding it as a god as many of the natives do, though it is a thousand times more worthy of worship and respect than any and all of the gods which men have bowed down to for the last five thousand years, not omitting the cruel Jew God which for a time feebly flourished in the western part of Asia, but after meeting with a most ignominious failure in that quarter deserted the miserable, small country and emigrated to Europe, and subsequently crossed the Atlantic to the New World, where he has done a pretty flourishing business, inasmuch as he pays no taxes upon his somewhat extensive possessions, and gives nothing to the seventy-five thousand men who work for him, leaving them to collect their money from those who can be induced to listen to them. Yes, I like Fuji-yama better than all the gods and devils combined that I have ever heard of, for about Fuji there is no deception, no falsity, no humbug, nothing imaginary, nothing hypocritical, nothing unreal, but a great truthful, actual, eternal fact, a great natural result of the forces of nature, and worthy not only of the respect of every dweller in Japan, but of every man and woman in the world who has information concerning it. It is indeed a beautiful mountain—a regular cone, as true as a pyramid, and almost as symmetrical as a chiseled monument. For hours to-day I kept my eyes toward its towering summit, thirteen thousand feet above the surrounding plain. I take pleasure in contemplating its grandeur and beauty.

Let me mention, before I forget it, the manner in which the Japanese saw their lumber. I have in many places, as I have been traveling around, seen this kind of work being performed. It is all done by hand. The usual way is to raise one end of the log which is to be converted into lumber to an angle of about forty degrees, when the man or boy, as the case may be, takes a short, wide, and stout saw, not more than two feet long, and commences at the top on the upper side with the sawing process, the cutting being effected by a pulling motion instead of pushing. Perhaps in course of ten hours he saws a course through from end to end, making it a slow, tedious enterprise. All the sawing in this country is done by pulling the saw toward the body instead of pushing it from the body as we do. Planing is done in the same way; the planer alway pulls his plane toward him.

When within fifteen miles of Tokio our road led back into the same one on which we made our northern journey, so that from that point the towns through which we passed were the same as we saw on our outward trip. When within ten miles of the city Sangedo and Rocha-kee seemed to be weary, and essayed to stop for the night, but I pantomimed and talked to them, persuading them to add ten miles more to what they had already accomplished. After a certain amount of my pretty talk, with a moderate amount of other consideration, they concluded to see Tokio before they slept, and so I was again rolling over the smooth roads toward the capital of the country, which every moment grew nearer and nearer. Steady trotting over a smooth level road will, after a time, entirely wear away ten miles, so just as the shades of evening were approaching we passed through Tokio, and I immediately made my way to the railway station that I might the same evening return to my lodgings in Yokohama.

It was not more than seven in the evening when we reached the station, having made a little over fifty miles during the day, since half past six in the morning. A horse having made that distance would doubtless have shown more weariness than did Sangedo and Rocha-kee. It took but a short time to disburse the fourteen yen which I had consented to pay them for making the trip. I think the little matter of my promising this sum whether they made the journey in three, four, five, or six days had something to do with the speed we had made in traveling. We had been out but four days, which is much shorter than usual, even were no time used in looking over the temples. As it was, and including the rain, we had made remarkably good time with a single team and without change of horses. The holy city Nikko had been visited nearly ninety miles away at an expense of fourteen yen, or between eight and nine dollars for the team.

THE MIKADO OF JAPAN.

While waiting at the station for a train I heard that his excellency, the mikado, was expected on the next train from Yokohama, where he had been for a few hours. Of course I wished to see the ruler of thirty-five millions of people, and cheerfully waited the twenty minutes required for the train to arrive. When the train reached the station the mikado walked off with the crowd just about as any other man, minding his own business and attending to that of no other man. He was attended by a soldier or two, but otherwise there was no pageantry or display shown whatever. He was dressed in citizen's dress of the European or American style, and had I not known that he was the mikado I would not have discovered he was anything of an extraordinary character. I should judge him to be not far from thirty years of age, some five feet eight inches in hight, and weighing one hundred and forty pounds. He has a little of the African type of countenance, and does not impress one as possessing unusual ability. He wears a beard on the lower part of the face, which is not very long, and curls slightly. He appears to be loved by his subjects, as is his queen, the empress, who is represented as an amiable and sensible woman. The mikado evinces a disposition to give his people a tolerably free government, and has promised that by the year 1890 they shall have a representative parliament elected by the people. That will be quite as soon as the people will be ready for it, for a great bulk of them are still ignorant and know nothing about self-government.

In an hour's time after leaving Tokio I was in Yokohama, and upon arriving at the station it was but a moment's work to secure a riki—the man with paper lantern in hand—to convey me to my lodgings. As I had been gone but five days, and in the time had gone a hundred miles and back to Nikko, besides doing up the great city of Tokio. It was conceded on all hands that I had been expeditious.

On the following morning I found the steamer Oceanic had arrived, and on Saturday, the 15th, would start her wheels for San Francisco. That was my steamer, for being anxious to see my own land again, the country that can boast of one hundred thousand miles or railroad, and, besides not far from a hundred million of dollars stolen by its public servants every year, is able to reduce its debt over a hundred million of dollars annually. I could not think of stopping over another week. I made a trip out to the Oceanic, and deemed she would answer my purpose, though I very much disliked to pay two hundred and fifty dollars for the privilege of a small room and board on her for the period of eighteen days. I looked at the steerage accommodations, for which some eighty-five dollars only is charged, but as some drunken sailors were occupying the only room for steerage passengers, and as it was closely surrounded by eleven hundred Chinese, I concluded without a protracted deliberation that those quarters would not suit an old man of my size, so I saw no other way but to fork over the two hundred and fifty dollars.

I had four days before the day of sailing, and I occupied them in looking more over the town, selecting a lot of photographs, paper goods, small Japanese manufactures, and some curios which I wished to take home with me. My stereoptican views also had to be packed, passsd through the custom house, and seen aboard the steamer. This, with some writing I had to attend to, sufficed to keep me busy. But this letter has been drawn out to sufficiently elongated proportions, and I will say good-bye.

From Our London Correspondent.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is somewhat difficult to say whether the prosecutor of the Freethinker is a friend or foe to the Freethought party, as one would scarcely think a bitter opponent would take so much trouble to advertise the leaders and their papers. But defenders of the faith are not generally overstocked with wisdom, and very little common sense falls to their share, so they go blindly blundering along, trying to do mischief, but in the end do more harm to themselvs than their opponents. As Sir Henry Tyler avows himself a friend of God, we must take his word for it that such is the case. He caused some diversion the other evening when in the House of Commons he asserted that, in his opinion, the Hall of Science was not a proper place, and Dr. Aveling, Mrs. Besant, and the Misses Bradlaugh not proper persons to teach science, and therefore the government grant ought to be taken away. When he stated the barefaced lie that he brought the question forward in no party spirit and with no personal ill-feeling, he was answered with derisiv laughter and cries of "Oh!" This was rather too much for his fellow-Christians who were present. He very kindly read for the benefit of the members several extracts from the National Reformer and various Freethought pamphlets, and, as a consequence, I hav no doubt that the circulation of this class of literature will be considerably extended. It is satisfactory to know he again failed in his endeavor to do mischief, and it is to be hoped he will succeed no better in his law-suit.

Curiously enough, a clergyman is the chairman of committee of these classes, and he has been called to account by the bishop of London for being connected therewith. He made a most excellent reply, and I am sorry space will not permit me to transcribe it. In his letter he reminded the bishop that he and others could find plenty of defense for the wildest extravagances of the Salvation Army, while for a priest who was without bigotry, and doing his best to extend knowledge, a wet blanket and plenty of cold water were the best things.

One of the duties of the Archbishop of Canterbury, in return for his £15,000 a year, is to manufacture special prayers when the ordinary ones are not supposed to be efficacious enough. The latest one is for the benefit of the troops now in Egypt, and all Christians of the established church are requested to join him in a fervent solicitation that the soldiers and sailors "may be preserved evermore from all perils." It is anticipated that this will hav the same effect as armor plating without the expense, but, as some of the English hav been killed, it is to be presumed that the prayer did not reach the throne of grace in time, or that the other side has put up an effectiv prayer, and as both parties hav no connection with any but the only true God, it must be rather difficult for him to know what to do under the circumstances; but as we hav it, on the authority of the first Napoleon, that he is always on the side of the biggest battalion, the present case will probably prove no exception to the rule, though if the Egyptians get the worst of the contest the archbishop will doubtless take the credit, and there will be a fresh proof of the power of prayer.

There has been a split in the Salvation Army—one of the captains, known as "Gypsy Smith," having received the present of a watch, was ordered to giv it up to the general, who is determined to hav all the plunder. The captain being stiff-necked, and blinded by the evil one, declined acceding to the request, with the awful consequence of the sentence of excommunication being passed upon him. It did not seem, however, to do him any very considerable amount of damage, for he at once started an opposition establishment, which is to be called "Christ's Army," and as brotherly love has ceased to continue between the rival commanders, some lively times may be expected.

It turns out that only about half the amount required for the purchase of the lease of the Grecian Theater was collected, and the balance had to be borrowed from "a few friends" possessing more money than sense. It is exceedingly problematical if they will ever see their loans again, and they will hav to be satisfied that they will get it all back with compound interest in the New Jerusalem.

There has been a slight epidemic just lately amongst the clergy of indecently assaulting young girls, and one, a Roman Catholic priest, has been sentenced to a year's imprisonment; one or two were fined, and others managed to get off.

G. J. Holyoake has just started for the States, but as he goes only to report on the subject of emigration, he will, no doubt, confine himself to that subject.

Charles Watts leaves in the course of a few days, and will be in New York shortly. I believe he intends making a lecturing tour, and I trust he will meet with plenty of support among the friends of the cause. He is a very able lecturer as well as writer, and is well worth hearing. Being a most excellent debater, it is to be hoped he will hav an opportunity of displaying his abilities in that line. The audience will be well repaid for their attention. Fraternally yours, J. L. D.

A Discussion in the Far West.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Once in a while, when our Liberal Pacific coast press won't do its duty, I find myself compelled to molest you. I hope you will giv me the space for the following:

The great blast from the horn of Oregon's champion of the Bible, Mrs. Overlin, of East Portland, as published in the New Northwest, came to a sudden stop. Finding herself not capable to parry the blows of Mrs. Everest's, our great Liberal come batant, any longer, she withdrew her forces from the field by announcing that she would renew the battle in a different shap and style after a more thorough preparation.

Reasoning more conclusiv in refutation of Mrs. Overlin's doctrins (if such they were) than Mrs. Everest furnished could not be adduced, while Mrs. Overlin left Mrs. Everest's argument totally unanswered; and while Mrs. Everest, the champion of Liberalism in Washington Territory, showed through her whole argument the true Liberal milk of human kindness, her antagonist only proved her genuin gloomy and unrivaled orthodox Christian character.

No other argument but one so horrid that it will put the devil to flight can bring those gospel-suffering ladies on their knees. Such an argument I am willing to propose to East Portland's Bible champion, who intends to use her God as main pillar in all future debates. Now it is just this God of hers and his book I should like to combat, and show that the Bible when it is stripped of its false garb of divinity, is a book of imperfection, of contradictions, of falsehoods, and of obscenities. Can a book be divine that sanctions lying? Is a God who must resort to deception, if not downright lying, in order to accomplish his purpose a God worth recognizing? And yet the Bible records this, and this Bible God sanctions it.

A person's conscience must be hardened beyond description when, in face of such Bible evidence, such persons say that the Bible condemns lying. The devil, who is generally called a liar, and the father of lying, is honest in comparison. There is not one single passage of scripture to prove that the devil ever lied. It is the same Bible that teaches witchcraft, and when the godly Puritans hung Mary Dyer to the elm-tree on the Boston Common they only carried out the instruction and commands of the Christian Bible.

"Our God is immutable," Christians say. I think not, or else his own word, the Bible, tells a gross falsehood about him.

The Bible also records many scenes of debauchery that were approved, the Christain statements to the contrary notwithstanding. Yes, even holy debauchery is recorded in the Bible.

The Bible is the enemy of woman, and her desires were not taken into consideration at all, thus doing damnable injustice to women. Neither is the Bible record favorable to the pedigree of Christ. Strange that the few women mentioned in the Bible genealogy of Christ should, all of them, be those who were found guilty of crimes against common decency. Neither is the Bible God, according to his own word, all-powerful. If the Bible record is true, no sophistry can gainsay this assertion.

I regard the Bible as a very obscene publication. Should any other book contain one-quarter as much filth as appears in the Bible, the publishers of the same would be held as senders of obscene literature.

Some of THE TRUTH SEEKER reading Liberal friends of mine in Oregon and Washington Territory are requested to send THE TRUTH SEEKER with the foregoing challenge to Mrs. Overlin to East Portland, Oregon, the more the better, so she can distribute them among her assistant dark horses.

The great champion of supernatural religion of East Portland will oblige me by making the necessary arrangements with any paper she may choose; however, it has to be a journal that won't shrink from printing such passages from the divine holy book as I may see fit to cite, even should they bring a blush of shame to the cheek of modesty. It will, nevertheless, be the word of God. On my side no further preparations are required, and I hope the Christian champion will lose no time. I shall allow her to retain the assistance she had in her last argument, though I wish that the "godly" man would this time set his brain in quicker motion, otherwise I shall advise her to engage East Portland's whole clergy and all the rest of the piousblessed race. These dark horses are permitted, but no substitute will be accepted. I promis to drive the champion from chapter to chapter through her whole book, thus giving her the opportunity to get a fair view of the chasm, so commonly known as the cooking-stove, which heats the sacerdotal saucepan, at which her eternal father is chief cook, and in which he makes roasts and bakes his beloved children.

Come, champion, before Gabe's horn calls you to "kingdom come;" or else take your book, which you stomach has proved not vigorous enough to digest, with you into obscurity.

Nevada City, Aug., 1882. E. W. FITZNER.

A New Music Book.

He who produces a good song is a public benefactor. The people will sing, and the more of noble sentiment and of refined musical expression with which their songs are laden the more of pleasure and of culture will the people find. Every good song becomes, therefore, a public benefaction. If this be true of a single song, what shall be said of him who gathers in one book the best songs of the many gifted composers, and who thus places a whole galaxy of gems within the reach of those who sing?

Messrs. Hubbard Brothers, of Philadelphia, well known as enterprising publishers, hav done a genuin service for the people in the production of their splendid new issue, "Treasury of Song." It contains nearly 300 of the choicest gems of song suited for home use, extending over 500 royal octavo pages, the whole printed on superior paper from clear, new type, and bound in so flexible a manner as to be really charming. Its editor, Professor D. H. Morrison, of Philadelphia, is a distinguished musical instructor and a superb baritone artist. He knows the favorits of the people, and has met their wants most happily.

Myron W. Whitney, the great American basso, says of this book, "I am happy to express to you my cordial indorsement of 'Treasury of Song' as a most desirable book for the home circle, and the excellence of its selections as deserving great praise."

A specially attractiv feature of this work is a series of sketches ank portraits of distinguished composers and singers. In all respects the book is unquestionably first class.

THE Ausyrii, a sect peculiar to the Lebanon mountains of Syria, hav a singular creed. They say "There are five persons in the godhead. These five are three, these three are two—this five, this three, this two are all one!" What silliness! How sensible and simple and consonant with common sense, logic, and authentic is our own creed in preference, that there are three persons in one. Foolish people to say five are in one.—Walpole's Ausyrii.

Five Questions and Five Answers.

STONE, PA., Sept. 4, 1882.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Several copies of your paper hav been purposely thrown in my way by one of your subscribers, and as I hope I am not altogether invulnerable to truth through my early training, I come to you for a little light on a few subjects that are dark to me. I append a few questions which I hope merit an answer.

1. If the Christian religion is true, what advantages will you derive from destroying our belief in it?

2. If your work was already accomplished, would you not hav despoiled man of all those virtues which make life worth living?

3. If the world is bad with religion, can Liberalism make it better, and how?

4. Do the Liberals suppose that scientific lectures delivered every Sunday will turn men from their unlawful lusts, make them better men, and exalt their natures?

5. What has Infidelity done for the world, and what does it propose to do, that we should place any confidence in it?

Respectfully yours, W. M. WHITEHEAD.

REPLY.—It affords us decided pleasure to giv what light we are able, to any person in search of truth. We do not claim to hav more truth than many others of our fellow-beings, but what we possess we are quite willing to impart. We will at once proceed to answer our correspondent's questions.

1. If the Christian religion is true, there is no advantage to be derived from destroying belief in it. Reason and justice forbid that truth should be destroyed. But that little word if is terribly in the way, and at that very point hinges all the argument between Christianity and a non-belief in it. It is just because we believe that Christianity is not true that we oppose it. Believing it is as false as the older myths and absurd systems upon which it is founded, we disbelieve it is as we do them, and we oppose it as we would oppose them were they as persistently pressed upon us.

We conceive Christianity, like the most of the religions of the world, to be founded upon a radical and incurable error, and that is supernaturalism. Equal with the ancient religions of India, of China, of Persia, of Assyria, of Egypt, of Phœnicia, of Greece, of Rome, of Germania, of Scandinavia, and many other countries, Christianity is founded upon the belief in a power superior to nature—a power that created nature and the entire universe from nothing; and this supernatural being is held to be the author and first cause of everything that exists. This, as remarked, we regard as the great fundamental error upon which nearly all religions are founded.

We conceive it to be one of the axioms of truth that something was never made from nothing. It is utterly impossible for a man or a god, or a million of men or gods, to create one ounce of something from absolute nothing. The thing is utterly unthinkable. What, then, exists to-day always did exist in some form. The changing of matter from one form to another is not creation; it is evolution. The only thing that can truthfully be termed creation is making a part of a world, a whole world, or thousands of worlds from nothing, which, to repeat, is an utter impossibility. It is more unreasonable to hold that the universe came from nothing than that God came from nothing. If the universe must necessarily hav had a beginning, so must the creator. If it is reasonable to say the creator always existed, it is equally so to say the universe always existed.

It is clear that the supernatural theory of Christianity is just as absurd and just as untrue as the theory of all the other religions based upon supernaturalism. Every event that has ever taken place was natural—produced by a natural cause. No event has ever taken place that did not hav a natural cause to produce it. All causes are natural causes. All results are natural results. There is nothing above nature, nothing below it, nothing beyond. All existence belongs to nature, and is but a part of it. The most absurd idea that ignorant man has indulged in is that there is a power or a being superior to nature. The God idea is the great central error which man has conceived. The belief in gods and devils is the central superstition around which all other blinding superstitions hav clustered. Because man, in his ignorance, but slightly understood nature, he foolishly decided that nature is limited, and must hav had a maker. Nature is too great, too grand, too universal, to ever hav had a beginning, or to hav been brought from nothing. To imagin a creator of nature, then, has been the great error of man. Nature, we know, exists—there are millions of proofs of it. We hav no proof that any god exists. It is wiser, then, to accept what is, rather than to spend our lives in imagining what is not.

Christianity probably rests upon a more slender and insecure foundation than any other religion in the world, or at all events it may be truthfully said there is no more unfounded religion known to man. It simply rests upon a fable and a dream. It is an outgrowth of Judaism, and that religion rests solely upon the fable of the creation of the world (less than six thousand years ago) in six days; of the forming of man from the dust of the earth, and of woman from the man's rib; of their being placed in a fine garden, where knowledge and eternal life grew upon trees, where a learned snake spoke human language fluently and persuaded the woman to eat the fruit of the tree of knowledge, by which the pair were not only cursed, but by which simple act countless millions of their unborn children and descendants were cursed also. We may well know the story to be a fable, for in all cases where animals are said to speak the language of men the story is a fable. Æsop did a good deal of this sort of fable-telling, making all kinds of animals to talk the language of men, but he did not suppose any sensible person would believe that the animals really spoke human language, but he simply used that mode to teach moral lessons. He told fables, knowing everybody would understand they were only fables, and the world was not deceived.

According to this Jewish and Christian fable, the world, including man, has existed less than six thousand years, the earth is older than the sun, and trees, shrubs, grasses, and plants of all kinds grew and produced flowers, fruits, and seeds before the sun came into existence. There is nothing now much better understood than that this fable possesses not the slightest truth. There is abundance of proof that the earth is not only tens of thousands of years old, but it is highly probable that it has existed hundreds of millions of years—yea, that in some form it has existed forever. The strata of rocks forming the crust of the earth positivly prove that the earth has existed through prolonged eras, upon which no limit can be placed. No scientist now believes that the sun is younger than the earth.

Nothing, again, is better demonstrated than that man has lived on this earth for more than six thousand years. The shortest era of man upon the earth is now set down by scientific men at fifty thousand or a hundred thousand years. Human fossils imbedded in the rocks of the earth's surface, human bones found in England, Wales, and other places, in caves, side by side with the bones of animals which for thousands of years hav been unknown in those localities and which only liv in the torrid zone; the great periods of time necessary for the poles of the earth to so change as to place England in the torrid zone must hav begun very, very long ago. The implements of the stone age, found in various localities, all afford incontestable proofs of man's great age upon the earth. Other proofs of the same fact are far too numerous to be mentioned in this connection. But the great age of the earth and the age of man upon it were wholly unknown to the writer of the book of Genesis, and the rational and truthful conclusion is that that story is merely a fable, and therefore untrue, especially as it all rests upon the simple assertion of an unknown person.

This is the foundation upon which Judaism and Christianity rest, and it is a foundation of untruth. If the foundation of a system of religion is false, the system itself must be false. Nothing can be truer than this.

The dream, which is the twin pillar of Christianity, is all the authority which the world has that Jesus was the son of divinity and that he was begotten upon the person of a young virgin. This dream was told by a person said to be Matthew, in a sort of narrativ attributed to him. The earliest period which is claimed to be the time when Matthew wrote that story is fifty years after the advent of Jesus, and almost half a century after the old man Joseph had gone to his grave, for he was an old man when the dreaming was done. What is the real value of a dream, whether by an old man, a young man, or a woman of any age? Has a dream any real value? If a person dreams that he finds sacks of gold, that he is made a great king, or that he is elected president of the United States, does it for one moment make it true? No; dreams are wholly without value; and if they are regarded as of any consequence the regarder is sure to be misled. They are often the result of unsound sleep, of an overloaded stomach, or of a diseased and impaired condition of the body, and are the most valueless of all the vain imaginings which flit across the brain. No person of sound mind attaches importance to dreams. But this dream which the old man Joseph is said to hav dreamed is the only foundation on which to base the claim that Jesus was divinely begotten and that his mother was a virgin—a most frivolous foundation indeed upon which to establish such an unlikely event and upon which to build up the only system of religion capable of saving the world. But if the dogma that Jesus was virtually the son of God or of the Holy Ghost is taken away, the entire system is destroyed. If he was not the begotten son of God, and if he was not sent into the world by his divine father to save it and make it possible for a portion of the earth's inhabitants to escape eternal flames, then the divinity and the truth of the Christian system tumbles to the ground. Yes, if that dream is a fallacy, then Christianity is a fallacy.

But if there was any truth in that dream, and if it is of any consequence to the world what Joseph dreamed, it would seem a little more reliable could Joseph hav told it himself. There is not, however, the slightest intimation that the old man ever said a word about his having dreamed such a dream, or that anybody ever heard him relate it. Matthew appears to be the only person who ever knew anything about it. The writers of the three other gospels seem not to hav known anything about what Joseph dreamed, or if they knew of it, they deemed it of not sufficient consequence to say a word about it.

What chance, pray, had Matthew to know what Joseph had dreamed fifty years before? If any person now were to undertake to tell what Jack Downing or San Slick dreamed fifty years ago, would the recital be worth a single straw? Of course not, unless the invention might serve to amuse the reader for the moment. It would certainly be a weak foundation upon which to build a system of religion. But when the fact is learned that it was not Matthew who told the dream, nor wrote the story bearing his name, that the writer palmed off as Matthew, was not Matthew at all, the whole affair appears in its true light—a bald fabrication. Few facts are now better established than that the four narrativs named after Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were unknown in the world and had no existence until the latter part of the second century, a hundred and fifty years after Jesus was dead and buried. This fact is fully and unmistakably proved in the great English work called "Supernatural Religion" and in the "History of the Christian Religion to the year 200," by Judge Waite. There is not a particle of proof that those four "gospels" were known previous to the year 180. With this truth in view, the dream story, attributed to Matthew, but which was not told till a hundred years after Matthew was dead, falls utterly to the ground, possessing no more historical value than the story of "Old Mother Hubbard," or of "Jack and his Bean Stalk"—a frivolous basis, indeed, for a system of belief which the world is commanded to accept as divine truth.

So much for the fable and the dream which form the foundation of the Christian religion. They are wholly valueless and false. They merit not the slightest respect from any sensible person who is really in search of the truth. They are the inventions and vagaries of designing but ignorant men, and should no longer be gulped down as divine truth by an unthinking world. As no fountain can rise above its source, so no religious system can be truer than the foundation it rests upon. In this light, then, Christianity is unfounded and false. No belief among men is more so.

Space will not be taken to enlarge upon the fact that the doctrin of a demi-god, or of a son begotten by God, of a virgin's conceiving without the services of a man, was not first held by Christians. These dogmas were common in several of the older pagan religions. Christna of India is a striking instance of this kind, and he was believed in a thousand years before the time of Jesus.

The second question is, "If your work was already accomplished, would you not hav despoiled man of all those virtues which make life worth living?" To this the answer is emphatically and forever "No." There is no virtue in man's believing senseless fables and dreams to be divine truth. There is no virtue in believing falsehood. There is no merit in accepting vagaries and inventions as truth and reality. A sham is a sham, and though repeated millions of times it is still a sham, and can never be anything else. Virtue consists in truth and in disseminating it among men. Real truth is in nature or the universe, not in idle fables and dreams, the inventions of a designing, wily class of men, who liv by playing upon the fears of credulous dupes. Man is never filled with virtue by believing a lie, and is never despoiled of virtue by being taught the truth. The great mistake of all the religions based upon supernaturalism is their falseness. The foundation being false, they cannot be otherwise than false. Let it be repeated, there is no virtue in telling a falsehood, though a thousand times repeated; there is no virtue in believing a falsehood.

It is the greatest mistake to say that Jesus taught the best morals in the world, and that Christianity has a monopoly of good morals. Waving entirely for the present the unhistorical character of the story of Jesus and of his divine parentage, which, unfortunately, is wholly unsupported, it must be admitted that good morals were taught in the world long before the time of Jesus. Menu taught good morals; Zoroaster taught good morals; Buddha taught most excellent morals—in many respects superior to those of Jesus; Confucius taught very good and practical morals; Thales taught good morals; Pythagoras taught excellent morals; so did Socrates, Plato, Bias, Zeno, Aristotle, Epicurus, Cicero, Seneca, Philo, Hillel, and very many others. It is also a very false claim to set up that Christianity possesses all the virtue in the world. No greater mistake could be made. From a recent trip around the world, and a visit to all the principal countries of the earth, we hav arrived at the conclusion that Christian nations are guilty of ten times as much cheating, lying, robbing, drunkenness, prostitution, and crime generally, in proportion to numbers, as the pagan world.

In Asia alone there are five hundred millions of believers in the teachings of Buddha—about twice the number of all the believers in the teachings of Jesus; and it is a great truth borne out by observation and the statistics of the various countries that there is fully ten times as much immorality among the nations which hav embraced Christianity as among the followers of Buddha. This statement can be thoroughly sustained by proof of the most reliable character.

Another truth is that, the doctrins of Christianity are not calculated to make the believer in them happy or tranquil in mind. On the contrary, the promulgation of Christian dogmas has produced more unhappiness among men than all other religions combined. Christianity possesses nothing new or original in its creed, being made up of the old patches and fag-ends of the systems of religligion which existed a thousand years before it; but still it has a more malicious and cruel God, a more powerful devil, a hotter and more perpetual hell than any other religion, All this can be fully demonstrated. Let now a single case be alluded to.

The last issue of the Sunday Mercury contains a full account of John C. Paulison, a prominent lawyer of Paterson, N. J., becoming hopelessly insane from listening to preaching in a Methodist camp-meeting near that city, where the burning and lurid flames of hell were so vividly described as to make a painful and fatal impression. So affected was this lawyer with the description of hell which he listened to that his mind became wholly unbalanced, and he thought he had died and was taken to the place of terrible torment of which he had heard. Yes, even while this infernal talk was being indulged in, Mr. Paulison suddenly threw up his arms and made a dash for the woods, yelling at the top of his voice, "I am dead; I am in hell." He raved on until he fell with exhaustion, when he called upon those who had come to his aid to cover him with dust and ashes, again declaring that he was dead and his soul lost. He grew worse until it took six persons to manage him. He was taken in a carriage to the railway train, and then home, where his raving continued, he still insisting that he was dead and must be buried. He recognized his wife, and insisted that she was in hell with him. In a few hours he became much worse and had to be conveyed to an insane asylum, and it is now thought he can liv but a few days.

This is one of the legitimate results of believing the Christian religion. In fact, it is difficult to understand how any person can keep his senses for fifteen minutes who really believes in the hell which Christianity teaches—a hell prepared by the creator of the world, in which to burn, and that to all eternity, more than nine-tenths of all his offspring. If a man believes that his father and mother, his brothers and sisters, his wife and children, and himself, too, hav but one chance in ten of escaping that horrible fate, insanity is the most natural result. By believing this harrowing doctrin thousands and millions of men, women, and children hav been rendered utterly wretched, and this belief has caused more unhappiness to those who hav accepted it than all other religions in the world. It is for this reason, and others akin to it, that THE TRUTH SEEKER so earnestly opposes the Christian religion. Well would it be could a religion which causes such unhappiness and such insanity be obsolete in the world.

The third question is, "If the world is bad with religion, can Liberalism make it better, and how?" The answer to this is, Truth is more conduciv to goodness and happiness than is falsehood, and therefore Liberalism is more productiv of happiness than Christianity, which, by its devotees, is held to be the only true religion.

Liberalism is founded upon the truths of nature, and accepts fully the teachings of science. These are the basis of man's good and happiness, as well as the basis of all truth. Christianity, it is claimed, supersedes nature, nature's laws, science and its teachings as well, and sets up in place of these a belief in supernaturalism, opposing the highest sources of truth known to man. Liberalism wants many teachers of nature, science, and true morality, but no priests of supernaturalism; Christianity wants few teachers of nature and science, and employs hundreds of thousands of pedlers of supernaturalism.

Liberalism proposes to benefit the world by educating the human race in the truths of nature and reason, and to show up the falsity of ecclesiastical shams and absurdities. Christianity seeks to fasten these shams and absurdities upon the race, and to discourage confidence in nature and her infallible laws. Liberalism teaches naturalism and truth, while Christianity teaches supernaturalism and falsehood. To repeat, inasmuch as truth and nature are more conduciv to man's good and happiness than falsehood and superstition, so Liberalism is superior to Christianity.

To the fourth question—"Do the Liberals suppose that scientific lectures delivered every Sunday will turn men from their unlawful lusts, make them better men, and exalt their natures?"—the answer is unequivocally, Yes! True lectures are always better than false lectures; naturalism than supernaturalism. The teachings of true knowledge, which is only another term for science, is infinitly better than any form of supernatural falsehood. Liberalism teaches that man is responsible for every act that he performs, whether good or bad; that he must abide the consequences himself, without the slightest regard to his belief in another, or the merits of that other person's conduct. Liberalism teaches that man should perform good deeds because they are right and are more productiv of happiness than evil or unwise deeds. Christianity teaches that though a man may commit all the wrongs and all the sins in the calendar, if he will only believe in the merits of the blood of a person who died over eighteen hundred years ago, his evil deeds and his sins will all be wiped away, and he will become happy by the merits of that person, and simply by believing.

The term "unlawful lusts" is not very definit. Man's lusts and passions are a part of his being, and without them he would not amount to much. The true object of life is to keep these in abeyance to the reason which far outranks passion. This is done by cultivating the intellect and increasing love of truth. The teachings of supernaturalism do not destroy men's lusts and passions. As a proof of this it may be stated that even the teachers of supernaturalism themselvs often indulge in the lowest forms of passion and lust. A recent publication, termed "Crimes of Preachers," givs over seven hundred well-authenticated cases of lustful indulgences on the part of clergymen within the past six years; and it is probable that not one case in ten comes to light. Christians hav no stones to throw at Liberals on the score of "unlawful lusts."

The fifth question is, "What has Infidelity done for the world and what does it propose to do that we should place any confidence in it?" Infidelity, rationalism, and scientific investigation, which may all be ranked together, hav done very much to show the errors in the teachings of supernatural religions and the fallacies of the theological theories of creation, the era of man on the earth, the superiority of nature's laws and truths, of the facts of science over the blind and deluding character of supernaturalism —of mythical beings and their absurd revelations. They hav furnished to the world such men as Copernicus, Galileo, Bruno, Servetus, Spinoza, D'Holbach, Voltaire, Volney, Paine, Hume, Combe, Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel, Draper, and many others who hav brought the truths of science and reason to the knowledge of man, thereby doing a thousand times more benefit to the world than all the priests of supernatural religions which hav lived in the last five thousand years.

The advocates of science and truth propose to continue in the search of nature's truths, to learn more and more of her deep mysteries and hidden lessons, and to make these known to the world. They believe that truth is the greatest treasure which man can possess, and that the investigation of truth is infinitly better than embracing falsehood and error. They feel positiv that truth, as it exists in nature, is a thousand times more elevating and useful to mankind than all the myths about gods and devils and hells that ignorance and priestcraft hav ever devised. This investigation of truth, this search of the real, and the study of nature, are well calculated to inspire and strengthen the confidence of reasoning, thoughtful people.

It is to be hoped that the questions of friend Whitehead are satisfactorily answered and in accordance with the truth revered by all good men. Should he wish to ask any other questions, let him not be diffident. We will endeavor to reply to them as well as we know how, and to giv him the truth as we understand it.

Liberal Reforms.

In the progress of life, and in the advance which we should make in the cause of Liberalism, there is much good work which, from time to time, should engage our attention. It will not answer for people who claim to be progressiv to set stakes and say, "Here only will we abide," nor to be content to always remain in one locality. We should rather seek to advance in whatever will conduce to improve society and to lessen the ills under which we labor, and to increase the well-being of the community.

We cannot expect the time will ever come when there will not longer be ills to assuage and no charities to dispense. The poor and the afflicted we shall always hav with us; orphans will need to be succored, and the aged and helpless will need to be provided for. Children will always hav to be taught in the various branches of science and learning, and the schools for such purposes should be free from theological bias and error.

So far as practicable Liberals should sustain these institutions among themselvs, and should v i to make some sacrifices to do so.

It is cheering to see that a begininng has been made in Liberal, Missouri, to found a home for orphans, where they can be properly educated, and be taught habits of industry and thrift. Our Polish friend, A. Minski, made a very liberal bequest of one thousand dollars to begin this orphan asylum in Liberal, and others hav made smaller contributions in the same direction. A kind of stock company has been formed, the shares being made as small one dollar each. Certificates are given for each share, and every share-holder is entitled to a vote in the business meetings pertaining to the officers and management of the asylum.

This movement is a commendable one, and it is to be hoped the time is not far distant when Liberal orphan asylums may be organized in other portions of our country. It is not proposed that none but the children of deceased Liberals shall hav a home in this asylum, but that any homeless orphans may be eligible. The stipulations are that the education shall be of a secular character, and that theology shall form no part of the inculcations placed before the children. The principle is right; it is worthy of a wide following.

Schools and institutions of learning will always be in order. At the Watkins Convention considerable was said about the establishment of a Liberal university, or at least a school, where the children of Liberals can be sent, and where they may be taught the various branches of education common to other creditable schools, and entirely free from sectarian and doctrinal features. A considerable fund will be necessary to make such a school a practical success.

But it is a feasible undertaking for the Liberals in towns to hav schools in their communities where Liberal teachers can be employed at a reasonable expense, and where no theological lessons or ceremonies will be fed to the pupils. There are many towns in the country where there are Liberals enough to support a school of this kind without being severely taxed, if co-operation and liberality are the incentivs. This can be done in connection with Liberal lectures, the same person acting as both teacher and lecturer. On another page, W. S. Bell, of Boston, has a brief and very sensible article upon this subject, and it should not be overlooked. Such persons as are capable of giving instructiv lectures once or twice a week to the adult class and can teach the children of the same through the week should not be allowed to remain idle. They are too useful to be unemployed. The objections of Liberals to sending their children to sectarian schools, or where sectarian dogmas form a portion of the course of education, are so great that those able to help defray the expenses of a Liberal teacher should not be slow in moving in this matter. There should be dozens of Liberal schools in our expanded country.

LIBERAL INSURANCE

Is a subject upon which several Liberals feel much interested. It is proposed to add to the Liberal League movement an element of mutual insurance. This proposition strikes us favorably. To begin with, life insurance is a desirable thing if conducted on a fair and equitable basis and is not too expensiv. Mutual insurance is unquestionably better than that of stock companies. There are several mutual companies in successful operation, and which hav proved satisfactory to the parties interested. Notably among them are the United Workingmen and the Legion of Honor. These hay been organized several years, and hav become very popular with those who hav helped to build them up. No large capital is required to run the business; the officers are paid moderate salaries, economy being a quality largely encouraged. Small yearly dues only are required to meet the running expenses, the premiums being made up by assessments upon members, and which are only made when the death of a member takes place. Those who pay two dollars per year are entitled to two thousand dollars for the wife and family when they depart this life. To pay this sum upon the death of a member is not a heavy tax, and the sum of two thousand dollars is very convenient for the widow who is left to struggle through the world alone.

There are Liberals enough in the country to organize several mutual insurance companies. The machinery and officers of the Liberal League is sufficient without making it necessary to incur much additional expense. It is believed the movement will impart life and tenacity to the League. The tendency for Leagues is to become dull and lifeless, and to practically die out. This is much because there is no money interest in them to keep up the movement. It is thought that the insurance feature in connection with the League will not only serve to induce persons to join the League, but will afford something to keep up its life and to sustain its interest.

A movement of this kind has been inaugurated by the Liberals of Port Jervis, N. Y., and it cannot be seen why the thing should not be general over the country. Let the matter be agitated in the approaching Liberal League congress to assemble on the 29th at St. Louis. More on this hereafter.

Liberals Should Look on the Bright Side.

A FEW WORDS TO A CORRESPONDENT.—NO. I.

The few Liberals I am personally acquainted with hav not, to my belief, increased their chances of happiness. They hav lost the hope of the future, and hav gained nothing in its place. They are lonely, while the Christian has his church, his Sunday-school, his concerts, picnics, etc. The Liberal has nothing. He seems to be aimless, without any motiv to sympathize with his co-believers. With perfect freedom to obey all natural law, I find that they hav no better health, no greater pleasures, no better success financially, than their Christian neighbors. A.

If our friend was blessed with a more hopeful and sanguin disposition, perhaps he would see more of the bright side of Liberalism, and realize how rapidly progress and improvement are gaining ground under the fostering care and protection of Infidelity. He would see that every progressiv movement, and every invention of importance, are compelled to make their way in spite of the efforts of the church to stop them. Does not every labor-saving machine, every invention that adds to the comforts or pleasures of this life, "add to our chance of happiness?" If we hav "lost the hope of the future," was it a real loss? Was it more than the empty shadow of a false, delusiv dream? If I spend twenty years of my life hoping I shall invent perpetual motion, is it a loss when I learn the phantom I pursued was only a chimera of my own imagining? To lose the hope of an impossible nothing is to waste no more time grasping at empty air. It is to leave the mind free to do something useful and beneficial to ourselvs and the world.

And if we hav lost this ignis-fatuus of a falsity, we hav gained the deep, pure joy of knowing that hell is an empty void, and all its horrors are wiped out from the pages of our minds. We see no more young, tender girls standing on plates of red-hot iron for endless ages; no more devils pitching poor, helpless unfortunates into boiling lava and sulphureous flames. We see no more serpents twisting and coiling around writhing forms of suffering brothers and sisters who happened to be born under a cloud or led astray by unfortunate environments. Is all this loss not a pure gain of joy, hope, and happiness to every kind, tender, benevolent, and charitable spirit? Is it no gain to feel that man's destiny is in his own hands? That gods do not create the lunatics, the deformed, and the idiotic? That they do not send whirlwinds, pestilence, fire, and flood? That they do not kill and take from us our darlings whom we love more than life itself? Is it no gain to know that we hav power to generate a race of beings who shall as far transcend the present race as we do the wild savages of central Africa? Is it nothing to know that the universe is governed by laws, and that we are free to learn these laws and make them our servants and helpers toward creating purer and higher aspirations and achievements?

As to Liberals being "lonely," I do not see it in this light. If we hav no congenial companions with whom we can meet socially, we are free to stay at home and commune with the best minds of the earth, living and dead. We hav the best thoughts of the best writers, in cheap, handy volumes within the reach of all, and we can enjoy the delights of those upper ten at any time we choose. We can write and exchange thoughts with other Liberals all over the land; and right here let me tell you there is a world of joy and a delightful school for improvement to be found in a good correspondence earnestly carried on, and if possible let the two be of different views and beliefs, so there will be room for friendly argument and careful comparison of views. There is another side also to this "lonely" question. We can always hav society if we seek it; always hav meetings if we get them up. There is no special need of one's companions believing just as they themselvs do to make social meetings agreeable and useful. There are good, kind, intelligent, and interesting men and women who believe in gods, hells, devils, and bibles, and swallow the whole creed of faith. All that is needed to make meetings between Christians and Infidels just as pleasant as one could desire is common courtesy and a broad, wide, and loving charity that remembers we are all what we are by force of circumstances.

Now I hope every lonely Liberal who wants more society, will at once take steps and obtain it. It is in our own hands if we only labor to achieve it. We are the only Infidels in Snowville, yet we are never "lonely." When a good preacher comes to the town the people take pains to let us know it, and we often go and hear him. If we learn nothing new, we hav the social meeting with neighbors and friends, and get our enthusiasm for truth stirred up by hearing the fables and delusions rehearsed and rehashed. Then I helped to inaugurate a Ladies' Reading Club, which has met weekly for some years, and though there are four preachers' wives in the club, I hav always been president, and I hav read many Liberal books in it. The two large volumes of the autobiography of that excellent and most remarkable woman Atheist, Mrs. Harriet Martineau was read, and now I am reading "The History of Woman Suffrage," by Anthony, Stanton, and Gage. These are live books, that only live thinkers care to read, and the perusal of them proves that our club is a live one, if there is only one Infidel in it.

And this club has started several others; one out at Liberal, Mo., where they also hav a Liberal Sunday-school, for which Elmina writes "Little Lessons," thus doing something to drive away the demon of loneliness. Has friend A. tried to do his share in this line? We ought not to complain of the evils and discomforts of present conditions unless we also do our level best to improve them.

"All hail to the man of cheerful heart!
Who tells of the joy yet in store for all,
Who holds that each soul has an angel part,
And never is goodness beyond recall."

Great Rejoicing in California.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: A real sensation has been produced here by the full reports sent by telegraph of the great Freethinkers' Convention, which lasted five days and terminated yesterday at Watkins Glen, N. Y. The leading dailies of the city published this morning the resolutions in full as passed at the Convention yesterday, and it is no exaggeration to say that they are magnificent resolutions, worthy of the great cause we advocate and of the great men who hav made the Watkins Glen Convention famous all over the United States. The telegrams published in the city dailies of the 26th inst. gave the names of all the leading Freethinkers present, with Col. Ingersoll at the head. One of the journals in the telegram of that day said that $300,000 was subscribed at the Convention for founding a Freethought university, while the telegraph made a rural journal put the figures at $30,000.

In a word, the proceedings as published in the press here startled the Christians, for they did not know that a great convention of American Freethinkers was being held; in fact, were in total ignorance on the subject. Imagin their astonishment to see such full and striking reports. No event has ever transpired that has given such an impulse to Freethought on this coast as the Watkins Glen Convention. All are praising that heroic worker, H. L. Green, for his masterly work of organization, for it is but truth to say that were it not for him there would be no such Convention. All praise also to such great minds as Col. Ingersoll, Judge Waite, Courtlandt Palmer, T. B. Wakeman, D. M. Bennett, ex-Governor Robinson, George Chainey, S. P. Putnam; Burnham, of Michigan; Ingall, of North Carolina, and others who made the Convention such a grand success.

The Freethinkers of this city hav rejoiced in heart, and especially do we hail the prospect of a Freethought university as one of the noblest projects of the great and universal Freethought movement. Let us forward it and the Liberal Natural Orphan Home and other practical works. At last we begin to see the beautiful light approach. We hav watched and waited long, and the triumph is at hand. Let all Freethinkers rejoice. Personally let me congratulate my noble friend Green for his triumphant success. BYRON ADONIS.

Liberal Education.

At the Convention of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, held at Watkins, N. Y., Aug. 23–27, the question of education came up for discussion, and it was the unanimous opinion of those present that the time had come when the Liberals of this country should begin to giv direction to the education of their children. Heretofore, and even now, the children of Liberal people must submit to recitations and religious exercises which are loaded with superstition and mummery. And there is no redress. The father is taxed for the support of the common school, but if he complains that his child is being taught certain religious doctrins which he does not want taught to him, he gets no redress. The only alternativ is to withdraw the children from the school, but he must bear the burden of a school tax all the same.

Most of the Liberals of to-day hav suffered greatly from the barbarous teachings of the common schools. And now the only way to overcome this evil is to begin, even if it must be in a small way, to establish schools upon whose doors shall be written for the eyes of superstition, "Positivly no admittance." There are doubtless many places in the country where small schools composed of the children of Freethinkers might be instituted. In not a few towns and cities the office of lecturer and teacher might be combined in one person. A lecturer upon Liberal questions on Sunday and a week-day school in which there would be no nonsense or rubbish crammed into the youthful minds, would not fail to soon make itself felt as a great moral power in the community. Besides, the combination of the offices of lecturer and teacher in one would make it practicable where Liberals are yet not very strong.

Personally I am so thoroughly convinced of the practicability of this method that I am willing to try the experiment. We need to start schools for our children if we would save them from the nightmare of superstition and bigotry.

I shall be pleased to correspond with the Liberals of the country upon this matter, and initiate this new movement by starting a school in connection with a Freethought lectureship in some eligible place. W. S. BELL.

Justice.

There is an old adage that to me seems to contain within its unpretending wording a grand and sublime principle of justice, viz., "They who would be free, themselvs must strike the blow."

This was practically demonstrated in not only the war of the Revolution, but in the war of the Rebellion; the first, liberating the people of the United States from the enslaving conditions that England, or "the mother country," as she was called, imposed, the latter not only the Southern slaves, but the slave-holder also. For the bond-holder is a slave to his selfishness as well as the bondman is subject to the restraint that slavery imposes.

Men hav prated long and loud about the freedom of American institutions, but to the close observer it exists more in name than in fact. How many of our institutions of learning admit woman to their educational privileges and emoluments? Very few. Then "taxation without representation" is the rule where women hold property in their own right. And then again the humble artisan is not considered entitled to equal respect with the priest, doctor, lawyer, merchant, or legislator, when were he weighed in the even scale of justice, he would be quite as likely to raise the scale as either, in moral worth and spiritual growth.

Cannot enlightened minds see a way out of such a state of things? We think they can. Then why do they not unite their physical and mental strength, also moral and spiritual power, to bring about an amicable adjustment of these difficulties or differences?

One says, "I cannot associate with people that I do not like;" another, "I love to be looked up to too well to leave my position, even while I know that I'm living false to a principle of exact justice." And says a third, "I must hav bread and butter for myself and family, and know no other way that I can secure it so easily, and ride on the popular current."

Thus each pursues the wrong while many know the right. With this state of things existing, what are the hopes of the future for the human race to rest upon, if the majority rather sacrifice principle than to humbly and unselfishly liv out its claims, because of the carpings of Madam Grundy, love of notoriety, or, more common still, love of self? White-robed Justice may hold the scales evenly balanced until doom's-day, and the world never be saved from these limitations and consequent privation and suffering, whereas, were professed reformers, whether Materialistic, Spiritualistic, or scientific, to make practical what they perceive to be the truth pertaining to physical, mental, and moral well-being, there would be a long step taken in the right direction, bringing, "heaven, or harmony, down to earth," where each and every one could and would seek that field of useful activity they were the best adapted to work in worthily and well, which would entitle them to respectful consideration at the hands of all with whom they were called to associate.

The human organism is made up of many parts, that unitedly make a perfect machine, if all the parts are in their right place and property adjusted. And what is society itself made up of but the human form duplicated, or multiplied?

The human organism has a head, body, arms, hands, feet, etc., but the head cannot slight the claims of the hands with impunity, neither can the hands say to the feet, "We hav no need of you;" and all being necessary to make the whole a properly adjusted and perfect working model of use and beauty.

Thus it should be in society. That class of individuals best adapted to furnish mental force or activity to act in the capacity of head, those who are better adapted to labor with their hands, etc., furnish the physical necessities of the head, and receiving in exchange light, guidance, protection, etc., without humiliation on the one hand, or arrogance and selfish ambition or aggrandizment on the other.

Thus could all the heterogeneous elements in society be properly adjusted so that all could work for the good of each, and each for all, thereby fulfilling the requirements of the Golden Rule; or, in other words, meet the demands of nature, reason, science, equality, fraternity, and justice.

JULIA C. FRANKLIN.

"REMEMBER," said the venerable Brother Gardner, as he brought the proceedings of the Lime Kiln Club to a close the other evening; "remember, as we percolate homewards, dat while a pusson may ha va woice like a tornady an' a mouth like a woodshed, de man who winks wid his left eye allus gets de bes' glass of sody water."—Detroit Free Press.

Infidels, Tremble!—The Grand Army of Infidels Completely Squashed.

We hav a divine in Modesto said to be the best of the eight expounders of Jesus's doctrin, and representing the branch of the church's saints known here as North Methodist. He last Sunday attempted to prove clearly the existence of a personal God. You know such a feat has been tried time and again by the greatest thinkers—yes, ever since religion has had an existence—with a complete failure. It has been left for a Modesto divine to hav the grand honor of producing the lacking evidence in such a way and "kind that produce a telling effect upon all intelligent disbelievers." I now quote from the Farmers' Journal of Aug. 3d, which duly reported the sermon; and, as it might prove of great interest to Infidels at large as well as it has here, I will quote the portion giving the proof of a "personal God:"

"The existence of a God, though denied by a few, who as the fool in the Bible, went about trying to quiet the inward monitions of his conscience and the daily teachings of his experience by saying, 'There is no God; I know there is no God,' and yet is the same unbeliever confronted with the assertions of the whole civilized world that there is a God. Let this same man enter into the court-house either as witness, litigant, or juryman, and before he is allowed to testify or take any part in the proceeding he takes an oath, administered with his right hand extending toward heaven, and closing with the words, 'So help me God.' He must call on God to help him tell the truth, or he is not allowed to open his lips. This form has been prescribed by our legislature, and the combined wisdom of the whole civilized world has deemed it necessary to embody it as part of the law of the land. And why? Because just so much as God helps that man to tell the truth, just so much nearer will he come to tell nothing but the truth. In many courts, and indeed in most all the higher courts in this and all other civilized countries, in addition to taking the oath as here prescribed, they are required to kiss the Bible—the book of all books. Again, there is no one of the older and prominent societies in the world into which a man can enter unless in the most solemn form he declares his belief in the existence of God, and this declaration is made with God's book open before him, and its divine authority admitted. Why, let me ask the Atheist, is all this done? Because the experience of the whole world is that no man can be trusted to make a good neighbor, to do his duty to his brother, as he ought to, to dispense charity with a loving hand, to love and be kindly disposed to all around him, unless he believes in a God, and the stronger that belief is engendered in the member the better brother is he, the more charitable will he be, and in every respect will he make a better member of society."

Now, TRUTH SEEKER readers, can't you take in the position of this intelligent divine with "his visible evidences of the invisible existence and presence of an omnipresent, omnipotent God?"

I wish to state right here, and to the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, that this reverend gentleman and I had a sort of controversy in one of our local papers last February, I contradicting his assertion that Infidelity was all evil and Christianity all good. On proof being demanded, he threw foul aspersions on the character and teachings of our most prominent Infidel writers, amongst others those false charges against D. M. Bennett and Ingersoll. On demanding proofs, he backed down simply because the British Encyclopedia Britannica and he did not agree about the character of Hume, Bolingbroke, and others, against whom he launched volley after volley of gross abuse. Hon. A. Schell, of Knights Ferry, of this county, also demolished him so completely that it is only lately that he has commenced lying against Infidels. If he had any good sense he would notice in our daily papers that crimes are not committed by Infidels, but by deacons and divines.

Having interviewed D. C. Coleman, a noted Infidel who started D. M. Bennett around the globe, he says: "Damn; no. Urmy has not converted me, but if he was a Christian I swear I would giv up the church after hearing such a sermon."

Captain James says: "I am as firm as a rock. I am surprised that he is such a ninny as to hav such stuff printed and allow us Infidels to read it. I think less of him now than I did before. I thought he had a little sense."

C. C. Luther laughed loudly when I asked him if he was converted. "Well, it beats all, what our ministers will fall back on when driven to the wall." What! are you not converted? "Ha, ha, such stuff as that convert me? no, not by a damned sight!"

No; Infidelity is yet safe at this place, and the danger is now passed, and we can breathe freely again. If anything emanates from this eminent divine, and he dares to publish it, I will duly inform your readers. Who knows? there may something "come out" of Modesto yet! Yours for truth, and nothing but the truth, A. A. GILMOUR, M.D.

Theism.—Reply to Otto Wettstein.

No intelligent Theist believes in a creator or a creation. The universe consists of matter, force, and intelligence, all eternal and self-existent. There was no "great first cause," for all that is exists uncaused. Thus far we agree with the Atheist; but when he says that intelligence and force are only properties of matter made manifest under certain combinations, we halt, and beg leave to inquire how he knows that force and intelligence are attributes of matter? The fact that intelligence can be made manifest only under certain conditions of matter, which we call "organization," proves nothing on this point, for matter itself requires conditions before it can materialize, and it will retire utterly from the cognizance of the senses when the conditions are wanting. Who knows but that matter is only a manifestation of force and intelligence? That nature possesses within itself all the potencies and possibilities necessary to produce any known result, we believe, and that one of these potencies is intelligence, which, combined with force and matter, originates all the phenomena of nature. What intelligence is in its essence is an infinit mystery, and so is force an inexplicable mystery, and matter no less so—utterly beyond human comprehension.

A god who created nature is a monstrous absurdity; but a universal spirit existing as a part of nature is as rational to conceive of as to conceive of force. Think of force as an attribute of matter, and if you think deeply you are overwhelmed in the inconceivable. If you ask why this unseen intelligence pervading nature does not answer prayer and alleviate human misery, I reply, because it has but one mode of operation which will ultimate in the highest good of all. How there can exist an eternal spirit is no more of a problem than the existence of eternal force. MRS. C. HEDDON.

Mr. Hale Criticised.

MR. WINTER DISPOSES OF HIM IN A SUMMARY MANNER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Excuse these remarks on the article by J. Hale, Esq., whose title should be Old Brains. He seems to be submerged with brains and entities; some for this small world, and quite a supply for others. No doubt plenty of brain is a nice thing to hav, when it is not befogged with crude and whimsical notions. But I fail to see any other quality in those funny ideas peculiar to that long string of nothings, stretched out for egotistical effect, all of which is about as clear as mud. Pity persons hav not got sense enough to write a few plain and sensible words with a clear mind, if they desire to benefit others, and not seek to put a wrong construction on simple truths; for this gentleman must know well enough that no mental power can possibly exist distinct from a living, healthy brain. No man in his right mind can hav any other conclusion or conviction but what there must be an organized living brain to produce one single thought. That speculativ folly about an undying existence is all moonshine and the source of every pious swindle. If these Spiritualistic folks can liv just as well without brains as with it, why do they not get their brains scooped out and giv the thing a test? Brains do not seem to be of much use to them anyway. It would really be a pretty nice thing if all those immortality mongers were in full possession of the article. The hard-headed Materialists could do without their muddled or addled pates. This world is good enough for sensible people; senseless ones are a bore and can quit. It's awful sad that these wonderful fellows having such a superabundance of consciousness, and that without any material life, do not display it by making all sorts of wonderous things known to the world in a most unaccountable, unmistakable, and irrefragable manner, leaving everybody without one grain of doubt as to genuin life after death and decay. Go ahead, ye Spiritualistic cranks, and show up a grand circus of disembodied spooks, so that everybody might see the fun, and perhaps get a grain of faith therein. All statements without proof are worthless. Materialists cannot be satisfied with anything short of proof. Just show one real genuin spook and no sham; that will be a winning card. Trot him out, friends, that doubt and unbelief may vanish from the earth. A big reward is offered for the spook of old Nero, with his fiddle and bow. T. WINTER.

MISAPPLIED GENDER AND PERSONALITY.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It is not my purpose to either attack or defend the main argument, "Is Mind Material," of your correspondent James Hale, in TRUTH SEEKERS No. 34 and 35, but to call attention to an important fact, viz., that all defenders of a "supreme intelligence," and who avow "reasons for the belief in a spiritual, eternal power, intelligence, mind that controls the material universe," etc., are compelled to resort to the masculin gender of the Christian's personal god in order to express themselvs.

For instance, Mr. Hale says, page 554: "I can conceive of a supreme intelligence. . . . I do conceive of such an existence, and I believe that existence to be the only living and true God, though I cannot see him [a male god] through these material organs of vision." Again he says, on the same page: "It [Materialism] claims to dethrone the great eternal, banish him [masculinity] from the universe, and endow inanimate matter with an inherent force that does not belong to it to supply his [masculinity again] place in the universe."

It will be here seen how difficult it is to express one's idea of a "first great cause," "divine essence," "an intelligent invisible power—a mind, a spirit, a god—who handles matter as he [sex again] pleases," etc., without endowing these characteristics with the personality and sex of a man-god. Why should not Mr. Hale call "supreme intelligence," "invisible spiritual eternal power and mind" it, the same as he called idolatry and Materialism it, unless he believes this "intelligence, power, mind, spirit, or god" is a personal being of the male sex? Why should he designate these qualities or virtues—metaphor aside—with the personality and gender of he, his, him, himself, etc?

Let us, who do not believe in personal gods and goddesses, divest ourselvs of these terms and titles, these nouns and pronouns, and call it it, leaving such follies to the pagans who originated them and to the Christians, who hav copied their errors and rejected their wisdom. ELLA E. GIBSON.

A Workingman's Reply to Mr. Petty.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Criticism, when employed in a right spirit and for mutual benefit, I consider to be the most potent factor that can be employed in any reformatory movement. Hence I use it without fear or favor, and court it in return, for "I would rather be right than president."

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 28th J. Petty had a communication headed, "A Talk With the Workingmen." In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 1st I criticised some of the points of that communication, supplementing the criticism with some thoughts of my own on the subject in question.

In the same paper of July 22d friend Petty criticises the critic in such a bungling manner that I do not like to let it pass uncorrected.

I termed friend Petty's communication a disinterested effort. To this he replies, "I am sorry for that; I did not intend to make it so." Brother Petty, did you intend to tell the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that in writing that communication you were prompted by a selfish motiv—that you had a personal end to serve, an ax to grind? Now, you were either disinterested or you were selfish. Which horn of the dilemma will you take?

Brother Petty assumes to quote from my communication, "Is it not possible that a few of the Greenback organizations possess a Petty in amount of information on the subject of finance?"

The above quotation is equal to Guiteau's jumble on the gallows. It is no child of mine.

Again Brother Petty assumes to quote, "If Patrick Ford of the Irish World had no religion I should be apt to fall down and worship him." That is another child of Brother Petty's that he seeks to drop at my door, but it does not look the least like me, and I will not take it in. There are persons whom I love, and objects that I admire, but none that I worship, nor can any intelligent person draw any such inference from what I did say on the subject.

I suggested that organization was the thing most needed to advance the cause of the laborer, to which Brother Petty asks: "What prevents organization? Is it intelligence, or is it ignorance? If you say intelligence, then the more ignorance a man possesses, the better he is off."

If my friend Petty has not learned that it is much more difficult to organize independent thinkers than it is to organize ignorant plodders, then he has examined the subject with little profit. Let him select twelve of the most intelligent persons in his neighborhood and endeavor to organize them for a particular purpose, and within five minutes from the time he opens for business he will hav twelve different propositions to harmonize, and the differences would multiply on his hands. Let him select twelve ignorant persons for the same experiment, what would they hav to differ over? what would he hav to harmonize? But in taking this position I do not accept his conclusion "that then the more ignorance a man possesses the better he is off." If it is less difficult to organize the ignorant than it is the intelligent, it does not logically follow that the organization of the ignorant would answer the desired purpose. Our only hope is through organized effort directed by general intelligence.

Brother Petty still quotes, "We must become welded into one solid phalanx," and asks, "Will ignorance do it?" I do not see the pertinence of the question, as I hav made no plea in favor of ignorance; but I will answer the question, Yes. The church is a solid phalanx, and its cohesiv force is ignorance. The Democratic party is a solid phalanx, and its cohesiv force is ignorance. The Republican party is a solid phalanx, and its cohesiv force is ignorance. These phalanxes are led by intelligent knaves. We want a phalanx that will be governed by the general intelligence of those composing it. Now, Brother Petty, let you and me endeavor to harmonize our differences and help to that extent the organization of our forces that is slowly but surely going on. A WORKINGMAN.

A Letter from Charles Watts.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The following letter I received too late to read at the Watkins Convention. Will you please giv it a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER?

LONDON, ENG., Aug. 17, 1882.

H. L. GREEN, Dear Sir: Your kind invitation to the Watkin's National Convention has reached me this day. You will see from the date that it is quite impossible for me to get there in time. I am sincerely sorry, for it would hav given me great pleasure to hav been with you on such a memorable occasion. However, kindly giv my fraternal greeting to the Liberal friends with whom you come in contact, and say I wish their noble undertaking to emancipate the human mind from all phases of theological superstition every success.

I cannot state the exact date of my arrival in New York or Boston, as I hav to call at St. Johns and other places on my way in reference to some family business. On my arrival in your country I will communicate with you. In the mean time I shall take it as a special favor if you could collect the names and addresses of societies for which I could lecture throughout the states. In a few days you shall hav another from me with full particulars as to the route I shall take to get to New York. I expect to leave England about Aug. 23d. With kindest regards for one and all,

Yours in the cause of human progress,

CHARLES WATTS.

I shall be pleased to hear from Liberal friends or societies that would like to engage our distinguished friend from England. He should be kept constantly in the lecture field while here. And, by the way, our great Freethought Convention at Watkins should be followed up with Freethought meetings in all parts of the country. The ball should be kept rolling. H. L. GREEN.

[We hav just received a letter from Mr. Watts, saying he will not arrive in this city till the fore part of October, when he will be ready to begin his course of American lectures. The following is his list of subjects, and certainly they are sufficiently varied to meet the tastes of all Liberal communities. We hope Mr. Watts may receive a generous patronage. Letters for him may be addressed in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER office.—ED. T. S.]

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $1 to renew my subscription for four months. I hav taken your paper for six years, and I hav received every copy but one, and I shall continue to take it as long as I am able to pay for it. Let me congratulate you on your safe return home and the kind reception that you met while crossing the continent. I hope you may liv to be one hundred and ten years old, and your eyes may not become dim nor your natural strength abated.

Yours truly, H. W. JOHNSON.

EVANSPORT, O., Sept. , 282.

MR. EDITOR: Here is a hearty shake of the hand and a warm congratulation upon your safe return from your round-the-world trip. But as I suppose your are not at this time so much in need of congratulations as of "the one thing needful," I also inclose five dollars, three of which is to renew subscription, one dollar for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and the balance I throw in for "scripture measure" and for postage on the books. I received the first volume in due time, and have also received the second volume all right. Yours truly, D. L. COE.

PITTSBURGH, Aug. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: We are very glad to learn that you hav returned safe to your home and your many friends, who were anxiously looking for your return. I cannot use words to express enough of praise to you in your never-tiring advocacy of Freethought. Your description of oriental religions and their comparison with Christianity is good. The superstitions of both are the same, although they worship, as they think, different gods. My closing prayer is that you may liv long and enjoy health to defend our cause, as you are to-day without a peer in the cause of Liberalism. Yours fraternally, H. B. MAXWELL.

ELGIN, ILL., Aug. 7, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I am greatly pleased to learn that you hav arrived home safe and in good spirits. Your letters are a decided success in every respect, and are entertaining and instructiv. You hav certainly performed a great and good work, and how you ever found the time to render so much work in the brief amount of time allowed you between arrivals and departures on your journey is indeed a mystery. However, I am happy to notice you proved such an invincible thorn in the side of the slanderous and lying Joe Cook, of Boston, in Bombay. Permit me to congratulate you upon the complete victory and overthrow of the villain's schemes.

Yours for liberty, JAMES METCALF.

LA CROSSE, Sep. 1. 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad that you hav returned once more to your family and friends, notwithstanding the prayers of Comstock, Colgate & Co. to their God that you might never see the shores of America again. But they are like the man whom we read of in their holy Bible, viz., Satan stands at his right hand and his prayers become sin.

Inclosed please find $10—$3 for your paper from January, 1881, to January, 1882. Also please send me the bound volumes as fast as they are ready of your travels around the world, the "Godly Women of the Bible," etc. I wish that I could step in and see you and yours and have a good social chat about things both new and old. I still liv in hope that we may see each other again. Please accept my best regards to you and yours. Yours truly, JOSEPHUS SEELEY

CROTON LANDING, N. Y., Aug. 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $1, which please place to my credit for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I also send fifteen cents to pay postage on the second volume of my Round-the-World books. I think it is too much for you to giv three such nice books as they for $4.55. You shall hav the whole $5 for my books, and more if it's called for.

I herewith send you one of my truth seeker pinks, the only seeds out of the six varieties that came up. This little flower may bring some fond recollections of the Holy Land to your mind.

I hope you are quite rested after your long journey. I don't suppose there ever was a missionary sent on so long a journey who has had the benefit of so little prayer as yourself, and one who returned safer and sounder. CHARLES E. PETERSON.

NEW YORK, Sept. 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Are we living in the dark? A Rev. Mr. Nye surely thinks so, when he "lauds to the skies" the libertin Solomon. This man had seven hundred women whom he called wives, and three hundred paramours. Fair, is it not, to presume these one thousand women were pure when they met this holy blackleg? If so, did not this inspired rake seduce and debauch nine hundred and ninety-nine women? Where, then, was the Rev. Nye's just and merciful God? Was he paralyzed or asleep? In the language of Ingersoll: "No help from heaven. The skies are deaf, and dumb, and blind." If woman is to be protected man must do it. Millions hav been ravished upon the roadside while Nye's God stood looking on. In vain they cried to heaven for help. Their prayers died upon their quivering lips. Had they implored mercy from hell they would hav received as much. No wonder the Rev. Nye apologized for his God, and seeks to shield him behind man's words by singing,

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform."

Yours truly, W. W. FOSTER.

RICHFORD, VT., Sept. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad you hav performed the circuit of the globe and furnished us poor mortals with more information about men and things than ever was known since America was discovered—of the tremendous working of priestcraft and kingcraft; how they make our holy religion of the blessed Jesus, and the fabrical Ha Mashiac, the anoi nted of the Lord, save an ignorant world from an awful hell after we are dead. Palestine seems to be a fair specimen of what may be done in America, when the farm is all cleared up, and we get two holy gospel workers at each man's shoulders, screaming for backsheesh!

Well, this is the Lord's doing, and marvelous in our eyes. No more so than the man-trap in the Garden of Eden. Palestine shows to-day how we are all getting out of that trap. Our intellects are chained in childhood to old theologism; it is fashionable; it is popular. Whoso goes against the popular is damned, and damned if he does. That seems to be the holy idolatry all over the world. Mystagogs control the minds of men with early training, hell and immortal soul. An established fact. But I am getting old, and am glad to see the snare getting rotten. I hav been highly entertained with your letters; they are a choice treasure. Real fact alone is valuable. JOSEPH NOYES.

JACKSON, MICH., Sept. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just returned from the Spiritualist and Liberal camp-meeting, where much good seed has been sown. On Sundays there were about three thousand people on the ground, all eager to learn. Good order prevailed throughout the meeting. There was a slight attempt made to drop the word "Liberal" from the name, but it was tabled very quickly. There is some feeling that may show itself at the next annual meeting. It is hoped, however, not to result in a separation.

Let me say to the Liberals the cause of this feeling is because you do not turn out to the meetings and help to fight the enemy. You must know that Spiritualism is doing a work that you cannot do—reaching those you cannot reach. I cannot see why the Infidels (so called) cannot see the truth of Spiritualism. The public tests given by Mrs. Porter were the most astounding and convincing it has been our pleasure to witness.

The effort to start a camping-ground at Pine Lake, called Memoka, looks very encouraging. We were over the grounds and around the lake on the beautiful steamer that plows its waters. It is just the spot for a camp ground, a country home, college, and Liberal medical school, all of which will spring up at Memoka. I am ready to go forth in the spread of the truth as it is in Spiritualism and Liberalism or Rationalism. I hav been at it for the past fifteen years in the West. Will now answer calls from the East from Spiritual societies and Liberal Leauges. Or, where there are no societies, if parties will furnish to me a hall and advertise, I will stop at their place and work up an interest and organize if possible. J. W. KENYON.

CINCINNATI, O., Sept. 5, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to make a few remarks in defense of George Chainey against the highly cultivated consensus of the competent; not but what Bro. Chainey is well able to defend himself against every foe, but to show that others can step to the front, when such a man is assailed, and charge right home on the enemy. In all these United States there is but one Chainey, and this is to be deplored, inasmuch as there should be a thousand the very counterparts of that brave and solid man, who hath percolated through the muck and muddle of Christian theology, and none so honestly and vigorously attack the rotten fraud and struggle to reproach the cause on which all these cheats are founded. He clearly shows the impossibility of any God existing in the sky or any other place in the whole universe. He knows that all these systems of religion are the outcome of ignorance and knavery, and hang on the necks of millions a perfect incubus; and because he fearlessly exposes these vile shams and tries hard to enlighten the mental darkness on these questions, some pious cranks must assail him, but he is a match for all of them, and must win.

Unbelievers in religious superstitions should fraternize with each other all over the world, and try in every way to defend and console each other under trying circumstances, and use every effort to rid mankind of so vile a deception, which keeps them in groveling ignorance and plunders them through life.

I hope, friend Bennett, I do not trouble you needlessly. I am now over seventy years, and I strongly desire to spread the honest truth as found in nature. When dead, my work is done. T. WINTER.

A LETTER FROM INDIA.

BERHAMPUR, BENGAL, INDIA, July 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: You are aware how the Christian missionaries are striving hard to make proselytes of the nativs of this country by misrepresenting the biblical records and by fraud. We cannot any longer allow the wily and deceitful missionaries to go on that way when we hav come to know Christianity to be a pure fraud. I hav therefore commenced delivering addresses and lectures against Christianity, proving the fallibility of the Bible from the works of Western reformers to the school-boys and the masses, who generally fall victims to those religious and pious cheats; and, with the view of disseminating truth, I hav opened a Liberal and reformatory library, and commenced publishing my addresses, etc., both in English and Bengali. This movement is the first of the kind in this country, and I therefore need your earnest co-operation and sympathy for the cause of truth. To maintain a library will necessarily cost more than I can afford, so I hope our American authors and publishers of reformatory books, tracts, etc., will help me in my movement against mission-work in Bengal by donation of such books, tracts, pamphlets, etc., as they think will do best. Unless the American Liberal brothers help me for the sake of truth, I do not think I shall be able to go on with my work long. I intend to translate and publish in Bengali the American Liberal works and start a Liberal reformatory journal in the Vernacular, which, I am sure, will do a great deal to expose the false and delusiv doctrins of the so-called "miraculous and infallible book of Revelation." Reformatory and Liberal books and journals are a great desideratum in this country. Donations of Liberal and reformatory works, etc, will be thankfully received from the American brothers, who I hope will do their best to co-operate with me for the dissemination of truth, and will come forward with donations of Liberal and reformatory works to bring their Indian brothers into light as regards the true character of the Bible and Christianity.

I hav great confidence in you, and hope to hav your earnest co-operation and sympathy in this movement. I hope you will help me with a copy of your world-wide known journal THE TRUTH SEEKER and other anti-Christian works you think will do best to stop the missionary work in this country.

I hope you will insert this in your journal for the information of the American brothers who may take interest in this cause for truth, with such remarks as you may deem necessary.

KEDARNATH BASU, M. C. A. S.

[We mailed a number of books and pamphlets as above, and if other friends who feel so disposed will do the same, we are sure they will be duly appreciated.—ED. T. S.]

FOREST GROVE, OREGON, Aug. 20, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Here is our hand in congratulation upon your safe arrival home. I am very glad to hear of your return, and to read of the grand receptions tendered to you at home and abroad. Well, you hav, in my estimation, nobly earned them all. I hope your work of travels will meet with a large demand. I am very well pleased with the two volumes issued, and consider them the most interesting and instructiv books of travels I hav ever perused.

I was in hopes that you would giv Oregon a visit while you were on this coast, but I got disappointed. I think your presence in this town would exert a great deal of influence in mollifying the evil-minded followers of the mythical Jesus. Two of the leaders of the tribe hav lately fallen from grace; one, the Rev. Vandersall, of the Congregational church, was a short time ago expelled from his church for being too familiar with one of the sisters; the other, a Capt. Wilkenson, a street preacher, figured very conspicuously in a love affair, and the consequences were the reverend gentleman became very popular by having his photograph emblazoned in the New York Police News. Both of the above reverend gentlemen, before their evils were made public, were very vemonous in their attacks on Infidels. They were always telling what immoral people Infidels were. Yes, behind their large obscene Jew-book in the cowards' castle, they would lie, misrepresent, defame Infidels. Both of these men hav repeatedly told their dupes what a corrupt man R. G. Ingersoll was, and what evil effects his teachings were having upon the morals of the young and old. The Rev. Vandersall once told me that he wouly not hav a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER in his family because it was so filthy. I challenged him to produce a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER that contained a filthy passage, but he did not produce it.

Whenever I hear or see a preacher that is fanatical, I set him down as a slimy hypocrit, and I don't believe I miss it once out of a dozen times. I hav been in business the past five years, and I can giv you my word and honor as an Infidel that I hav never during that period lost one dollar by crediting Infidels; but I can show several hundreds of dollars of bad debts on my books opposit the names of believers in the Christian religion. They believe that Jesus pays it all; but I don't. If he does, and I knew his post-office address, I would send him a statement of accounts.

Inclosed please find post-office order for $9.00, for which credit as follows: $3.00 apply to the account of Mr. Bisby, Forest Grove, Oregon; $3.00 to the account of Mr. Bennett, of Greenville, Wash. Co., Oregon; I forget his initials, but he is, I think, the only subscriber you hav by that name at Greenville, so you can fix it that the money is to go on this account for THE TRUTH SEEKER. The remaining $3.00 credit to the occount of myself, $2.00 in payment for the book "Ingersoll on Talmage," and balance to apply on subscription of THE TRUTH SEEKER. With best wishes to yourself and wife and Macdonald, I remain your Infidel friend, W. C. CLOW.

MANKATO, MINN., Aug. , 2.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 as subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. The trial subscription is exceedingly satisfactory.

We are having a camp-meeting here, inflicted by the Free Methodists. It is none of your new-fangled milk-and-water affairs, but one of the genuin old Indiana backwoods style, "where the screams and the groans of the sinners rose" and where the ground was thickly strewn with sinners themselvs filled with the power of the Holy Ghost, especially the women.

We hav had a number of similar exhibitions here, but these were all females. One of them, who would not lie still where she fell, but kicked and screamed furiously, was carried into the adjoining house, rented and kept by the ministers of God, when the noise soon subsided. This reminded me of the story of the spider and the fly.

A gentleman from an adjoining county informs me that under the influence of these meetings held there some two months since, his niece, a very good but rather simple-minded young lady who has lately lost her mother, was affected to insanity when a prayer-meeting was called to cast the devil out of her, but for some cause unknown to the writer the Lord refused to answer their prayers, and she was taken to the hospital for the insane at St. Peters. She was sent home, however, with the doctor's orders that she be kept from these meetings; but her father, not having much force of character, again permitted her to attend, and she is now as bad as ever, and her friends fear that she is hopelessly insane.

Is it very wonderful that some people are driven mad at these orgies? Is it not more wonderful that any can pass through the ordeal of this pandemonium and retain their senses?

These people are perfectionists, and in their experience-meetings it is customary for them to say that they know they are beyond the possibility of committing sin. They stoutly maintain that they are absolutely perfect. It is refreshing to hear them try to picture the horrors of hell and the awful agonies of the damned. It reminds one of his boyhood days, when but few people had read geology and none knew the name of Charles Darwin.

When conversing with the refined and intelligent, we do not realize the vast amount of superstition still existing in free America. To read Henry Ward Beecher's article on "Progress of Thought" one would think it impossible for these fanatical Free Methodists to convert a single soul. Their success reminds us that there is still a great work to be done. That beautiful light which we see is only the dawn; or if the sun of truth has risen, it is still obscured by great clouds of superstition. Many generations may come and go ere those clouds shall all be rolled away, so that the benign light of truth shall illumin every mind in all the earth. If not all, many parts of the world hav had their periods of retrogression. In spite of all the progress that we hav made, new Christs may yet come on earth and establish new systems of religion that shall again drag us down to the level of the dark ages. Let us hope not; and let us endeavor to reach a plain of thought so high that superstition shall never again enslave the minds of men.

A LETTER FROM IRELAND.

KEADY, IRELAND, Aug. 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Will you kindly send me a catalog of Freethought literature published at your office, also a specimen copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, stating price of quarterly subscription postpaid to this country? If I like the journal I shall hav pleasure in becoming a subscriber and bringing it under the notice of my heterodox friends.

Freethought has made very little progress in this country. There is nothing which my countrymen stand so much in need of as intellectual emancipation from the mass of dogmatic absurdities which impede all real progress and foster the demons of intolerance and party hate. I fully agree with the dictum of the great French physiologist, Jules Soury, in speaking of creeds with all their power of latent mischief and slumbering fanaticism, that they are a standing menace to civilization. But, happily, education is spreading amongst all classes of the people, and is silently paving the way for the downfall of all sectarianism and sacerdotalism. Already a branch of the National Secular Society has been formed in Dublin, and I trust the day is not far distant when similar branches will be established in all our large towns. It must not be forgotten that Ireland has also given some toilers to the cause of intellectual emancipation—in the tenth century, John Scotus Erigena, of whom Lecky, in his "Rationalism in Europe," writes, "He displayed on all questions a singular disdain for authority, and a spirit of the boldest Freethought." In the fourteenth century, Adam Duffe O'Toole, who, for denying the absurdities of dogmatic Christianity and scorning the pretensions of priestcraft, was burnt at the stake. In the last century, Toland, one of the "fathers of Freethought," whose most important work, "Christianity not Mysterious," gave great offense. The grand jury of Middlesex were induced at once to present it as a common nuisance. Their example was followed by the grand jury of Dublin. Two years afterward the Irish Parliament deliberated upon it, and, refusing to hear the defense of the great Deist, passed sentence that the book should be burnt by the common hangman and its author imprisoned. And in our own time we claim Tyndall, whose name is known and honored in every part of the world where the light of science has penetrated.

These are our Freethought martyrs and confessors to whose influence we of to-day owe so much. I trust the day may speedily dawn in Ireland when the opinions for which they suffered shall become as wide-spreading as the existing systems of belief.

Mr. G. J. Holyoke has, I believe, started for America, and Mr. Charles Watts has announced his intention of visiting America on a lecturing tour.

You hav doubtless ere this heard of the proceedings instituted against Mr. Bradlaugh, Mr. G. W. Foote, Mr. Ramsey, and Mr. Whittle for blasphemy. The articles upon which the charge is founded appeared in Freethinker. But the bigots will be foiled. To attempt to put the old blasphemy laws in force now would be to act contrary to the spirit of the age. Freethinkers in England hav now a powerful organization behind them, and in the person of Mr. Bradlaugh they hav leader who has never known defeat. THOMAS G. WALLACE.

CHARLESTON, S. C., Aug. 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please let me congratulate you upon your safe return to your family and sanctum, and your ability both mentally and physically to resume your old place therein. You are now doubtless enjoying the intellectual feasts at the Watkins Convention, where but a short time since you fell into the clutches of the delectable obscenity-hunter, Anthony Comstock, who perchance is prowling around again for another grab. I trust, however, he'll be defeated, and the meeting will prove a grand success for the cause of mental freedom, and only wish I might be with you. Orthodoxy and church bigotry are stamped upon everything in this portion of "Dixie," and a man or woman who utters an opposing word is considered unworthy of respect. Churches, saloons, and apothecary shops may be seen on almost every corner and street, while church rows, drinking, and wife whipping are frequent, and indulged in seemingly for pastime.

The question was asked me by an Episcopal saint and light of that order, just previous to the death of a lady friend who was a good woman, and who had all her life been a consistent Christian, if she had been made cognizant of her approaching dissolution, and whether or no she was prepared to meet her savior. I replied I thought not, and that unless she expressed a wish to talk upon the subject it had better not be broached; that ofttimes great harm was done the patient to be told that it could not recover, that it would soon be called upon to appear before its maker, etc., and that she had all the while dreaded death and expressed much unwillingness to die; and to be told she could liv but few hours at most would only excite and hurry her off the sooner; and as she was now free from pain and suffering, and had made lifelong preparations for this event, I thought it a pity as well as a great wrong to thus disturb her. He thought it quite unsafe for her to die without a test of her faith, and felt the great importance of having the minister come and ascertain the true state of her mind, as the enemy of souls was ever watching and ready to poison the mind with evil thoughts. Being commanded to watch and pray, he felt the great necessity for her future happiness, to make her election sure, to hav the minister come and pray with her. "Do you suppose," said I, "that God has no more regard for, and interest in, the souls of those who are good and obedient, who hav always lived consistent Christian lives, than to forsake them upon their dying beds to the enemy of souls?" "Oh, no," said he, "God has promised never to forsake those who put their trust in him, and we only want to know if she is still firm in the faith." If God knows, what more is needed? What the use of disturbing her simply to gratify idle curiosity? Has not her life been one of constant preparation for death, and the meeting of her savior after it? What more could be required by any god? "Admitting that as I do," said he, "I will furthermore say that notwithstanding she has been a moral, virtuous, honest, and upright woman, has wronged no one, and done all the good she was perhaps capable of doing, without God's saving grace, should she die with one skeptical thought even, she would never see God's face." What a wonderful display of divine wisdom and ignorance combined, thought I, and what a beneficent God, too, is yours!

After making some further exhibitions of his perfect understanding of God's great plan of redemption, saving grace, blood atonement, etc., we very naturally drifted back into the Garden of Eden for the origin of sin requiring all this foolishness.

After descanting upon Adam's extraordinary knowledge in giving names to all the animals, etc., not once thinking he was so very ignorant as not to know he was perfectly naked, and too stupid and helpless to clothe himself, which, it seems, God had to do with the skins of the animals, we wound up with the war that occurred in heaven, revealing the origin of Satan, the serpent-tempter in Eden, who was once an angel in heaven, but cast down and out during the war. His idea of heaven was a fixed place above in space, of spotless purity and holiness, free from sin or any conception of it. Then how did war occur there? I asked. "Well, I don't know, but suppose it was occasioned from the evil disposition of the fallen angel." But havn't you admitted there could be no sin or evil there, not even a conception of it? "Yes, but—well—that's a new idea never occurring to me before. I'll think about it and talk with you again. Am glad for having this talk with you," he added, "for as a rule I find religious conversation rather stale."

Yes, Brother Bennett, religion itself is stale, and for such persons as he needing something better I inclose money for the Liberal publications herein named. J. S. LYON, M.D.

GEORGE CHAINEY, after the Watkins Convention, journeyed west as far as Ohio and delivered several lectures. On his way to Boston he gave us a call, and seemed in good condition for resuming the fall campaign in Paine Hall, which commences on Sunday, the 10th inst. He will attend the League congress at St. Louis, and may be engaged to deliver lectures while enroute. He also may be secured through the fall months to fill lecture engagements.

MR. CHARLES BRIGHT, of Australia, delivered before the Liberal Club on the evening of the 8th inst. an able and interesting lecture on Evolution, its purposes and possibilities. Few speakers are capable of presenting arguments in a clearer or more impressiv manner. Liberal communities in this part of the the country who wish the services of a good speaker cannot do better than to employ him.

THE following circular has been sent out to the Leagues:

To the Secretary of the Auxiliary Liberal League.

DEAR SIR: In accordance with the call of the president of the League, which has been published in Man and other Liberal papers, the National Liberal League will hold its Sixth Annual Congress in the Young Men's Temperance Hall, N. W. corner of 10th and Locust streets, St. Louis, Mo., on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, 29th and 30th of Sept., and 1st of Oct. next.

Your Auxiliary is specially urged to send your full quota, five delegates. We beg you to send as many of these five delegates as possible, and certainly at least one. If you are too distant, or too inconveniently situated to send a delegate, please to send a communication and hav substitutes, or authorize them to be chosen by some one who will be present. Send also, if possible, a remittance of money to help pay the expenses of the congress.

Headquarters of the League officers will be at St. James's Hotel, St. Louis. All communications to the secretary, mailed after Sept. 20th, should be addressed there, and checks and postal orders made payable in St. Louis.

The issues mentioned in the call will be pressed and made practical questions. The question of the adoption of a new calendar will come up for discussion and action in the congress. Also, a proposition for a benefit insurance attachment to the N. L. L. will be made, and will hav to be discussed. Also other important Liberal questions of the day will come up; and we shall need your aid and counsel on them all.

In your communication, if you hav not already done so, please state the number of the members of your Auxiliary, as we hav to make up a statement of our numbers for the Census Bureau at Washington,

And now, fellow-Leagues, let us all rally to the congress on the 29th, and make it the largest, most noble, most influential gathering of Liberals that has ever yet assembled in this country. We hav just had a remarkable convocation of Freethinkers at Watkins, N. Y., which has exerted a wide influence, settled some differences, and done a world of good. The press reported this convention more fully and fairly than ever before, Now let us see if we cannot rival this gathering in the East by our congress in the West, and add another stroke to Liberal work, which will close up our conventions for the year. The cause needs you and invites you to this decisiv field of action at the front.

T. B. WAKEMAN, President.
T. C. LELAND, Secretary,
744 Broadway, New York.

Sept. 7, E. M. 282 (1882).

SOME men appear to believe that the Supreme Being regards outward forms more than real virtue, and that he will punish a person who tells a falsehood in one way with far greater severity than he will one who tells it in another. According to their view of the case, a man under oath, making a statement which is false, but otherwise harmless, would be caused to suffer more acute agony in the future world than one would be who, not under oath, told a wilful and malicious lie, which (as he intended it should) caused an irreparable injury. Are we not to suppose that it is the falsehood itself, and the intent to deceive, which are considered by the Supreme Being? Or does he regard the particular forms under which it is told?—Judge E. A. Thomas in N. A. Review.

My Boy.

BY JOHN E. M'CANN.

The lady who is supposed to be speaking in these verses is one of the best-known literary lights in America. Her son, a young man of twenty-six, rich, talented, and a universal favorit, left his home in New York for a trip West for the benefit of his health. His mother received a telegram three weeks after his departure to hurry to his side, as he was dying. She actually did kneel, with the tears streaming down her cheeks, in the center of her parlor, and asked the all-wise, almighty, and merciful God to spare her son's life until she could look upon his living face. Her son was dead—had passed from this laud into No-land, before she had reached his bedside. I myself heard the Rev. Robert Collyer speak for one-half hour over all that remained of one who had everything to liv for, but whom an all-wise, merciful God "removed." And the reverend gentleman wound up his remarks by saying: "His will be done! It is all for the best!" Perhaps the poor mother thought as he thought.

Do we miss him? Yes, we miss the cheery voice that used to ring
 In boyish play, upon the green, beyond my window there;
His merry laugh, his boyish chaff, his cherished violin
 No more will make us think that angels hover in the air.

You see, he was so handsome, so chivalrous, and so kind—
 Ah! he is not here to listen to the praises that I sing;
If they only could be borne by some sweet spirit on the wind
 Till, soft and low, the cadence in my darling's ear would ring,

He would then know that he wasn't quite forgotten by his mother;
 He was so sorry that he could not kiss me ere he passed away;
And I knelt down there and prayed to God to spare him till another
 Day would bring me to him. God did not hear me pray.

Why could he hav not taken me away instead of him?
 He had happy years before him. I've left happy ones behind.
You say, "His will be done!" When I talk like this I sin.
 Well, I hav a right to reason, or why hav I a mind?

Why could he not hav spared him till I looked upon his living face?
 I humbly asked him, on my knees, to grant me that sweet boon;
What lesson did his refusal teach this mighty human race?
 I might hav meekly bowed my head had he let him liv till noon.

Do me miss him? why, his very presence in a room would make
 The sun shine brighter, dance fantastic measures upon the parlor floor.
I'll miss him while I liv, until I die, until I awake.
 I wonder if there is across the Styx another shore?

Heaven.

BY ALHAZA.

I went to heaven one evening.
 I stood 'mid its glare and din;
And the roar of sacred music
 Seemed much like the pomp of sin.

I longed for a quiet shadow,
 A streamlet's fairy rune,
Where I could dream in silence,
 And with my heart commune.

The beasts shook out rich odors
 From mane and golden wreath;
But sweeter in some valley,
 The wild-flowers' perfumed breath.

I thought of sad hearts pining
 In dismal dens below;
Bright angels never cheer them,
 And sooth their hours of woe.

The poor are faint with weeping,
 They wait all still and numb;
The heart of the world is breaking,
 But God sits cold and dumb

On a throne of dazzling whiteness,
 While heavenly harpers play;
Better one tear of pity,
 Than this insane display.

Our Baby.

BY LUCIUS O. WEST.

There came to us in summer time—
When happy birds from every clime
Filled all the air with merry rhyme—
A tiny babe—with music's chime.

Almost unwelcome to the earth
It came—a burden from its birth—
But now, to hearts then filled with dearth,
It proves a gem of priceless worth.

Like twinkling, diamond stars of night,
Its laughing eyes, so blue and bright,
And hands and feet so pink and white,
All form for us a charming sight.

As playful as a lamb that skips
When clover blossoms sweet he nips,
The bee ne'er sweeter nectar sips,
Than comes each day from cherry lips.

No softer strains were ever sung,
No sweeter notes were ever rung,
On strings of harp such tones ne'er hung,
As come from baby's lisping tongue.

Like golden threads of silk, its hair;
Its dimpled chin and cheeks, so fair;
There's naught on earth that will compare
With "Baby Lea," we declare.

Ah! bless our precious baby-love,
The winsome, dancing, little dove,
Bright angel sent from realms above,
To fill our hearts with sweetest love.

The Rancher's Opinion.

I know it's a fact, parson, jist as ye say,
 That sin is a gatherin' force,
An' increasin' around us day arter day,
 Which is rough on your business, of course;
But I beg to remark, in passin' along,
 That it ain't all outside o' your church,
And thar's thousand singin' the piety song
 That's a gwine ter git left in the lurch.

My cows an' Bill Murray's got mixed up, somehow,
 Into one big promiscuous flock,
An' strayed from the ranches, when Bill left the plow
 An' went to to look arter the stock.
They's bin strayin' six months an'—right thar again
 My side of the argument wins—
When Murray came home my cows had no calves,
 While his were all blessed with twins?

"'Twar a curious freak o' natur'," he said,
 "An' almos' past human belief;"
An' then he looked puzzled, an' scratched of his head,
 But I knowed 'twar the freak of a thief.
'Twar no use to fly roun' an' kick up a muss
 An' try his ka-rac-ter to smirch;
For I am a wicked, rantankerous cuss,
 While he's the head deacon in church.

As I said at the start, again I repeat
 That sin rises up all around,
An' sometimes appears to spring up jist as wheat
 Springs spontaneous up from the ground.
But it isn't confined to outsiders like me;
 Your church folks don't all toe the mark;
An' thar's just as good men floating out in the sea
 As ye'll find aboard piety's ark.

Circular.

To the Freethinkers of the United States and of Canada:

I propose to publish immediately a pamphlet containing the Articles of Association of he New York State Freethinkers' Association, including its creed and platform, viz: The demands of Liberalism, the resolutions passed at the late Watkins Convention, with the names of the officers of the association and an alphabetical list of the members with the full post-office address of each.

This association, in many respects, is national in its character. Its articles of association confine its membership to no section of country, and at each convention the Freethinkers of all the states and of Canada are invited to participate. And I wish to hav every person in the United States and of Canada, who desires to be known as a Freethinker (who has not already done so), to at once unite with this association, so that his or her name and post-office address may appear in the pamphlet. All that is necessary to become a member, is to send your name and twenty-five cents to me. The price of the pamphlet and postage will be thirty cents.

Those who are members are requested to immediately forward to me their names written in full with their full post-office address. These addresses should be written very plain so that no error shall appear when published.

Now, Liberal friends, whether you are known as Materialists, Spiritualists, Free Religionists, or Agnostics, at once send in your names, that we may hav a full and perfect list of the Freethinkers of the United States and of Canada.

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR,

The oldest reform journal in the United States,

Is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.,

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer 3m53

CHRONIC DISEASES,

Embracing those of the blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations, by Dr. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington ave., New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for Jan. 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of Dr. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say with all the assurance that knowledge imparts that he is a man of the highest incentive and motiva, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and hav been introduced and thoroughly read in hundreds of thousands of families, who to-day stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the hygiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted."

Purchasers of PLAIN HOME TALK are at liberty to CONSULT ITS AUTHOR, in person or by mail, FREE. Price of the new Popular Edition, by mail, postage prepaid only $1.50. Contents table free. AGENTS WANTED. MURRAY HILL PUBLISHING COMPANY

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Vol. I. or II. mailed on receipt of $2.

HOW AND WHY THE "Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing

PERFORMS ITS ASTONISHING CURES.

ELECTRICITY pervades the whole world of nature, and in the human body it is absorbed at the lungs, and is converted into Electro-Magnetic heat. It has been discovered that healthy blood contains seven or eight per cent of iron, and when the blood becomes deficient in this it becomes less Electro-Magnetic, and fails to restore the waste of the vitals or giv strength to the frame.

Our Means of Relief is Based Upon a Principle, and possesses such merit as already to command from physicians and scientists such recognition as has not met any other scientific discovery given to medical therapeutics during the present century. We claim that, in the eternal fitness of things, there must be a

UNIVERSAL REMEDY FOR DISEASE SO UNIVERSAL, and nowhere is it more natural to seek for this remedy than among the laws of nature. Uniformity of results has proven that this grand law has been fully revealed to man, and is that universal remedy so long sought. The beneficial effects derived from medicins are produced alone through contact of positiv and negativ chemicals, liberating, as a result of that contact, a current of electricity which, in the human organism, becomes Magnetism. If this be true, why not strike out at once for a means of Administering Magnetism Itself, Pure and Simple, without the Necessity of Swallowing so Much Medicin?

We do not attack the medical profession, but wish to co-operate with them, and, instead of antagonizing them, cordially invite hereby an investigation of our mode of cure. Many prominent physicians hav already adopted the "Wilsonia" system in their practice, and are meeting with great success.

The "Wilsonia Magnetic Appliances"

Are peculiarly successful in the treatment of all forms of Paralysis, Rheumatism (acute and chronic), Sciatica, Lumbago, Spinal Congestion, Myelitis, Locomotor Ataxia, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Pulmonary and Heart Affections, Catarrh (bronchial and nasal), Diseases of the Liver and Kidneys, Dyspepsia, and all diseases arising from imperfect assimilation, Affections of the Urinary Organs, with Prostatic Complications, Hemorrhoids, Fistula, etc., Uterine and Ovarian Diseases, the Exhaustion resulting from various forms of Fever, viz., Intermittent, Remittent, Typhoid, Scarlatina, Diphtheria, etc.. etc.

"Wilsonia" Magnetic Clothing Co.'s Offices

No. 25 East 14th Street, NEW YORK, AND No. 465 Fulton Street, BROOKLYN,

Where full information as to persons cured of all forms of the most serious and baffling diseases can be obtained. The cured can be called upon, and the completeness and permanence of their restoration to entire health be learned from their own lips.

We hav no other office in either New York or Brooklyn, and no genuin "Wilsonia" appliances can be obtained elsewhere.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables: The colonel has made the sacredness of the scriptures appear as absurd as Cervantes made that of the knights of the age of chivalry. Gems of Thought.

THERE is not a creed which is not shaken, not an accredited dogma which is not shown to be questionable, not a received tradition which does not threaten to dissolve. Our religion has materialized itself in the fact, and now the fact is failing it. —Matthew Arnold.

EVERY man is bound to develop his individuality, to endeavor to find the right way of life, and to walk in it. He has the will to do so; he has the power to be himself, and not the echo of somebody else, nor the reflection of lower conditions, nor the spirit of current conventions. True manhood comes from self-control—from subjection of the lower powers to the higher conditions of our being.—Dr. Smiles's Duty.

IN the galleys of the river Loire, whither John Knox and the others, after their Castle of St. Andrew's was taken, had been sent as galley-slaves, some officer or priest, one day, presented them an image of the virgin mother, requiring that they, the blasphemous heretics, should do it reverence. "Mother? Mother of God?" said KNOX, when the turn came to him, "this is no mother of God; this is a 'pented bredd' [painted board], a piece of wood, I tell you, with paint on it! She is fitter for swimming, I think, than for being worshiped," added KNOX, and flung the thing into the river. It was not very cheap jesting, there; but come of it what might, this thing to KNOX was and must continue nothing other than the real truth, it was a "pented bredd;" worship it he would not.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

A COLLAPSE of religious belief of the most complete and tremendous kind is now apparently at hand. . . . No one who has watched the progress of discussion and the indications of opinions in literature and in social intercourse can doubt that, in the minds of those whose views are likely to become—and in an age when all thought is popularized soon to become—the views of society at large—belief in Christianity, as a revealed and supernatural religion, has given way. Science and criticism combined hav destroyed the faith of free inquirers in the inspiration of the Bible.—Goldwin Smith.

ORTHODOXY has not been reinforced to any large extent for the last ten years by fear of future punishment or of an angry God. On the contrary, it has prospered and taken new life and interest [so far as it has done so] because of its absorption of rationalism by keeping its old dogmas out of sight and by carefully looking after its business affairs. Should orthodoxy attempt to depend upon its doctrins, for which it claims such wholesome social power, it would soon discover its downward tendency.—Annie L. Diggs.

ABNDON supernatural Christianity, it is alleged, and you must abandon theism and immortality; abandon these, and you must abandon every moral distinction. In many instances no doubt the fear is genuin, but oftener it is a convenient subterfuge—an admirable decoy that draws off men's attention from the direct observation of the critical and historical problems which must be settled, if at all, on critical and historical grounds. If upon these grounds the supernatural claims of Christianity prove to be wholly invalid, I do not see that any moral consequences would giv them back their old prestige. We cannot make believe that Christianity is supernatural in order to economize some reflex moral influence of such a belief. Such a belief, in order to be operativ, must be real. A conscious lie never yet engendered any considerable amount of moral earnestness; it never will at any future time.—J. W. Chadwick.

I NEVER go into a store and see the long row of corset boxes but I feel to wish every one was in the bottom of the sea and the art of making them forgotten. The waist that is stayed and boned until it cannot support itself is not the waist that nature loves to behold in her children. The wise and esthetic Greeks knew better than to wear these engins of torture; and even to this day artists delight in draping their statues and female figures in the softly-flowing folds of something that does not bind, compress, and misshape "the human form divine." Right dressing, pure air, clear water, and good diet count largely toward making good girls and boys who shall develop into good men and women. If mothers teach these things to their children they will be ingrained into their growth and become so much a part of their nature as to abide with them all their lives.

"Let each and all, in joyous strain,
Sing loudest notes of praise,
And worship Health—be this our aim,
In whatsoever place.
In deepest cave, or mountain high,
In science or in art,
This goddess bright, let none decry,
But cherish in the heart."

—Elmina D. Slenker.

CHRISTIANS are of the opinion that every thing connected with our organization is a failure, requiring magical means for its restoration. An incantation, called prayer, results in a spell called grace. Doubtless the constitution of our bodies could be improved by means within our reach, and the soul profits by such exertions. If we are perfectly satisfied with our present organization, although in nine cases out of ten it produces much sorrow and pain, we will never exert ourselvs to improve it. There is an elevated region into which we are able to soar, with a refined artist or scientist instead of an ignorant Christian to guide us. The imagination which feeds upon our entire previous experience makes us burn for the completion of some-requisit picture, of which we hav had but one ravishing glimps. Engaged in such studies every day finds us further from the sphere of sense, and we shall triumph only when we find it impossible to fall back into those old ruts, where our lowest faculties are appealed to, to make us convenient tools or stepping-stones, by means of which the clergy can obtain the comforts and luxuries of life.—Alhaza.

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?
BY
Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,
A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.
The author, though possessing all the prerogativs of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.
The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.
WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.
The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.
The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adgocated.
The strong commendations of the secular press show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."
Printed in good type and bound in cloth. Price $1.

HISTORY
OF THE
CHRISTIAN RELIGION
TO A. D. 200.
By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.
Verdict of European Scholars.
The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religio Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.
Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupferschmidt, the secretary, says:
"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."
The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."
One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

A CHURCH session at Emlenton, Pa., has decided that dancing is an immoral practice. Some of the elders had evidently witnessed the can-can species. It may not be long now before a church session will decide that church fair lotteries are as wicked as dancing—Norristown Herald.

A TRAVELER saw in Portland, Me., while waiting half an hour in a railroad station, a barrel of ale rolled into a saloon, an intoxicated man fight a hack driver, and two men drink whisky from a bottle. He concludes it possible that the Maine prohibition law is sometimes broken in Portland.

DURING service in the cathedral at Ragusa some days ago the officiating priest, a member of the Society of Jesuits, was stabbed to death by a girl whom he had betrayed. She inflicted five wounds. The congregation poured amid wild excitement into the streets, and the girl was taken into custody.

A DEACON and his pastor had a personal difficulty. The latter, in a very exciting manner, said, "Do you know what the D.D. at the end of my name means?" "Doctor of divinity." "No, sir; it stands for death to deacons." At the next church conference the pastor had the deacon turned out.—Richmond paper.

MR. AND MRS. YARNALL lived in the same house for forty years, at Media, Pa., without once speaking to each other, each adhering stubbornly to a resolution not to make the first advance toward reconciliation. When the husband was stricken by fatal illness the wife was asked to relent, but she refused, as did he, and death soon made their separation complete.

REV. JOHN CAMPBELL, minister in the island of Iona, has used his church at one time as a pigsty, at another as an inclosure for his cattle, and the grounds about it every winter as a stock yard. One Sunday during the winter of 1880 the people who assembled to attend the service found that one door of the church was closed, the lobby being stored with straw and corn.

THE bell of a Massachusetts woolen mill was rung at 5 o'clock every morning except Sundays. It weighed two thousand pounds, and was intended to awaken every employee, which it did, as well as every one else in town. It was complained of as a nuisance, and a Supreme Court judge enjoined the owners not to ring it before 6:30 A.M. The decree has been affirmed on appeal to the full bench.

REV. E. B. BARY, of St. Charles, has resigned. He is the man who preached poor James Burchell into hell. The St. Charles Baptists hav not been able to get along with a pastor lately. They are a combativ lot. A long time ago in a row over a pew, one man arose in the majesty of his Christian wrath and chased another out of church with a butcher knife, returning in time to enjoy a whack at the benediction. The above is a fact.

POLISH journals call attention to a memorial tablet in a Warsaw church which contains the record of the age and death of the oldest man concerning whom there is any authentic account in existence. The priest Cybulski is shown by this tablet to hav been born in 1500, and to hav died in 1667. There is said to be unquestionable evidence of the correctness of these dates.

To say of a man of strong propensity to theft that he would steal a red-hot stove can no longer be reckoned an amusingly exaggerated hyperbole. The saying has been made cold and commonplace by Phipps, the late superintendent of the Philadelphia Almshouse. Among his many other thefts he stole the copper roof off the building. Henceforth it may be proper to say of an extraordinary thief that he is a regular Phipps.—Sun. Phipps is a Christian.

REV. BARNES, the mountain evangelist, having failed to make as many conversions as he expected, and also failed to receive a "call" from this city, has retired to his nativ mountains of Kentucky to engage in the business of casting out devils. If, when he gets his devils cast out, he will bottle up a few of them or confine them safely in cages and exhibit them around the country, a big pile of money might be secured. It is so long since the people hav seen a real simon-pure devil that they would pay handsomely for the sight. Bro. Barnes, hurry around with your devils.

THE American Missionary Association has been getting in arrears; it costs so much to support in a high degree of comfort so many ease-taking priests in foreign countries that a few months ago $300,000 were called for to make up the deficiency. The faithful having money, and who believe that by dispensing it freely in the cause of Christ they will buy a front seat in the New Jerusalem, shelled out liberally, and only $26,000 remains unraised. The close of the fiscal year having arrived, the generous among those having great faith and great fear are still requested to shell out.

THE latest miracle that has been announced is of a deaf and dumb boy, thirteen years of age, in the South, who has been cured of his deafness and dumbness by being converted to Christianity in a revival. This is a little out of the ordinary course of things; if a belief in Christianity is so potent, why has not this power been shown much earlier? There are more than ten thousand deaf mutes in the country, and Christianity and its expounders hav been lying round loose all these years, and this is the first case of the kind cured by them. One cure in ten thousand is not very great success in any system of practice. Brethren, pray harder.

WE see that another victim of the law's penalties declared that "he would die as became a soldier of Christ." Does it not occur to any of our salaried soul savers that by this special double-action necktie method they are surrounding Christ with a lot of cutthroats who, saved or unsaved, are a safe crowd to keep away from. During our recollection there has been thousands of these bloody-handed scoundrels sent direct to heaven—men who were slaughtered here as being unworthy to liv are heralded in their send-off as new recruits to heaven. It's about time to stop, before heaven is chock full of murderers, amongst whom no honest man wants to be found.—Breckenridge (Col.) Daily Journal.

THE Dubuque Daily Herald publishes an account of the sinfulness of the Rev. John Allison, Presbyterian clergyman of Jesup, Iowa, who seems to hav made vile, repeated, and persistent attempts to draw one of the sisters, Mrs. Alice Moffit, from the path of virtue. He made all sorts of frivolous excuses to call upon her after she had forbade him the house. Even when she was quite ill he entered the house and penetrated into her private bedroom and attempted improper liberties. Highly indignant at his ungentlemanly boldness, she ordered him to leave instantly, and sent word to her father to hav steps taken to prevent a repetition of the clergyman's insults. The Presbytery hav expelled him from their organization, so he will no longer break the bread of life with their sanction.

ABOUT the best way in the world to kill a good newspaper is for those who subscribe for it to loan it to their neighbors, and for those who like the paper to run or send around town to borrow it. A friend of a newspaper or newspaper editor never borrows that paper, but subscribes for it like a man, and thus helps the editor and publisher to liv, and at the same time proves by his patronage that he is a defender of the principles it advances, whatever they may be.—Great West. These are words of truth, and TRUTH SEEKER readers ought to take a hint from them. If every one who reads borrowed TRUTH SEEKERS would subscribe and pay for their own paper like a man, it would be better for all, especially for us at this end of the line.

THE deacons of a negro Baptist church in Baltimore say that the pastor put in a bill for $150 rent of his parsonage when he had paid only $120, and they voted that he was too honest to preach. He insisted upon occupying the pulpit, but one deacon snatched away his Bible and another pulled him out. A still livelier outbreak occurred in a negro Methodist church in Alabama. The minister announced that everybody who had given ten cents at the passing of the hats could join in the communion service, which was about to begin, and he invited all who were thus qualified to take the front seats. Among those who went forward was a brother whose contribution had consisted of a battered and punched dime. The pastor excluded him. A fight ensued, and during the tumult somebody escaped with the bread and wine. Thus went the body and blood of a God.

SOME official statistics hav just been issued in France of the suicides that hav taken place in fifty years. They show that since 1830 the number of suicides has trebled. In 1830 there were 5 suicides for every 100,000; in 1850, 10; in 1860, 11; in 1870, 13; in 1880, 15. The total of suicides in the last year reached 6,650, of whom 79 per cent were men. The Seine department stands at the head of the gloomy list, and Corsica has the smallest number of suicides—only two per 100,000 inhabitants. A painful fact is the growing frequency of suicides among children. Betwen 1876 and 1880 198 boys and 40 girls below 15 years of age destroyed themselvs. Of these 209 were over 12 years of age, 21 between the ages of 12 and 10, 4 were 10 years old, and 6 were below 9, the youngest being only 7 years old. It appears that by far the greatest number of suicides take place in the summer, the proportions per cent being, summer, 39; spring, 19; autumn, 24; and winter, 18.

IN India there is a brisk opposition to the circulation of Christian literature. In Lucknow and Cawnpore forty-five publishing houses are engaged in issuing antichristian books and tracts. One house recently received a donation of $4,000 to aid in printing Mohammedan works. A Hindoo prince presented another house with enough money to issue a million Hindoo tracts. More than one hundred papers are published in the interest of paganism and Mohammedanism, and against Christianity. One Hindoo publishing house at Lucknow recently sent to London an order for $25,000 worth of paper, on which antichristian tracts and other works are to be printed. Some people hav an idea that all the missionaries hav to do in India is to make speeches in the street to a lot of ignorant people, who believe what is told them without taking the trouble to argue against it. This is a radical mistake. The learned among the Hindoos know far more than an average missionary; and this, with the poor quality of the Christian religion, is the reason why such a meager number of conversions are made in India and other Asiatic countries.

THE Rev. Hyatt Smith, of Brooklyn, has made a sorry figure in politicts. The Democrats who took him up two years ago hav dropped him like a hot potato, and the Greenbackers want none of him, but he has turned up at the Republican door, knocking to be let in, and muttering about what he will do if he is not received. Preachers should keep out of politics. Their reputations are bad enough already.

A TOUGH story comes from Bethel, N. C. It is that a boy, deaf and dumb from his birth, attended a camp-meeting, and, although never having heard a word before, was enabled by divine grace to get the benefit of the preacher's exhortation, and when he went forward to the anxious bench spoke out boldly and proclaimed his conversion. That this story comes from one of the most ignorant and superstitious parts of the country, and has no proof to support it, will probably make no difference to the pious people who stand ready to swallow a camel or a whale in connection with their religion, but THE TRUTH SEEKER stands ready to make over, to anybody who will prove it, one of the many mansions Jesus went to prepare. A warranty deed will be given, and the title defended against all comers.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

Japan Continued.—Farming and Other Matters.

YOKOHAMA, May 12, 1882.

DEAR FRIENDS: While still in the "Land of the Rising Sun," I will spend a few hours in describing to you more of this beautiful country, and in what I may say I propose to draw pretty freely from Consul-General Van Buren's works already alluded to. As agriculture is the basis of wealth and prosperity in all countries, let me refer to it more fully in connection with Japan. In this country agriculture is the chief industry. The people, from their geographical position and former policy of isolation and seclusion, have been essentially tillers of the soil. Trade and manufactures lacked the stimulus of foreign commerce, and were limited, and, as compared to agriculture, insignificant. The powerful feudal system, with the imperial court at Kioto and the military court of the shogun at Tokio, 260 daimiyo courts in the provinces, surrounded by more than 400,000 men at arms, and their families of nearly 2,000,000 people, and an official priesthood numbering 200,000, were all supported and maintained almost entirely by the agricultural interest of their country.

The daimiyos alone drew annually from this interest revenue to the value of 115,000,000 yen per year.

Field farming ever has been, and still is, as I hav already observed, unknown; but the tillage is really gardening, and is of the most thorough character. Fully one-half of the population are farmers, and of the day-laboring or coolie class a large number are employed in the cultivation of the soil. The average size of these garden-farms is about half an acre.

Much of the land bears its winter as well as its summer crop. The thoroughness of the spade or mattock cultivation, and the careful attention to fertilization, produce larger returns and preserve the bearing capacity of the soil better than our superficial plowing and rough fertilization.

Although the annual rainfall is greater than in the regions of the largest precipitation of the United States, irrigation is universal.

The fee simple of the soil, formerly in the feudal lord, is now held by the farmer. The area of cultivation has been extended fully one-fifth within the last ten years, and probably will in the future as rapidly, as the means of inland transportation are improved, fertilizers secured, and the demands of commerce increase.

The country, embracing all its islands, extends north and south through fifteen degrees of latitude, and the cultivated areas are at all altitudes, from the sea level to 10,000 feet, with a climate of the temperate or sub-tropical zones. Japan possesses 50,000,000 acres of tillable soil, but a little over one-fourth of that quantity is in actual cultivation. This is owing to the lack of good roads and proper means of transportation.

Woolen clothing was formerly unknown, and animal food was prohibited to all classes by their religion and their economical habits of life. A few horses and cattle were employed for military uses, to a limited extent for carrying purposes, and little or none for agricultural work. Thus it will be seen, as already indicated, the resources for farming are much smaller than with us. Night soil has been the principal fertilizer of the Japanese farmer, and the limited supply has, of course, prevented extensive farming operations. The introduction into the country of farm stock, as cattle, sheep, and hogs, has been conducted to a very limited extent and with little success.

About seven million acres are cultivated in rice, which is more than half the quantity of all that is cultivated. All the alluvial lands of the sea-shore, rivers, valleys, and creek bottoms grow lowland rice, and the richer upland soils produce the upland rice. The first is the best and most productive. The average yield of the lowlands over all the country, north as well as south, is about forty bushels per acre. Some of the richer and better districts, however, average about fifty bushels, and some fields even produce seventy bushels per acre. The total estimated crop of rice is over 200,000,000 of bushels per year, the average value of which is $1.25 in silver, making the grand total of $250,000,000.

As you have already learned, rice is the staple food of the Japanese people, and the amount of hard, thorough work which it enables them to perform is the surprise of every traveler, and seems quite incredible to our meat-eating countrymen. It, however, occasionally gets so high in price that the poor can ill afford to use it, when thousands are deprived of it. Then serious consequences follow, and much suffering is engendered. But the patient and cheerful industry of the people, and their economical habits, are guarantees against any extended or severe suffering.

Wheat is grown in all parts of the empire, and is of the variety we call winter wheat. It is, however, produced in much smaller quantities than rice. The total wheat crop amounts to about 40,000,000 bushels, worth about fifty cents per bushel; the average yield is twenty bushels to the acre. It is largely used in the form of cakes without fermentation and in the manufacture of macaroni. The grain is coarsely ground, and the flour imperfectly bolted.

The uplands are preferred for wheat growing. The soil is thoroughly dug up and pulverized with a long, wide-bladed mattock. It is then divided into small plots, each of which is furrowed into rows three or four inches deep, and twelve or fifteen inches apart. Into these furrows ashes and thoroughly decomposed compost is scattered, and then in October the seed is dropped by hand, about one or two bushels to the acre, and covered with the mattock to the depth of one and a half inches. The ground is turned up two or three times per month, and liquid manure is applied three or four times during the winter and spring, to the roots of the plants. In the autumn some kinds of hardy vegetables are planted between the rows of wheat. The wheat ripens in May, and is cut with a knife, much like our old corn knives, and bound into small bundles, which are either hung up on trees or bamboo poles, or laid on hard ground to dry, when it is carried to the farm-house, where it is threshed. This threshing process consists of first pulling off all the kernels of grain, by means of a row of iron teeth, long and saw-like, closely set in a stick of wood. Between these teeth a few wheat heads at a time are rapidly drawn, tearing off the kernels and their coverings. The grain is separated by threshings on mats with the flail, much like the old-fashioned instrument formerly used in our country. The chaff is separated by the wind, the grain being slowly poured from a scoop-shaped basket, held four or five feet from the ground. If the wind is not blowing sufficiently to answer for this purpose, artificial wind is produced by an enormous fan. More wealthy farmers sometimes have winnowing mills, with sieves and screens, somewhat like ours. These were first introduced by the Dutch more than a hundred years ago. The wheat is then put into straw sacks and carried, either on hand-carts or on the backs of horses, to market. Some attempts have been made to export wheat, but as the quality is inferior to the grain usually sold in Europe, the enterprise has not been successful.

Barley is grown more extensivly than wheat; 60,000,000 bushels is the usual crop, and is worth fully as much per bushel as wheat. It is more universally used for food than wheat. A portion is made into coarse flour, and much is cooked or used without fermentation. When eaten whole, it is hulled somewhat like rice, and in the manner I have heretofore described. The yield is about twenty-five bushels per acre. It is much used in the distillation of saké. Winter barley is the kind almost universally grown; its general cultivation is much like that of wheat.

The sugar manufactured by the Japanese is made from the Chinese sorghum plant, which grows luxuriantly in the southern portion of the country, but not much north of the thirty-sixth degree of latitude. The whole product of the country is about 70,000,000 pounds per year, and more than that quantity is imported from China. The plant is not grown from seeds, but from cuttings. In September selected stalks are cut and buried in trenches a foot deep. Through the winter, from the joints of the stalks, sprouts grow. In the spring these joints are cut off and set out in rows, fifteen to eighteen inches apart, and about the same distance from the plants in the rows. The ground has previously been dug up and pulverized with the mattocks. The fertilizers used are ashes, fish, decomposed hay, seaweed, and night soil. The plants are cultivated with the hoe, and the ground kept free from weeds. In October and November the leaves are stripped off and the stalks are cut; the hard outer covering is then removed, and the remaining portion is ground between rollers of stone or hard wood. The juice is then boiled in iron kettles till the granulation takes place, when it is placed in bags and pressed dry. The expressed syrup is used as molasses. Dry upland soils are required for the successful growth of the cane, and the expenditure of labor and fertilizers is as great, if not greater than with any other crop.

Although the Japanese have several kinds of potatoes, the common Irish variety is principally grown, and that in the vicinity of the sea-ports where Europeans reside. The yam, or sweet potato, grows in all parts of the country, south of the fortieth parallel of latitude. There are five species of this root grown here, three of which are peculiar to Japan. They form a considerable portion of the diet of the people, especially in autumn. The price is very low, usually about fifteen cents a bushel.

Carrots, onions, parsnips, and turnips are very successfully cultivated. When turnips are grown alone, enormous crops are realized. There are also some kind of roots grown here, not known with us, and lily bulbs are considerably grown and used as food, they are rich in sugar and starch. There is a great variety of herbaceous articles raised for food, of which the Japanese are extremely fond; among these are cabbages, beets, kale, artichokes, onions, asparagus, spinach, mallow, sorrel, rhubarb, mustard, lettuce, endive, water, and garden cress, etc. The annual crop of these is estimated at 25,000,000 yen. These are mostly grown on land that raises two other crops in a year—the summer crop of rice, and the winter crop of other grain.

The cultivation of tea is a large branch of business. The amount exported has increased from 3,000,000 pounds in 1865 to 46,000,000 pounds in 1880. The total product of the present year is thought to be 100,000,000 pounds. The whole population of the country drink tea, which is the national beverage from infancy to old age. It grows in all parts of the empire, but its most favorable locality is south of the fortieth parallel of latitude. The soils best adapted to it are the sheltered hill-sides, although it flourishes on the plains along the sea-shore. When wild lands are to be used for tea, the soil must be thoroughly tilled and subdued. The plants begin to yield some return in the third year, and in the fifth season the yield is good Twenty-five hundred pounds to the acre is considered a fair yield, but more than 3,000 pounds is often produced.

The silk culture is conducted to a considerable extent. The mulberry-tree is grown in nearly all parts of the country south of the fortieth parallel of latitude. The foreign demand has increased so much within the last ten years as to have nearly doubled the amount. Large districts of wild land have been subdued and devoted to the mulberry-trees, within a few years. The table-lands of the middle and northern part of the main island have been largely taken up for this purpose, and the area will be farther widened according to the demand. The taxable value of the silk product is about $35,000,000 per year, but the whole value is of course much greater.

The variety of mulberry most grown is the morus nigra. It grows ten feet high, and is cultivated ten to twelve feet apart. The small crop of leaves gathered in the third year increases gradually to the eighth or ninth year, when the trees are fully matured. Two methods are employed for gathering the leaves, in different localities. One is to partially strip the leaves from the branches, and carry them to the place of feeding, another to cut the branches and carry them in bundles on horses, or the backs of men. In the latter case, the young shoots grow with remarkable rapidity, and are large, and give the usual amount of leaves the following year. Light upland soils are used entirely for mulberry plantations. Crops of both summer and winter plants are grown between the rows of trees, and the soil is carefully cultivated and fertilized. Night soil, fish manure, compost of dry leaves, grass, ashes, seaweed, etc., are used as fertilizers. The presence of trees seems to make no difference in the yield of the other crops, the principal requirement being a liberal amount of fertilizers.

Hemp is grown on the lower and richer soils, in drills sixteen inches apart. It is sown in March or April, and receives the same careful garden tillage as all other products of the soil of Japan. During the summer it is frequently hoed, and fertilizers are applied to the root of the plant. All hemp lands are flooded three or four times in the season from the irrigating ditches. The stalk is ready for harvest in August, grows from four to seven feet high, and is pulled and spread on the ground, when it rots and the fiber is easily separated. This is done by beating with a bamboo stick. The resinous substance is removed by hand, scraping with a sharp-edged bamboo knife. The fiber is uncommonly long, strong, and glossy; if it could be completely cleaned of the resinous matter, it would be in demand in all foreign markets; but until that can be done it will not be a very important article of agriculture. Flax is not grown in the country.

Too much praise can hardly be given to the thoroughness of Japanese tillage; and to this cause may be attributed their uniform good crops. The divisions of land, as at present cultivated, are so small that anything but this garden cultivation would be impossible; but in view of the yield that is realized, it would seem advisable for our farmers in America to pursue the same course to some extent. As before observed, the great portion of the land is dug with the mattock. When the little old Chinese plow is used, the soil is plowed and re-plowed, from four to eight times. In this way the soil is made fine and mellow, the fertilizers incorporated with it, and worked six or eight times during the growth of the crop. The yield per acre is often enormous. It is reported of a single acre, that 70 bushels of rice, with 3 1-2 tons of straw, were taken from it, when it was prepared for a winter crop of equally large proportions.

Tobacco is an important product in this country, as in all other Asiatic countries. What a pity it is that man everywhere has made such extensive use of this filthy weed. It is grown on the uplands by means of the same patient, thorough tillage as the crops just described. The seed is planted the last of March or first of April in rows fifteen inches apart. In September the lower leaves are picked; the first of October, the middle; and during the last of October the upper leaves. These are dried and packed in small bales. The leaf is much cut up by tobacco worms, and but a small portion of it is used in cigar making. Cigars are much less used in Japan than with us. About $200,000 worth of tobacco per year is exported to Europe.

Beans, peas, and all other leguminous plants are extensively cultivated in Japan. Probably there is no country in the world where this class of food or this class of plants enters into the diet of the people so largely as here.

Without any scientific knowledge of the nutritive properties of food, the natural demands of the human system has led to this uncommon use of beans and peas as a complement to their other starchy food. More than forty varieties of beans, and a dozen kinds of peas and lentils, are produced. It would be an interesting and instructive economic study to ascertain how far the cereals, combined plentifully with leguminous food, have been made here to supply cheap, healthy, and nutritious diet for a laboring population, taking, in a great degree, the place of animal food. An almost endless variety of these starchy caseine foods are made and eaten by these people, and they are enabled to labor more steadily than by the use of animal food. The annual crop of peas and beans is about 50,000,000 bushels, worth about $30,000,000.

I have previously given you to understand that fish is an important article of diet with the Japanese, they having invented an infinite variety of methods of preparing and preserving fish. Of course the fisheries are an important part of the industries of the people, a large number being constantly engaged in it, and the value of the fish thus secured amounts to a large sum.

MANUFACTURES.

The most important manufactures of Japan are silk, silk thread, cotton, tea, porcelain, lacquer, bronze, and embroidery, although iron and woodenware and various articles of use and ornament are made in large quantities. With the exception of porcelain, most of these industries are carried on in the houses of the laborers.

SILK.—The value of silk exported during the year ending June 30, 1880, as gathered from the customs return, is as follows: silk floss, 104,983 yen; silk waste, 749,280 yen; raw silk, 10,233,980 yen; silk manufactures, 33,086 yen; cocoons, 404,067 yen; waste cocoons, 29,554 yen.

The value of the whole product during the same period I find stated in the Statistical Table of the Home Department as about fifty-four and a half millions of dollars.

PORCELAIN.—The older manufactures of porcelain in Japan have long been sought after, and secured as treasures, by those professing taste and knowledge of such wares. The improvements, however, made in the modern styles, will undoubtedly in time precede the older fashions. The chief want in Japanese porcelain is regular symmetry in the pieces, and uniformity in a set or any number of pieces. The absence of these is owing to the non-use of machines and forms for molding, and to defective ovens, through which the heat is not evenly distributed. The decorations, however, are so charming, and so different from any seen elsewhere, that the defects of shape are made tolerable; but what a great advance will be made when a radical cure shall be effected in the directions indicated, is seen in instances of sets of well-shaped foreign porcelain, finely painted by Japanese artists.

Manufacturers here are now manifesting much interest in the question of how to improve in the character, symmetry, and uniformity of their wares, and there is every reason to believe that in a few years competition with foreign manufacturers and in exportation will be active. The clay pits belonging to some of these establishments have been worked for two thousand years or more, and the enormous deposits seem scarcely more than scraped. Cobalt, used in coloring, is found in the same hills, and the clay being of excellent character, no reason seems to exist why the introduction of foreign molding machines and improved ovens should not turn out a largely increased yearly product of excellent ware, so formed and prepared as to please the taste and supply the wants of foreigners.

The United States imports about $20,000,000 worth of Japanese porcelain every year. Labor is so cheap, plentiful, and skilful in this country, and the artistic taste of the people is so universal, that beautiful articles of porcelain can be manufactured and placed upon the market in sufficient quantities, and at prices so low as to be within the reach of the majority of the inhabitants of the civilized world.

MINES AND MINING.

Mining in Japan is older than any accurate history of the industry. The government retains for itself the title and control of all mines and minerals, and grants licenses to work them. There is a ground tax of one yen for every six square rods, whether the mine is worked or not. When worked there is a royalty tax of three to twenty per cent of the net profit realized. Much of the mining is carried on by the different departments of the government. Some have had able scientific foreign advisers, and there are a few natives who are educated mineralogists and metallurgists, but it is safe to say that the greater part of the mining is still old and crude in character.

Returns for the year 1879 show the following product: gold, $233,843; silver, $451,094; copper, $1,436,061; lead, $25,933; pig iron, $107,759; coal, $1,712,493. In addition to these there was a small production of sulphur, sulphuric acid, petroleum, antimony, and tin. The total value was about 4,250,000 yen. As the coal out-put has considerably increased, the value for the last fiscal year may reach five million dollars.

IMPORTS.

The larger share of the goods imported into Japan, consisting chiefly of cotton and woolen goods, are from England. The principal goods imported from the United States are kerosene oil, clocks, watches, lamps, firearms, canned meats, and some fruits. A good deal of canned butter, purporting to be prepared in England and Switzerland, is brought here from the former country, but is said to be largely of American manufacture, exported to England in firkins, and then worked over and put up in cans. If Americans, with their usual enterprise, will put up in cans a good article of butter, well freed from the buttermilk, a large trade for it could be established in all these Asiatic cities. No good butter is made in any of these countries, and the amount consumed by Europeans alone is very large.

The amount of kerosene sent from the United States to Japan amounts to about $2,500,000 per year; clocks and watches, $242,000; provisions and butter, $110,000; of firearms, $125,000; lamps and fittings, $125,000. American manufactures of cotton seem to be too high in price for this market. It seems singular that England can send here cotton fabrics at lower prices than our people.

THE GOVERNMENT,

As I have told you, was changed by the revolution of 1868. Previous to that time it was an absolute and irresponsible monarchy, with an emperor at its head, who held all authority by divine right, and who ruled through a number of feudal princes, at whose head stood the shogun, or tycoon. The laborer had no privileges except such as his immediate prince gave him. He was absolutely under the control and in the power of his feudal lord and that lord's retainers.

There were no courts for the trial of causes which might arise between a laborer and his superiors. The position of the laboring man was so immeasurably below that of the ruling class that it was as much as his life was worth to even petition his prince or appeal to the shogun or emperor against any act of the upper classes. The laborers were bound to the soil, and could not leave it without permission. Their lives, even, were in the hands of their immediate superiors, and fancied insolence or insubordination was sufficient justification for ending them. The people were divided into five general classes as follows:

1. Military and official—this class included the emperor and his blue-blooded nobility, the tycoon and the daimiyos, and their retainers.
2. Farmers who held land under lease.
3. Artisans.
4. Merchants and bankers.
5. Laborers, or the coolie class.

There was the widest possible gulf between the first class and all the others. The others had no rights which the first class were bound to respect.

After the revolution of 1868 a great change was made—the feudal system was abolished, the feudal lords were pensioned, and their power taken from them and assumed by the general government. Although the laborer still has no voice in the making and execution of the laws, he has been materially benefited by the change. A system of courts has been established wherein he can be heard against even the highest classes. He can demand the intervention of these courts to insure the payment of his wages, which he could by no means do under the old order of things.

A vast and burdensome body of men-at-arms, with absolute authority, was set aside, the old divisions of the people abolished, and in the eyes of the law all made of the same class. It is true the power and influence of the old class system is still felt, and must be for years to come; but it will gradually die out until the laborer occupies ground equal to all others.

The empire is divided into districts called ken and feu, over each of which is placed an officer, known as the ken-rei or feu-chiji, meaning much the same as the word governor with us. At the office of this official every native resident must be registered, and he or she cannot remove to another ken without permission is first obtained; and upon arrival at the new home must again be registered there. So strict is this supervision that a Japanese cannot travel or even sleep out of his district without permission of the authorities. A block of every ten houses has its supervising officer, and each hundred a superior official, keeping watch and ward over the movements of the occupants, so that any change or movement, even for a day, is immediately known, and this interference by the government is not confined to the movements of the people, but extends to all their trades and industries. Monopolies are granted to certain parties, either of trade or transportation, and the government itself often becomes a buyer or seller in the market.

LAND TENURE.

All the land of the empire was the emperor's. Through the shogun it was granted to the military favorites for the maintenance of the military power. These favorites leased it in small divisions to farmers, who held it at the pleasure of the lessors. So long as the lessee paid the stipulated price, in produce, he was left undisturbed. Such was the tenure up to the revolution of 1868. Since that time the federal system has been abolished, the land tenure has been changed, the land has been sold to the tiller, and is now held in fee simple. This important reform has been of great benefit to the farming class, making home the property of the occupant, and giving him much more of independence. About one-third of the tillable land is now in the ownership of the cultivators, the remainder being owned by larger proprietors, or still belonging to the government.

SOCIETY

Was formerly here, as in other parts of Asia, essential patriarchal. The father had almost unlimited control over all the members of his family. The whole course of the life of a child was invariably marked out and directed by the father. Marriages were entirely under his authority. No son or daughter, whatever their age, could leave the paternal roof without the consent of the father. The husband held similar power over the wife. She could be divorced and sent away from her children at his will and that of his family. But much of this absolute power on the part of the father and husband has been done away with, though it still remains greater than is the custom in Western civilization.

The education of the higher classes was in former times Chinese. The literature, philosophy, and science (if the latter term is permissible) were all Chinese. There was no illiteracy among the higher classes, for all could read and write. Nearly all the other classes, although not learned, could also read and write sufficient for business purposes. There were some exceptions, but of the male farmers and artisans nine-tenths could read and write. Schools existed in large towns of the provinces, and also in many of the smaller villages. When schools were not available, reading and writing were taught in a primitive way at home.

The most highly educated in Japan knew some thousands of Chinese characters, a few books of the Chinese classics, the books of ceremonies, and some of the truisms and proverbs of Chinese sages, and could write impromptu poetry in Chinese characters. It is not deemed necessary that he should even know the history of his own country, much less that of any other portion of the world. He had no knowledge of anything worthy the name of science. In art he could usually paint and draw. By this it will be seen that even the best educated were not highly learned.

The lower classes, in place of this Chinese culture, know just enough of arithmetic to serve their daily use, and could read and write in Japanese characters. There was some knowledge of Japanese history, mixed up with the mythical and marvelous, gleaned from books or learned from the traveling story-teller, who, by the roadside, recited to gaping crowds the stories of the wars and amours of the olden time.

The whole system of education, from what I have already told you, has been greatly remodeled since 1868. Public schools have been established, and scientific text-books from Europe and America have been translated and brought into great use. Perhaps the illiteracy of the lower class has not been greatly reduced by the introduction of Western customs and learning; but the learned class are much better educated than formerly, and in the place of the useless proverbs and superstitions of former ages, the inculcations of scientific minds have been accepted, and the prospect for the future is most encouraging. At the present rate of progress, in another decade the commonest laborer may be benefited by the Western system of education.

MORALS.

It is somewhat difficult to write accurately of the morals of a country, especially of these Asiatic countries, so as to convey any intelligent understanding of the subject to Western people. The habits and customs of centuries, in which the relations of the sexes in this country have been looked upon so differently to those to which we have been accustomed, have created a code of morals, if the term be permitted, from which morality, in this connection, has been excluded. The relation of master and concubine is here considered perfectly proper, and neither party loses caste or respectability. Parents sell their daughters for this purpose, and even to become inmates of houses of prostitution. From these latter places it not unfrequently occurs that girls are taken to become excellent wives and mothers. After marriage the wife is expected to be true to her husband, and it seldom happens that she fails in this duty. As mothers, Japanese women are models. None can be kinder or more affectionate to their children; they will spare no pains to amuse or instruct them, and seldom use force to compel obedience or punish a fault. As wives, these women are simply slaves to the humors and caprices of their husbands; they have absolutely no rights, and are often subjected to seeing the attentions of their lords transferred to some favorite concubine, to whom they are obliged to be considerate and respectful.

The males in Japan greatly exceed in number the females; and in consequence of this fact, and the additional one of concubinage, so largely practiced, the number of unmarried men among the laboring classes is very large. These persons frequent houses of prostitution, and spend much of their earnings in gambling and drinking. It must be said, however, that drunkenness is exceptional, especially among the better class of laborers. The Japanese, like all Eastern people, are somewhat given to exaggeration in their speech; but their great suavity and politeness to each other are always conspicuous.

MEANS OF TRANSPORTATION.

The islands of Japan are long and narrow. There is no point in the center of the larger island more than one hundred miles from navigable water. Cheap ocean transportation is therefore everywhere easily available. On the alluvial plains of the eastern and western coasts, besides the tidal rivers, there exists an extensive system of canals. In the interior in former times there was no general system of roads worthy of the name. It is true, the Tokugowa tycoons and some of the daimiyos had built a few roads, but they were ill adapted to carriage traffic, and in places were entirely impassable, except for footmen and pack-horses. Such carriage is slow and costly, and ruinous to both producer and consumer. As a tax it bears heavily on the shoulders of labor, and will do so until better roads are built by the government. So much man-packing is not only laborious, but degrading. It prevents production, consumption, and trade.

The building of good roads and the providing of cheap transportation must be a condition precedent to the settlement and development of the wilds of the country. By sea, river, and canal the means of transportation are reasonably good and cheap. Lines of steamers and sailing vessels of foreign construction have been established to all the principal ports of the country. The fleet of vessels owned by one company, the Mitsu-Bishi, represents in round numbers a gross tonnage of 50,000 tons. This company has had the countenance and support of the government; its fleet is being constantly increased, and the service rendered more effective.

In addition there are many smaller companies in Tokio, Osaka, and Nagasaki, which run steamers and sailing vessels of foreign style to some of the smaller ports. Some of these smaller steamers are Japanese built, and, although not of the best construction, give promise that in time Japan will be independent of foreign countries in ship building. There are no means available for giving accurate data as to the number and tonnage of the old style of native sailing vessels, known as "junks." The gross tonnage must be very large. They run along the coast to and from all the ports, and give cheap service, much cheaper than steam or foreign sailing vessels. Latterly loud complaints have been made of the interference by the government with the vessels in the interests of the steam monopolies. Experience will certainly compel an abandonment of such attempts, which, if persisted in, must result disastrously both to the government and the people.

As bearing upon the question of inland transportation of the products of labor, the statistics of the number of cattle and horses of both Japan and the United States may be properly inserted here so that the contrast may be seen.

In Japan her 35,000,000 people have 900,274 horses and 814,324 cattle. In the United States in 1870 the 38,000,000 people had in round numbers 10,000,000 horses and mules, and 26,000,000 cattle. This will show what burdens the laborer carries on his back, and what unnecessary calls are made upon his earnings in the way of conveying his products.

The mail transportation that has been established within the last ten years, both coastwise and inland, is cheap and excellent. The number of miles of mail routes aggregate 36,052. The number of letters carried for the year ending June 30, 1880, was 55,775,206, and that of newspapers 11,203,731. These figures throw great light upon the volume of business of the country and the amount of reading and writing done by the people.

TENEMENTS.

In forming an opinion of the tenements of the laborer the climate of the country must be borne in mind. Although there are unlimited quantities of good, durable building-stone everywhere in the mountain range, and vast deposits of firm clay for making brick, no stone or brick houses are built. The frequency and severity of earthquakes make the use of any but wooden structures impracticable. Timber is scarce, and there is nothing worthy the name of forests except in a portion of Yezo in the far north.

A large majority of the buildings are one story, and, compared to those of America and Europe, small. But the reader must bear in mind that the requirements of this oriental civilization are less than with us. A laborer's house, will, at most, have no more than four little rooms. Generally there is one main room, which serves as a sitting, dining, and sleeping room, and, in addition, a small nook for cooking, and another for bathing. That the uses of one room for the purposes of eating, sitting, and sleeping may be understood, it should be remembered that the rooms are covered with clean soft mats, upon which no boot or shoe ever treads. When meals are served, small tables, not more than a foot high, are used, and the family sit on the floor like tailors on their benches. When the meal is finished the table is removed and the room is ready for a sitting-room, the mats serving as seats. At night, cotton comforters are brought from a small clothes-press, and spread on the mats, and lo! a sleeping chamber. Thus much of the room occupied by the laboror of our western civilization is saved. A Japanese laborer's house, with three rooms, can be built for from twenty-five to one hundred yen. And the furniture, including matting and sliding partitions, will not exceed fifty yen. The house, by reason of non-use by the people of boots and shoes, is neat and clean. The bath, found in almost every laborer's house, is in daily use, and, cheap and small as the house is, it is comfortable.

None of the houses are built with a view to ventilation or warmth, the partitions and sides being of paper, protected in cold weather and storms by strong wooden shutters. The vast majority of the houses are thatched, and therefore stovepipes and chimneys are impossible. In fact, there are no stoves nor grates in Japan. In villages and towns the house is warmed, if at all, by a small fire-box, filled with charcoal, but more generally by a square zinc or copper-lined fire-place, sunk in the middle of the floor, in which the wood is burnt, the smoke from which rises and escapes through a hole in the roof. But little heat is generated in this way, and much discomfort from the smoke is experienced, and diseases of the eye are prevalent.

As a rule, the principal protection from cold is by additional padded clothing. The laborer, however, suffers in the three winter months, when, although in many parts of the empire the thermometer does not mark very low, the cold storms of snow and rain are exceedingly uncomfortable. The drainage from sinks and cess-pools in the vicinity of tenements, is, as a rule, extremely defective, and is doubtless a powerful agent in producing epidemic diseases.

In 1875, when the population was 33,300,675, there were 7,389,371 houses, or tenements, the average number of occupants to each being, therefore, less than 5. In Tokio, the number is 4; in Kanagawa ken, 4.5; Nagasaki ken, 4.7; Firkushima ken, 5.5; Miyaga ken, 5.9; Awomori ken, 5.8; Osaka City, 3.7.

The houses of cities seem to be less crowded than those of the poor, rural districts.

The fuel, which is used chiefly for cooking and heating baths, is charcoal, cut and split wood, brush, and dried grass. Charcoal is made in the wooded regions, burned in small, clay pits, and carried to the settlements on the backs of men and horses, in straw sacks. The selling price varies according to the distance from which it is brought; from 25 to 50 cents per 100 pounds. But wood is sold in small bundles of six sticks, each stick being about 18 inches in length and 2 inches in diameter; 80 to 100 bundles are sold for one dollar. I am quoting the rates of districts remote from the foreign settlements.

Brush and dried grass are gathered from the wild lands, to which certain rights of commons attach, as in England in early times. The value of the fuel bought and sold in 1875, was as follows: wood $6,107,974; charcoal, $2,219,986.

As the farmer and country laborer gets his fuel from his own land, or from the commons, this must have been mostly used in the larger villages and cities, showing how little is consumed for house-warming even by the richer classes.

FARMERS.

As has been said, the farmer, under the old system of classes, ranked next to the samurai, or governing class. In the new order he holds the same position in public opinion and general estimation. He is now owner of the soil he tills, and is taxed according to its producing capacity.

The kocho, or village officer, in all agricultural villages, has always been a leading farmer, and some villages had and still have the right to choose the officer. He had little more than a general supervision of village affairs. He settled petty disputes, maintained the peace, kept the register of the inhabitants, granted traveling permits, arrested thieves, and was a general advisor for the village.

Within the past three years the government has taken a step which has greatly enhanced the position and influence of the landholder. A decree has been promulgated by which local elective assemblies have been created, the electors of which are confined to such of the landholders as pay at least $10 land tax.

At present the power of these assemblies is only deliberative and advisory. The governor of the province submits his fiscal estimates for local expenditures, and they examine and pass upon them. If they disagree with him, the whole matter goes to the general government for decision. Although these assemblies possess no legislative power, they contain the germ of representative local self-government. The system needs to be extended, so as to include, among the representatives, intelligent people of all classes, and to have the power now exercised materially increased. That this consummation will be achieved is almost certain. Nor will reform in this direction stop here. As I have remarked, the mikado is pledged that an elected legislature shall be inaugurated by the year 1890.

'The agitation pervading all classes in Japan in favor of a national representative assembly is manifested daily in petitions to the emperor and his ministers, in conferences and lectures, and in newspaper communications and editorials. The question is so prominent, and the determinations to achieve success so universal, that the Genro-in, the deliberative and advisory council of the empire, is now said to be taking it into serious consideration; and probably the country before the lapse of many years, possibly months, will find itself in possession of some such chamber, wherein the views of all the people may be presented and discussed, and laws for their welfare enacted. That it will be entirely free to act as its members may be inclined is not probable, and it may be a matter of doubt if such freedom would at present be wise.

'Farmers in Japan have no seasons of rest as in colder climates, the climate in nearly all portions of the country being so mild in winter as to admit of raising the hardier crops. A considerable percentage of the land-owners are not workers, large numbers of the tea, silk, rice, tobacco, and sugar-raisers being able to employ laborers for that purpose. Almost every farmer can read, write, and keep his farm accounts. He sends his sons to some school to learn the same, and has his daughters taught music and needle-work at home.

'All labor on farms is, to the present time, mere hand-work. A plow is seldom seen. Sometimes in the lowland rice-fields an implement five feet in length, with a wooden cross-piece and depending iron teeth twenty inches in length, set four or five inches apart, is used with a horse as a pulverizer of the soil after the latter has been thoroughly dug up and worked over with a mattock. Ninety-nine per cent, however, of all labor is still manual. In 1878 the number of farmers, out of a population of 35,000,000, was something over 15,500,000, of which 7,000,000 were women; but as a large number of these latter, including the old and young, are engaged in household duties, spinning, weaving, making clothing, etc., there were probably not more than two or three millions of women employed in field work.

'The wages of an able-bodied farm hand is about $35 per year, with board; and without board, $50. Per day with board it will not average more than fifteen to twenty cents. Female labor is much cheaper. To do work in a house or on a farm stout, healthy women are engaged at from $8 to $10 per year, with food; and without food, $25 to $30, and by the day at from ten to fifteen cents. The number of hours of labor will not average nine, and probably not more than eight. The Japanese farmer is an easy task-master, and treats his hired labor with great kindness. In ordinary farming there is little skilled labor, but in tea, silk, and sugar cultivation and preparation, skill and experience are required, and are paid higher prices. A good tea-firer on a tea plantation, or a silk winder, receives double the wages of the unskilled laborer.

CLOTHING.—'The clothing of the farm laborer in summer is little more than nature sent him into the world with; in winter a cotton garment or two is worn, with straw sandals or wooden clogs. The whole clothing of a year will not cost more than four or five dollars.

HOLIDAYS.—'Several holidays are allowed each year, such as religious festivals and family celebrations. When a man and his wife work for yearly wages they will receive, without board, about $75. From this he has to pay $8 to $10 for a two or three small-roomed house, and buy clothing for a family of four or five, amounting, perhaps, to $20. He will have a small garden with his house, from which one half of his living is produced; a few chickens and ducks, tended by the children, will buy many articles of necessity or of ornament for holiday use; a child of six or seven years, perhaps with a babe of six months strapped to its back, will gather brush or dried grass on the commons for fuel; and by great frugality in eating, and scrupulous care of clothing, at the end of the year he finds he has supported his family, had several enjoyable holidays, and has a few dollars hidden away in some secret place.

ARTISANS.

'The Japanese artisan, like the farmer, has always held a respectable position. He was in a class above the merchant and banker, but in reality his position, pay, and privileges were no greater. For a thousand years a very high mechanical art has existed. The Japanese articles and implements of steel were of the best. Some of the old swords are worthy to be classed with the Toledo and Damascus blades. Their lacquered wares have been and still are unrivaled, and they made beautiful porcelain long before Palissy and Böttcher were born. Their silk, cloth, embroideries, and silk tapestries were exquisitely beautiful at a time when some Western people wore the coarsest stuffs. Their oldest bronze compares with the finest products of Europe. Their paintings on silk and paper, porcelain and lacquer, excites the warmest attention. Their ivory and wood carvings are wonders of skill, ingenuity, and patient labor.

'There is hardly a house in Japan where some mechanical trade is not carried on. Even in the households of the higher classes, silk, cotton, and other goods are made by the servants, and the members of the family have some knowledge of the art. Every farmer's house has its wheel and loom. Many of the smaller merchants make more or less of their goods. In this view there are many more artisans in the country than are shown by the census of 1875. The number, as I have previously stated, is placed between 700,000 and 800,000. I believe that there are more than double that number who devote the greatest share of their time to manufacture, and five or six millions who work more or less at mechanical trades.'

Many of the wares used for home consumption require no special skill in their production, and therefore the labor wages are low. In the manufacture of silk, lacquer, enamels, bronze, embroideries, and in their paintings skilled labor must enter, and is paid proportionately.

Labor-saving machinery of any kind is almost wholly unknown in Japan, as it is in China and all other parts of Asia. There are said to be but two sawmills in the entire empire. There are few countries in the world where there are fewer inventions in the way of new machines. Porcelain is manufactured in all the provinces, the aggregate amount being some $3,000,000 per year, but it is chiefly done in the same manner as followed a thousand years ago, very few of the later methods used in more modern countries having been introduced.

The clay is manipulated in the ancient style, and the same wheel is employed as is shown in hieroglyphics on the walls of the tombs of Egypt. Some advance, however, has of late years been made in the way of designs and decorations, and in various articles of ornamentation. No more beautiful or exquisite ceramic articles are made than come from the hands of Japanese artisans. Love of beautiful pottery has been a natural passion for more than a thousand years. Skilled labor necessarily commands a higher price than unskilled labor. Much of the coarser work is done by apprentices and common journeymen; but a good turner at the pottery wheel gets from fifty to seventy cents per day; and the best painters from seventy-five cents to a dollar and twenty cents per day. The average, however, is much less; and makers of flowers and figures of birds, etc., for ornamenting the larger vases and jars in bas-relief, secure from fifty to seventy cents a day. Safe persons, skilled in baking the ware, can demand from forty to sixty cents a day; clay washers and mixers, twenty or thirty cents.

'Makers of enameled copper and bronze work receive about the same wages as the porcelain workers; although the highest skilled laborers in inlaid bronzes sometimes command as high as a dollar and a half per day; but ordinary mechanics in this line get from thirty to seventy cents. Ivory carvers get from ten to twenty dollars per month; carpenters from twenty-five to fifty cents per day. Blacksmiths work still cheaper, and get from eighteen to forty cents per day.'

Modern lacquer workers, in the best product of the art, rank with porcelain and bronze workers; wages ranging from twenty cents to a dollar and twenty cents per day, according to the skill of the artisan and the quality of the work turned out. Ship-builders are of course employed on the coast and near seaports, and their wages average considerably higher than those of mechanics in the interior. A good ship carpenter gets from forty to fifty cents per day, while a good foreman commands from fifty to sixty dollars per month. There is, however, little danger of American mechanics coming over to Japan on account of the high wages paid here.

PROFESSIONAL LABOR.

Physicians, as a rule, do not charge for the visit to the patient, but for the medicine administered; but as a physician of high reputation charges more for the same medicine than a physician of less reputation, it amounts to about the same thing as with us. An ordinary physician receives patients at his office, and during regular hours, at twelve to twenty cents. If visits are made to the residences of the patients, the prices are doubly as high. Surgery was unknown in the old Japanese practice, but has been introduced by those who have learned in European and American schools. The better educated physicians, in order to receive practice, are compelled to be governed by prevailing prices, otherwise they would receive but few calls.

Until recently Japan was so happy as to have no lawyers, save among the foreigners; but with the introduction of modern civilization, even native lawyers are coming into fashion. It can hardly be said, however, that they have yet succeeded in establishing a footing, or that the profession has a well-defined existence. As no civil code has been adopted, and as the criminal code has been little modified, it may be some time before Japanese lawyers flourish equal to English and American lawyers.

Writers, translators, and interpreters receive all prices, from ten to fifty dollars per month. Clerks, salesmen, and book-keepers command from ten to twenty dollars per month, including board.

COOLIE OR COMMON LABOR

Is, of course, the lowest in Japan. As has been observed, these people were the serfs of the soil. Although the whole class system has been done away with, yet, as must be understood, the effect of the customs of a thousand years cannot all be removed in a short time. Not a little of the old degradation of the lower class still remains. The year 1868 found this class in utter poverty. Not one in a hundred of them owned a foot of land, or the rude roof which illy sheltered their heads from the storms. Fourteen years have done much to improve this condition. Many now own their own houses and their tools. Some have bought land, and are now farmers on their own account. Wages have been raised, and the children of the laboring classes are receiving a degree of education.

The carriers are undoubtedly the hardest-worked class in the country. This class includes the packers, who carry freight upon their backs and shoulders; the carmen, who haul heavy loads on man-carts and the jin-rik-sha men, whom I have pretty fully, described. These last, as I have told you, trot from thirty to fifty miles per day, on good roads, till the perspiration pours from them profusely, when, perhaps, they have to stop for an hour or more, without any protection, in the cold, harsh wind; and it is not strange that colds, consumption and short life are the result. Many own their own carriages and earn sixty centy cents a day, but in more numerous cases the jin-rik-shas are owned by companies or guilds and command a rental of six to ten cents per day from the poor fellows who haul them. There are thought to be four hundred thousand of these man-wagons in the country.

There are two kinds of cart carriage—one by men, the other by a bull or a cow. Those for men are heavy, requiring from two to six men to manipulate them. The loads hauled in these are often enormously heavy. All sorts of teams are in use here. An old man and a young woman with a child strapped to her back are sometimes seen hauling a loaded cart together. Ten to twelve miles a day with a loaded cart is considered a good day's work. Six or seven hundred pounds is an average load for two persons. I have seen a ton pulled along the streets of Yokohama by six men; and for this heavy work the sum of ten to twenty cents a day per man is paid. However cheerless this picture, these simple natives manage to find some enjoyment in it all. Through the country they go in a train of several carts, taking their food, rain-coats of straw, and sun-hats, and at intervals stop by some stream of clear water with pleasant shade, and here laughter and light-heartedness cheer them in their hard toil, while their simple meals satisfy the demands of hunger.

Bull carts are drawn by a single animal, by the side of which the driver walks, guiding him by a small rope fastened in the nose with an iron ring. The bull is stout, quiet, and gentle, and will travel fifteen miles a day, hauling several hundred pounds. Such an outfit, including man, bull, and cart, earns about fifty cents a day.

Packers are of two kinds—men and women, who carry loads of produce and goods on their backs over the mountain paths and along the highways down to the rivers and sea-coast, and those who use horses for the same purpose. Men and women carry from eighty to a hundred and twenty-five pounds each, and travel from twelve to fifteen miles per day, by which hard service the sum of from ten to sixteen cents a day is earned. The horses and cattle for packing are fed little but grass. They are invariably shod with straw shoes, which in the interior cost two cents a set; on stony roads two sets a day are required.

FISHERMEN.

Surrounded on all sides by the ocean, indented everywhere by broad gulfs and bays, all the alluvial portions of the country cut up by tidal streams and canals, the waters swarming with a great variety of fish suited for food, it is the most natural thing in the world that thousands of the Japanese should be fishermen. Every shore has its fishing villages. All the bays and inlets on fair days are white with the sails of fishing boats. This is the lowest class in the country. Their houses are the poorest of any, and they possess the least intelligence and culture. There are fewer schools in these isolated villages than elsewhere, and the percentage of illiteracy is decidedly greater. Physically these fishermen are equal to the rest of the population of the country, as they always have plenty of fish for food, but their general ignorance doubtless arises from a lack of culture. There is no religious prejudices against fish as food, so this fishing population has no need to go hungry.

A good fishing boat for two men costs about seventy dollars. As an average, sixty to ninety cents' worth of fish are caught per day in a boat. The wages of able-bodied fishermen by the day are fifteen to twenty cents. Women and children work along the shores at low tide gathering oysters, clams, etc.

The preparation of salted fish gives employment to large numbers of the cheaper class of laborers. This numerous fishing population, the island character of the country, the number and variety of fish in all the waters, the cheapness of transportation from the fisheries to the centers of population on the seashores and river banks, all have an important bearing upon the welfare of the laboring class. In the larger towns the fish-markets are all under the control of guilds, and in some places the boats are owned and the men employed by these guilds. In some of the larger fishing towns the guilds own as many as twelve hundred boats and employ four thousand men. Some of the boats carry eight or ten men. The sales of fish of a single guild amount to $1,500,000 per year. Fish are to be had at all prices from two to twelve cents a pound, according to the quality and locality where sold. The product of the fisheries in 1878 amounted to $10,000,000.

MINES.—The mines of Japan, in value of the product, do not take high rank. The total value from all mines and quarries in 1878 did not exceed $5,000,000. Labor is cheap, and for poverty and ignorance the miner takes the position side by side with the fisherman. His lot is harder, and his pleasures less. Common mine labor can be had for from eight to twenty cents per day, and by the month for still less. Exactly what the mine wealth of Japan is cannot be ascertained at present, and probably will never be known until the country and its hidden resources are open to foreign skill and enterprise; and this may be said with equal truth as to the cultivated lands. If worked in large tracts by skilled labor and by modern foreign implements the taxable wealth of the country would be vastly increased.

I will give you a few more paragraphs from Cousul-General Van Buren's work.

SPORTS AND PASTIMES.

The national games and sports of Japan were less active and athletic in character than those of Europe and America. The samurai were fond of horseback riding, but the laboring classes were not allowed to ride on the public roads. Even now, when the packhorses are returning unloaded from the market, and the drivers ride a portion of the way, they make sure to dismount in the presence of any of the old higher class. Foot races, or walking-matches, are not in vogue; so of boat-racing. Exclusively warlike games and practices were indulged in by the higher class. They practiced archery and fencing; and, on eating and drinking occasions, had trials of strength and skill within doors.

The lower classes had a more active class of sports. Under the harvest moon you may see a whole village collected to witness wrestling, racing, and fencing. Theatrical performances are popular, and traveling troupes of actors go from village to village, erect bamboo and mat shelters, and give entertainments for a week at a time. On such occasions the laboring classes turn out in great numbers, with all their holiday finery on, and enjoy every incident of the performance. Laboring men, in the evening, go to tea-houses, drink a light wine made from rice, sing songs, play games of skill, and recite in dramatic style from the old historians and poets. Women and girls gossip in groups at some neighbor's house, or at the public baths. Women play a simple game of checkers, while men are skilled in chess. The children have battledore and kite-flying.

In addition to this, the Japanese are great travelers. In certain months, when farm labor is not pressing, twenty or thirty friends and neighbors will arrange a pilgrimage to some of the noted shrines and temples in the mountains, going on foot as far as 150 or 200 miles. They walk leisurely along the roads and paths, talking, laughing, and singing. In the middle of the day, when tired, they sleep in the shade of the groves, eat rice, and drink tea, and are as happy as the day is long. These pilgrimages are an important feature in the social life of the laborer. They afford mental and physical relaxation, give extended observation of wide regions of country, of new, varied, and better industries, and an insight into the life and habits of their far-off countrymen.

There is another amusement to be met with on festival days, which, in the smaller villages of the interior, still exerts an influence upon the lower classes. I allude to the wayside story-telling. This afforded the only means which certain classes had of knowing the history of the country. The story-tellers have rude booths, and for a mere pittance recite by the hour the civil and military history of the different dynasties which have ruled the country. They speak the pure old Japanese, unmixed with Chinese words, which the learned affect, and thus are perfectly understood by their hearers.

LABOR ORGANIZATIONS.

Every branch of labor and trade has its guild, although not, like those of Western countries, originally formed to protect labor from the exactions of capital. The government, for purposes of revenue, farmed out to favorites exclusive privileges of trade or of labor, and these persons formed guilds and levied taxes upon all engaged in each occupation. These organizations, in time, fell more and more under the influence and control of the taxed. They gradually grew to be used for the protection of the interests of the trades. They could petition the local authorities, and, from their numbers and unity, had no inconsiderable influence.

Although the government has abolished this practice of farming these guilds, and substituted therefor individual license, the guilds still exist and zealously guard the interest of their members.

As has been said, there are no manufactories employing large capital and great numbers of operatives; but the manufactures of Japan are distinctively household. In some cases a few outside laborers are employed, but in many, perhaps a majority, of these household workshops the laborer is interested in the capital and profits of the manufacture.

If labor-saving machinery, large capital, and great establishments, employing hundreds of people, shall ever be introduced, these guilds, now operating partially in the interest of labor, may assume the importance and influence of the labor organizations in the United States.

PAUPERISM.

In all time Japan had her beggar class, who were permitted to solicit alms by the roadside and to live in huts on the waste lands. The origin of this class is unknown. Whether they are descended from the lepers, or from pardoned criminals, and thus outcasts, or from the conquered aborigines, is uncertain. Although they may still be seen here and there by the roadsides, the government discourages these proceedings, and in many cases they are arrested and subjected to punishment. There was an attempt some years since by the various local authorities to reduce the number of these beggars by furnishing them with labor, food, and clothing, but without marked success. With this exception, the government has never made any provision for the extremely poor. Farms for the poor, pauper asylums, systems of out-door relief, were and are unknown. So little food and clothing will supply the wants of the poor that the near and distant relatives of which the class are formed were enabled to provide that little. As the influence of the family organizations grow weaker, and their responsibility less, the necessity of some public provision begins to be felt.

There is another feature of society here which makes numbers of aged, indigent people less dependent upon public charity. The family never becomes extinct; the line of descent never ceases. If there are no male children to bear the name, a younger son of another family is adopted, who takes the family name, and upon whom the aged and decrepit lean for support.

SCENERY.

The remarkable beauty of Japanese scenery has won the admiration of every visitor. Her grand mountain ranges, covered with trees and shrubs, clothed in perpetual green, towered by the world-renowned Fujiyama, rearing its shining summit above the clouds, reverenced by millions of her people as the highest exhibition of nature, and the holy shrine, to which thousands of pilgrims yearly bend their steps; the charming and picturesque valleys, carpeted with richest verdure and blossoming with flowers of a thousand hues, including the lotus, queen of lilies, which fills the atmosphere with its rich perfume; the rushing torrents and winding rivers, sparkling with clearest water; her numerous and varied islands; her indented coasts, bays, and harbors; her variety of shrubs and trees, and her skies of purest blue, all combine to make their impress on the character of her people.

Cheerfulness of disposition and love of the beautiful are striking characteristics of the natives of the Niphon. Born and reared amidst such charms of nature, forms of beauty become to them every-day familiar objects, and it is no matter of wonder that they bring into existence some of the loveliest works of art that human hands have ever formed, or that the smiles of sky and earth, air and sea, should be reflected on their faces and in their lives. The laborer sings at his toil, goes cheerfully to his simple meal, and engages with the enthusiasm of boyhood in his holiday sports.

ETHNOLOGY.

It is perhaps too early to state with certainty to which of the families of the human race the Japanese belong.

Morton, long since, after examining a number of Chinese crania, decided that they are not of Chinese origin. Their language, which is always considered the strongest evidence of race, makes it certain that they are neither Chinese, Polynesian, nor of that aboriginal race to which the inhabitants of northeastern Asia belong. Whitney and Muller are inclined to place them in the great Indo-European family. If so, the conquerors of these islands must have started from the central regions of Asia, and instead of traveling west, as the other migratory hordes did, came east, crossed to Japan, and wrested the country from the Ainos, the then possessors of the soil.

ORIENTAL CIVILIZATION.

The distinctive characteristic of oriental civilization, as compared to ours of the West, is its extreme simplicity of food, dress, houses, household appurtenances, and general style of living. The precepts of religion, the maxims of government, and the times inculcate and commend the practice of frugality and rigid economy, while the whole influence of Western civilization tends to lead the laborer to habits of show and luxury beyond his means. Our styles of architecture, of food, and of clothing are incomparably more costly than those of the orient.

If a Japanese laborer had to live in our style of house, eat our animal flesh and pastries, and wear our clothing, to say nothing of the social demands upon his time and means, the cost of his living would be more than quadrupled, and the price of his products enhanced accordingly. This question of the comparative simplicity and cost of living and of production of the two civilizations will grow in importance as the two systems are brought more and more into contact and competition.

There are seven or eight hundred million people dwelling on the southern and eastern shores of Asia, the majority of them workers, living up to the requirements of this oriental simplicity, who are all ready to compete with our people in every branch of human industry. And it may be worth our while to inquire if the demands of our social system do not handicap our laborer too heavily in the contest. Of course it is not to be contemplated that our laborers are to be put upon rice, fish, or vegetable diet of these Eastern workers. Our climate alone utterly forbids such a consummation, if, in any view, it were desirable. The labor-saving machinery, created from the active brains of our inventors, so often looked upon by laboring men as destructive of employment and ruinous to their interests constitutes for the present the barrier which protects them and their interests against the rapid and perhaps lowering competition of the vast mass of laborers to which I have alluded. But this is not all that is needed. The reduction to taxation and equalization of the burdens of our government, as far as possible, the multiplication of cheap means of transportation, the building of economical and comfortable houses in cities, the positive prevention of swindling in food and clothing, the rigid scrutiny of all beverages sold, and the prohibition, under the severest penalties, of the sale of impure drinks, and the encouragement of proper co-operative associations for the purchase and sale of good, cheap provisions, are all necessary for the welfare of our great laboring population, the producers of our wealth and prosperity. So much for Van Buren.

YEZO AND THE AINOS.

I have simply mentioned the savages living on the northern-most island of the Japanese archipelago, called Ainos, but have had very little to say about them for the simple reason that I did not visit them. Their country lies farther north than I have penetrated, consequently they entirely escaped my observation. But as a description of Japan will not be complete with an account of the Ainos omitted, I must tell you something of them, availing myself of the interesting history of them given by Miss Bird in her "Unbeaten Tracks in Japan."

The island named Yezo, which is the home of the Ainos, is separated from the mainland by the Tsugaru Strait, and is in shape an irregular triangle, extending from east langitude 139° 50′ E. to 146° E., and from latitude 41° 30′ N. to 45° 30′ N. It has a climate of singular severity, a heavy snowfall, and in its northern part a Siberian winter. Its area is 35,739 square miles, or considerably more than that of Ireland, while its population is but 123,000. It is a mountainous country, with grassy plains, well watered valleys, impenetrable jungles, and impassable swamps. It has several active volcanoes, and the quietude of its extinct ones is not to be relied upon. Its forests and swamps are drained by innumerable short, rapid rivers, which are subject to violent freshets. In riding round the coast they are encountered every two or three miles, and often detain the traveler days upon their margins.

There are but few safe harbors on the coast, and though exempt from typhoons, it is swept by heavy gales and a continuous surf. The cultivated land is mainly near the sea. The interior is forest-covered, and the supplies of valuable lumber is almost inexhaustible, and are said to include thirty-six kinds of useful timber trees. Openings in the forest are heavily grassed with the Eulalia Japonica, a grass higher than the head of a man on horseback, and the forest itself is rendered impassable, not only by a dense growth of the tough and rigid dwarf bamboo, which attains a hight of eight feet, but by ropes and nooses of various vines which grow profusely everywhere. The soil is usually rich, and, the summer being warm, is favorable to the growth of most cereals and root crops. It is too far north for rice, but is well adapted for wheat. European fruit-trees are said to do better here than any part of Japan. The valleys and plains are said to be so fertile that they will produce good crops for twenty years or more without manure. The rains are so frequent that irrigation is not resorted to.

Yezo is rich in coal fields, but the government seems to be jealous of the introduction of foreign capital, and until this embargo is removed it is not likely that much development of the rich mines will be made. Mr. Lyman, at the head of the Geological Survey, estimates the quantity of coal in the Yezo coal fields at 150,000,000 tons, or in other words, that though as much coal were to be taken from those beds as is annually taken from the beds of Great Britain, it would require a thousand years to exhaust them.

The government has spent large sums of money upon Yezo, some of which has been sunk in profitless enterprises, while others bear fruit in productive improvements. Appropriations of over $300,000 a year have been made for such improvements. The island differs so much in its general features and natural productions from the rest of Japan that it is exempt from the ordinary taxes and is subject to special imports on produce, which bring in a revenue of $360,000 annually, a pretty large sum to be paid by a population so small.

The chief and most hopeful operation in the island is an agricultural college, on the model of the Massachusetts Agricultural College, under native direction, on the staff of which are four professors. Its graduating course is four years, and the number of students is limited to sixty. It gives a sound English education, with special attention to surveying and civil engineering, as required in the construction of highways, railroads, drainage, and irrigation works.

The government is supposed to have two objects in view in developing Yezo. One is to provide a field for emigration for the inhabitants of those portions of Japan which are supposed to be over-populated, and the other, by building up a population in Yezo, to erect a sort of bulwark against aggressive designs which are supposed to be entertained by Russia, a power which is as much distrusted in Japan as in England. Colonies have been settled in several favorable regions, grants of land have been made to a great many of the samurai class, and at Satsuporo nearly a thousand soldiers are settled with their families, in detached houses. Seeds and fruit trees are sold to settlers at a very low price, and many agricultural advantages are provided which do not exist on the main island; but either from a natural disinclination to emigrate, or from a dread of the taxes imposed on produce, Yezo fails to attract a population, and a region which could support six millions has a scattered sprinkling, and that mainly around the coasts, of only 123,000. The fisheries of this island are magnificent, and rival those on the opposite coast of Oregon; but they are over-taxed, the tax levied being from ten to twenty-five per cent on the yield. Salmon is a specialty, but cuttle-fish, seaweed, and other fish, are also important articles of export. There are many fishing stations on the southern coast. Salmon fishing there is one of the sights of Japan; some of the seines are four thousand feet in length, and require seventy men to work them; a pair of such, making three hauls a day, sometimes catch 20,000 salmon, averaging, when cured, ten pounds each. The revenue of the fisheries of Ishkari River alone is $15,000 a year. The fish of Yezo are not only sent throughout the interior of Japan, but are also shipped to China. The Ainos are largely employed in the fishing, and an immense number of the emigrants from the provinces of Japan resort to Yezo for the fishing season.

From the interior, in Hakodate, the port town, at different seasons of the year, are to be bought, at moderate price, hares, grouse, deer, quail, snipe, teal, venison, wild ducks and bears. Bear furs and deer skins are among the important articles of export.

The chief objects of interest to the traveler in Yezo is the remnant of the Aino race, the aborigines of Yezo, and not improbably of the whole of Japan. They are peaceful savages who live on the coast and in the interior, their principal occupation being hunting and fishing. They stand in relation to the Japanese subjugators as do the Indians of America to their conquerors. As regards taxes, they pay partly in money and partly in kind.

These savages are often called "hairy Ainos." They are stupid, gentle, good-natured, and submissive. They are a wholly distinct race from the Japanese. In complexion they resemble the people of Spain and southern Italy; in the expression of the face, and of the manner of showing courtesies, European, rather than Asiatic. They are not taller than the Japanese, but much stronger. Their hair is a jet black, very soft, and on the scalp forms thick masses, occasionally wavy, but never showing any tendency to curl. The beard, moustache, and eyebrows are thick and full, and there is frequently a heavy growth of hair on the chest and limbs. The neck is short, brow broad, high, and massive, the nose broad and inclined to flatness, the mouth wide and well formed, the lines of the eyes and eyebrows perfectly straight, and the frontal sinuses well marked. Their language is a very simple one. They have no written characters, no literature, no history, few traditions, and have left no impressions on the land from which they have been driven. In Yezo, the traveller is conscious of a freer atmosphere than he has breathed on the main island. It is not only the air that circulates more freely, but men and beasts have more elbow room. There are very few restrictions toward travelers who visit this island. One can ride around the place without being stopped by a trespass notice; he can leave the roads and gallop for miles over breezy commons, by the seashore, covered with roses, and can lead a half savage life, and swim rivers, and climb mountains, and light fires in the woods, without breaking any regulations. In short, he can do all that can be done on the mainland. Apart from the interest of investigation and observation, there is a charm about the thinly peopled country, a fascination in the long moan of the Pacific, in the glorious loneliness of the region around Volcano Bay, and in the breeziness and freedom of Yezo life, in some respects the most delightful to be found in Japan.

After passing three days with these savages, the Ainos, Miss Bird writes of them as follows: "I am in the lonely Aino land, and I think the most interesting of my traveling experience has been the living for three days and two nights in an Aino hut, and seeing and sharing the daily life of complete savages, who go on with their ordinary occupations just as if I was not among them. I found yesterday a most fatiguing and over-exciting day, as everything was new and interesting, even the extracting from men who have few if any ideas in common with me, all I could extract concerning their religion and customs, and that through an interpreter. I got up at six this morning to write out my notes, and have been writing for five hours, and there is shortly the prospect of another savage seance. The distractions, as you can imagine, are many. At this moment a savage is taking a cup of saké by the fire in the center of the floor. He salutes me by extending his hands and waving them toward his face, and then dips a rod in the saké and makes six libations to the god—an upright piece of wood, with a fringe of shavings, planted in the floor of the room. Then he waves the cup several times toward himself, makes other libations to the fire, and drinks. Ten other men and women are sitting along each side of the fire-hole; the chief's wife is cooking, the men are apathetically contemplating the preparation of their food; and the other women, who are never idle, are splitting the bark of which they make their clothes. I occupy the guest's seat—a raised platform at one end of the fire, with the skin of a black bear thrown over it.

"I have reserved all I have to say about the Ainos till I had been actually among them, and I hope you will have patience to read to the end. We took three horses and a mounted Aino guide, and found a better track the whole way. It turns into the forest at once on leaving Sarufuto, and goes through the forest the entire distance, with an abundance of reedy grass higher than my hat on horseback along it; and, as it is only twelve inches broad and much overgrown, the horses were constantly pushing through leafage soaking from a night's rain, and I was soon wet up to my shoulders. The forest trees are almost solely the ailanthus glandulosus and the zelkowa keaki, often matted together with a white-flowered trailer of the hydrangea genus. The undergrowth is simply hideous, consisting mainly of coarse, reedy grass, monstrous docks, the large-leaved polygonum cuspadatum, several umbelliferous plants, and a 'ragweed,' which, like most of its gawky fellows, grows from five to six feet high. The forest is dark and very silent, threaded by this narrow path, and by others as narrow, made by hunters in search of game. The main road sometimes plunges into deep bogs; at others, is roughly corduroyed by the roots of trees, and frequently hangs over the edge of abrupt and much-worn declivities, in going upon one of which the baggage horse rolled down a bank fully thirty feet high, and nearly all the tea was lost. At another the guide's pack-saddle lost its balance, and man, horse, and saddle went over the slope, pots, pans, and packages flying after them. At another time my horse sank up to his chest in a very bad bog, and, as he was totally unable to extricate himself, I was obliged to scramble upon his neck and jump to terra-firma over his ears.

"There is something very gloomy in the solitude of this silent land, with its beast-haunted forests, its great patches of pasture, the resort of wild animals which haunt the lower regions in search of food when the snow drives them down from the mountains, and its narrow track, indicating the single file in which the savages of the interior walk with their bare, noiseless feet. Reaching the Sarufutogawa, a river with a treacherous bottom, in which Mr. Van Siebold and his horse came to grief, I hailed an Aino boy, who took me up the stream in a 'dug-out,' and after that we passed through Beroka, Saruba, and Mina, all purely Aino villages, situated among small patches of millet, tobacco, and pumpkins, so choked with weeds that it was doubtful whether they were crops. I was much surprised with the extreme neatness and cleanliness outside the houses; 'model villages' they are in these respects, with no litter lying in sight anywhere, nothing indeed but dog troughs, hollowed out of logs, like 'dug-outs' for the numerous yellow dogs, which are a feature of Aino life. There were neither puddles nor heaps, but the houses, all trim and in good respect, rise clean out of the sandy soil.

"Buatori, the largest of the Aino settlements in this region, is very prettily situated among forests and mountains on rising ground, with a very sinuous river winding at its feet and a wooded hight above. A lonelier place could scarcely be found. As we passed among the houses the yellow dogs barked, the women looked shy, smiled, and the men made their graceful salutation. We stopped at the chief's house, where, of course, we were expected guests; but Shinondi, his nephew, and two other men came out, saluted us, and with most hospitable intent helped Ito to unload the horses. Indeed their eager hospitality created quite a commotion, one running hither and another thither in their anxiety to welcome a stranger. It is a large house, thirty-five by twenty-five, and the roof twenty feet high; but you enter by an antechamber, in which are kept the millet-mill and other articles. There is a doorway in this, but the inside is pretty dark, and Shinondi, taking my hand, raised the reed curtain bound with hide, which concealed the entrance into the actual house, and leading me into it, retired a footstep, extended his arms, waved inward three times, and then stroked his beard several times, after which he indicated by a sweep of his hand and a beautiful smile that the house and all it contained were mine. An aged woman, the chief's mother, who was splitting bark by the fire, waved her hands also. She is the queen-regent of the house.

"Again taking my hand, Shinondi led me to the place of honor at the head of the fire, a rude, movable platform six feet long by four broad and a foot high, on which he laid an ornamental mat, apologizing for not having at the moment a bearskin wherewith to cover it. The baggage was speedily brought in by several willing pairs of hands; some reed mats, fifteen feet long, were laid down upon the very coarse ones which covered the whole floor, and when they saw Ito putting up my stretcher they hung a fine mat along the rough wall to conceal it, and suspended another on the beams of the roof for a canopy. The alacrity and instinctive hospitality with which these men rushed about to make things comfortable were very fascinating, though comfort is a word misapplied in an Aino hut. The women only did what the men told them. They offered me food at once, but I told them I had brought my own, and would only ask leave to cook it on their fire. I need not have brought my cups, for they have many lacquered bowls, and Shinondi brought me on a lacquered tray a bowlful of water from one of their farm wells. They said that Benri, the chief, would wish me to make his house my own as long as I cared to stay, and I must excuse them in all things in which their ways were different from my own. Shinondi and four others in the village speak tolerable Japanese, and this is of course the medium of communication. They have never seen a foreign woman, and only three foreign men, but there is neither crowding nor staring as among the Japanese, possibly in part from apathy and want of intelligence. For three days they have kept up their graceful and kindly hospitality, going on with their ordinary life and occupations, and though I have lived among them in this room by day and night, there has been nothing which in any way could offend the most fastidious sense of delicacy. They said they would leave me to eat and rest, and all retired but the chief's mother, a wierd, witch-like woman of eighty, with shocks of yellow-white hair and a stern suspiciousness in her wrinkled face. I have come to feel as if she had the evil eye, as she sits there watching, watching always, and forever knotting the bark thread like one of the Fates, keeping a jealous watch upon her son's two wives, and on other young women who come in to weave—neither the dullness nor the repose of old age about her, and her eyes gleam with a greedy light when she sees saké, of which she drains a bowl without taking breath. She alone is suspicious of strangers, and she thinks my visit bodes no good to her tribe. I see her eyes fixed upon me now, and they make me shudder."

After partaking of a hospitable supper with these simple people Miss Bird asked them many questions concerning their religion and customs. Later on she witnessed the natives partaking of a stew which the women had prepared, which was dipped out into lacquer bowls and eaten with wooden spoons, after which saké, which is their curse, was pretty freely drank, though before partaking of it a portion is always offered to their god, which is little more than a wooden post, and six libations are religiously made to the fire. Unfortunately these people believe there is a religious virtue in drinking freely of saké. They think their gods are pleased with these oblations and libations; drinking saké enters into all their worship. There is no question but what they please themselves by their worship far more than their gods, and this remark will apply equally to all other gods and worshipers.

The gods of these Ainos are rudely carved posts of wood, with festoons of shavings hanging around the upper part. Household gods form an essential part of the furnishing of every house. At the left of the entrance are ten white wands, with appended shavings attached to the upper end; the wands are stuck into the wall, while the others end project out of the window which faces the rising sun—the morning sun being a special object of adoration with all races and tribes. The great god, a white post two feet high, with spirals of shavings depending from the top, is always planted in the floor near the wall on the left side opposite the fire. The least that can be said about these gods of the Ainos is that they are harmless and not malicious, and that is far more than can be said of other gods, especially the one so largely worshiped in Europe and America. Could he be converted into an immovable post, the fears and unhappiness of his worshipers would be greatly lessened.

Miss Bird says there cannot be anything more vague and destitute of cohesion than the Aino religious notions. With the exception of one shrine of Japanese construction, dedicated to the god Yoshitsune, they have no temples, and they have neither priests, sacrifices, nor worship save the drinking of saké. They seem to have retained the crudest ideas of nature-worship, with a high veneration for departed ancestors. It has been thought that the religion of the Ainos is the crude origin of the ancient Japanese Shinto. They attach a vague sacredness to trees, rivers, rocks, mountains, the sea, forests, the fire, the sun and moon, and also have vague notions of the power of good and evil. Here is doubtless preserved in its purity a very fair specimen of primitive religion, conceived by man when in a low, savage state, and which is the parent of all religions and conceptions of supernatural power.

They are simply admirers of animate and inanimate nature. The outward symbol of their religion—wands, posts—seem to somewhat correspond with the Shinto gohei. These are sometimes set up in their houses to the number of twenty, and also on precipices, banks of rivers and streams, and mountain passes, and these wands are also thrown into the rivers as the boatmen descend rapids and dangerous places.

With the exception of the god Yoshitsune, the most popular hero of Japan history and a special favorite, the Ainos' ideas of deity are extremely vague, and the whole sum of their religion is a few loose fears and a suspicion that there are things outside themselves more powerful than themselves, whose good influences may be obtained, or whose evil influences may be averted by libations of saké, of which their worship consists. By waving bowls of this intoxicating drink they imagine their gods are pleased, and who can say they are not as near right as those who perform the similar absurdity of partaking of bread and wine, which they profess to believe to be their God? Their worship of the sun and moon, and of the forest and sea, is the grandest portion of their religion. The wolf, the black snake, the owl, and several other beasts and birds, have the word kamoi-god attached to them, as the wolf is the howling god, the owl the bird of gods, and the black snake the raven god, but none of these are now worshiped, wolf worship having quite lately died out. Thunder is thought to be the voice of the gods, and inspires them with fear. The sun, they correctly say, is the best god, and the fire their next best; these are the divinities from whom their greatest benefits are received. Some idea of gratitude pervades their rude notions, as in the case of the worship paid to Yoshitsune. In their chants and recitations at the Saturnalia, held in honor of this god, they use these words:

"To the sea which nourishes us, to the forest which protects us, we present our grateful thanks. You are two mothers that nourish the same child; do not be angry if we leave one to go to the other. The Ainos will always be the pride of the forest and of the sea." Really this is far more sensible than many chants that are made to gods less known than this.

The solitary act of sacrifice which they perform is the placing of a worthless dead bird, something like a sparrow, near one of their peeled wands, where it is left until it reaches an advanced state of putrefaction. "To drink for the god" is the chief act of worship, and this drunkenness and religion are inseparable, as the more saké the Anios drink the more devout they are, and the better pleased are the gods. It seems there is nothing but saké of sufficient value to please the gods, simply because saké pleases the worshipers better than anything else. The libations to the fire and the peeled posts are never omitted, and are always accompanied by the waving of the saké bowls.

More Christian Questions Answered.

Few things afford us more pleasure than answering the honest questions of Christian friends, believing it to be always a worthy object to dispense the blessings of light and truth, especially to those sitting in darkness, and to whom the light of nature has not been revealed. It is always well to be charitable and generous to those less favored than ourselvs.

The following questions are from the Rev. John Smith. This somewhat numerous personage has often been heard from in various parts of the world, and in various situations. He was first known as Captain John Smith, whose life was saved by Pocahontas, the beautiful daughter of Powhatan, in Virginia; since that time he has turned up in numerous places. A short time ago it was given out that John Smith had sailed for Australia; a little later it was announced that John Smith had been engaged in a fist-fight in Alabama, and had got badly whipped; and later still, just a few weeks ago, the papers stated that John Smith had committed suicide, somewhere in Pennsylvania, near Harrisburg. But these accounts must hav been mistakes of the printers, for now it appears that John Smith has become a reverend, and is preaching the gospel out in Oregon. We will, however, answer his questions all the same, and hope he will receive light enough so as after awhile to understand nature and her laws better than he does at present, and become a sensible, earnest Liberal. Here is his letter:

HILLSBORO, OREGON, Aug. 30, 1882.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: About one year ago, while you were abroad, I wrote and sent an article to E. Macdonald for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER; the article was in refutation of infidel arguments against the flood and Noah's ark. The article was printed, and brought forth what purported to be a reply from Macdonald. Soon after I submitted to him a series of questions, with the request that he would answer them; but I failed to bring forth a response, hence I arrived at the conclusion that Macdonald either did not favor a discussion, and chose to avoid it, or that it was a forbidden topic. I believe in discussion, and believe it is the proper method to arrive at the truth, and if you are of the same opinion, and willing to discuss, I would like to submit for your consideration a series of questions which I would like you to answer in a fair and square manner. I am willing for you to submit the same number of questions to myself, to which I will giv fair answers and an honest examination. If my proposition meets with your favor, we may all learn some truth by so doing. The following questions and answers are relativ to Jesus as a historical character, and to his divinity:

1. Is it not a self-evident fact that Jesus Christ once existed, and was a notable character superior to man, from the very fact that his birth, life, and death were the cause of a chronological era being inaugurated, styled A.D., or the year of our Lord Jesus Christ?

2. Is it not a fact that millions of Christians exist to-day as a monument to Christ's memory sufficient evidence to prove that he must hav had an existence, and also that he must hav figured very conspicuously among people of his time to hav made so many followers as early as the year 40 A.D.?

3. If Christ never had an existence, and was only a myth, how did a sect of people become possessed of the name Christian? For an illustration, the Mohammedans derived their name from Mohammed; Christians, from Christ.

4. Can you cite a parallel case where a sect of people ever assumed the name of a myth?

5. Did not Buddha, Mohammed, and other notable men hav followers who assumed the name of Buddhists, Mohammedans, etc.? The sect of Mohammedans to-day proves that Mohammed once existed by their name and other proofs, as do Christians prove the existence of Jesus.

6. Infidelity not only claims that Bible personages are mythical, but claims that personages of quite modern history are myths, as I see claims that William Tell of Switzerland is a myth. I find by history that William Tell was a real historical character. It would be interesting to me, and probably to some of your readers, if you would giv some authority on that William Tell myth idea. To me it is as amusing as your claim that Jesus is a myth. Hoping you will giv my questions an honest examination, and answer them in a fair spirit,

Yours in Christ, REV. JOHN SMITH.

It is, perhaps, to be regretted that the Rev. John Smith's previous questions were not duly published and answered, but Eugene avers that he was overcrowded, and also that he did not regard the inquiries as of much importance. However, to make amends for his lack of space and appreciation, we will endeavor to answer Bro. Smith's foregoing questions the best we know how.

1. Our reply to the first question must be, No. It is not a self-evident fact that Jesus Christ once existed and was a notable character, superior to man. The assertion that any person existed is not a "self-evident fact" that he did exist unless there is some proof to verify the claim. The existence of the sun's rays is a self-evident fact on a bright day in July, to one who is compelled to stand bareheaded and uncovered for a few hours in its scorching light. Cold is a self-evident fact to one who has to ride a few hours insufficiently clothed, facing a northwest wind, when the mercury stands at twenty-five degrees below zero. But the simple assertion that Jesus Christ once lived is not a self-evident fact any more than is the assertion that such characters once lived as Aladdin and his wonderful lamp, Sindbad the Sailor, the Old Man of the Sea, or Robinson Crusoe and his Man Friday. Millions of people hav existed whose names never came down to our times, and thousands of names hav been repeated to us of imaginary persons who never had an existence.

There might hav been a humble individual named Jesus, and it is quite possible he may hav been put to death for claiming a right to assume the rulership of the country where he lived, or for some other cause, but there is no historical proof that such a character ever lived. If he did liv, he was not superior to man, for he was a man; the claims that he was begotten by God, that his mother was a virgin, that he performed miracles, that he rose from the dead and ascended bodily up into the upper atmosphere, are claims mythical and unproved. There is no history to sustain such claims, and the most of them were not even set up until the latter part of the second century. The matter of connecting remarkable events and wonderful powers with an individual a long time after his death has been very common in all ages of the world. In scores of instances noted characters hav been credited with exploits which they never performed. The tendency toward hero-worship, and the deification of rulers, generals, and other distinguished persons, has been very great. The simple claim of miracle-working set up for any one is not in itself worth a cent unless substantiated by the strongest proof.

The belief in Christ is no more a proof that such a person had an existence than the belief in Santa Claus, or Saint Nicholas, proves that this latter personage has an existence. There are millions of children who have the fullest confidence that their favorite Santa Claus is a veritable character, for see, what tangible proofs they have of it; every Christmas eve they hang up their stockings, and lo and behold! the same are filled with toys, sweets, goodies, and various other interesting trinkets so prized by the little folks. They are clearly convinced that he not only exists, but calls upon them personally once a year and bestows his blessings upon them. It may be regarded as childish in these little people to so easily believe in a myth, but there is just as much proof that their god has an existence as the god or Christ of the older children, who in the matter of proof have no advantage of them.

The matter of a chronological era being founded on the story of Jesus proves nothing, except that it was adopted on account of the popularity his story attained. The application of A.D., Anno Domini—the year of our Lord—was not made till the sixth century. It was first made use of by Dionysius the Little, a Roman abbot, and began to be used in Gaul in the eighth century, though it was not generally adopted in that country till a hundred years later. It was adopted in England toward the close of the same century. The fact that a system of chronology was adopted eight hundred years after the supposed birth of Christ has not the slightest bearing upon the question of his real existence, for the Romish abbot who first started it knew nothing about whether Christ had existed more than is known to-day, nor did those who adopted the same style of counting years two or three centuries later know anything more about it than he did. All of them together knew just nothing at all. The thing was indefinit and uncertain at best, for there is a diversity of opinion, even among Christian authorities, as to which year it was in which Jesus was born—a difference of four years according to some, of seven years according to others, and much more than seven years still according to others. The year of the birth of Jesus is no more settled than the month in which he was born. Nearly every month in the year has been claimed by various Christian writers as the month in which he was born. It is extremely difficult to establish myths with any kind of certainty.

The 25th of December was finally settled upon by the Christian church as the birth-day of their God, because that day had long been kept as a festival by many pagan nations, from the Persians down to the Romans and the Druids, as the birth-day of their gods, particularly the sun, which on that day may be said to be born, or to begin to rise from the state of night or death into which for six months it had been sinking. The church showed its usual shrewdness in appropriating this great pagan festival and making it its own, especially as it was just as easy to say its God was born on that day as any other. From the story in the four gospels there is no indication as to which of the days of the year was his birth-day. There is a wide range for choice, one having as much authority as another.

There hav been many eras or systems of counting years among men in different nations and in different periods of time. Thus, we hav what is called the era of the creation of the world, the Chinese chronology, the Indian chronology, the Egyptian era, the era of Yezdegird, or Persian era, the Jewish era, era of Nabonassar, era of the Seleucidæ, or Macedonian era, era of Alexander, era of Antioch, era of Tyre, era of Constantinople, era of Actium, the Julian period, era of Augustus, era of the Armenians, the Mohammedan era, or era of the Hegira, etc. Last of all came the adoption of the Christian era, which proves nothing more than that by the consent of the nations who believed in the system it was adopted. It is both vague and without importance as a matter of proof. The adoption of the Christian era was not because it was known that such a person as Jesus had actually lived, but because a belief in him had prevailed in several countries.

2. The answer to the next question must also be no. The existence of Christians to-day is not sufficient proof that Jesus once lived any more than the belief of millions of India in Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, and Christna is a proof that those myths once had a real existence, or than the belief of the Greeks and Romans in Jupiter and Apollo was proof that those myths ever existed. If the two hundred and fifty millions who profess to be believers in Christianity prove its truth, then the five hundred millions who believe in Buddhism must necessarily prove it to be twice as true as Christianity.

It is a great mistake to suppose that Jesus figured conspicuously among the people of his time, neither did he hav a great number of followers about the year 40, nor for a hundred years afterward. There is no proof to that effect. If he lived, he was simply a sort of tramp, roving around from place to place, followed by some obscure fishermen and other idlers; no historian of the time knowing anything about him or saying anything about him. There is no claim that he ever committed a word of his teachings to writing, or that he organized a church, or established a society. Those who believed in him did not become very numerous nor powerful till the fourth century, when Constantine, for political and selfish reasons, embraced the so-called religion of Christ. Buddhism and Mohammedanism, and even Mormonism, spread far more rapidly than did Christianity.

3. My reply to the third question may be this: On the basis that Christ never had an existence it is no more strange that a sect grew out of a belief in him than that sects in India called Vishnuites, Sivaites, believers in Christna, etc., grew out of belief in those divinitie. The world has greatly abounded in sects and religions who claimed to believe in characters and gods that never had a real existence. The presence of Buddhism and Mohammedanism would not be sufficient to prove the existence of Buddha and Mohammed were there not corroborating proof, which is lamentably deficient in the Christian story.

4. To the fourth question—"Can you cite a parallel case when a sect of people ever assumed the name of a myth?"—the answer is, Yes, hundreds of them. For thousands of years sects hav existed which assumed the names of myths. It is necessary to mention but a few of them. Among the most prominent, however, of the myths of the past in which numerous sects hav believed may be named Brahma, Vishnu, Siva, Rama, Christna, Changti, Pak-Tai, Kwan-Tai, Kwan-Non, Osiris, Isis, Horus, Neph, Amun, Ra, Pthah, Khem, Sati, Neith, Maut, Seb, Serapis, Thoth, Anubis, Anouke, Athor, Khunsa, Pecht, Anu, Anata, Bel, Baal, Hea, Ninip, Merodach, Nergal, Ishtar, or Ashtoreth, Nebo, Beltis, Ashur, Adad, Anab, Melkart, Asherah, Moledah, Chemosh, El, Molock, Jupiter, Juno, Saturn, Neptune, Apollo, Mercury, Minerva, Diana, Venus, Pan, Bacchus, Hercules, Esculapius, Prometheus, Jason, Theseus, Castor, Pollox, Perseus, Odin, Thor, Balder, Frey, Frigga, Morino, Anyamber, Taaroa, Oro, Allah, Mumbo Jumbo, and any quantity of others. These were all myths. They hav been believed in by hundreds of millions, and there is just as much proof of the existence of these as of Jesus, or his reputed father, Jehovah, Yahweh, Adonai, El Shaddai, or whatever else he may be called.

5. To the fifth question the answer, yes, should be given to a part of it. The followers of Buddha and Mohammed were named after the leaders they believed in, so were the Vishnuites, the Sivaites, the Christnaites, and the Ramaites, named after the personages they believed in, though these latter ones were absolute myths, and no unduped person believes they ever had a real existence. The fact that the believers in Christ are called Christians does not prove that he existed any more than the believers in Siva and Christna prove that those myths existed as persons, or the existence of the Mormons proves that Mormon was a real person. There is no question but there hav been more inventions, more myths, and more falsehoods gotten up in the domain of religion than in all the other forms of thought or belief.

6. Now as to the case of William Tell. While it is not improbable that there might hav been a Swiss man by the name of Tell who opposed the tyranny of the Austrians, represented by Gessler, the story about shooting an apple from the head of his son was simply a repetition of an old sun myth not less than five thousand years old, handed down to us from the ancient Aryans, the early inhabitants of Central Asia, from whom we largely obtained our modern languages, our religions and worshipful notions, the basis of our literature, and many of the nursery tales which for thousands of years hav been recited to the children of succeeding generations, and by the mothers and nurses of our generation transmitted to another, just as the story of "Cinderella and the Glass Slipper," "Jack the Giant-killer," "Beauty and the Beast," and many other similar beautiful tales, used even in our day, are traceable back to the ancient Aryans. When they emigrated into the Western countries, which were afterward called Europe, they took their favorit tales and legends with them, and that is the way in which many of those charming stories became so general in Europe, and were still later brought to this continent and became the folk-lore of our own beloved land. We owe very much to those ancient Aryans. Our nursery stories, our adoration of the grand and beautiful in nature, our myths, our religious sentiments and superstitions, the foundation of our language and literature, we naturally inherited from them as any inheritance descends from parents to children. Let me quote what Prof. Edward Clodd, F.R.A.S., a learned English writer, says of the story of William Tell in his "Childhood of Religions:"

"The story is well known how in the 1307th year after Christ the cruel Gessler set a hat upon a pole as a symbol of the ruling power and ordered every one who passed by to bow before it. A mountaineer named Tell refused to obey the order and was at once brought before Gessler. As Tell was known to be an expert archer, he was sentenced by way of punishment to shoot an apple off the head of his own son. The apple was placed on the boy's head, and the father bent his bow; the arrow sped and went through the apple. Gessler saw that Tell before shooting had stuck another arrow in his belt and asked the reason. Tell replied, 'To shoot you, tyrant, had I slain my child.' Now although the crossbow which Tell is said to have used is shown at Zurich, the event never took place. One poor man was condemned to be burnt alive for daring to queston the story, but the poor man was right.

"The story is told not only in Iceland, Denmark, Norway, Finland, Russia, Persia, and perhaps India, but is common to the Turks and Mongolians, while a legend of the wild Samoyedes, who never heard of Tell or saw a book in their lives, relates it, chapter and verse, of one of their marksmen. In its English form it occurs in the ballad William of Cloudesly. The bold archer says:

'I hav a sonne seven years old;
Hee is to me full deere;
I will tye him to a stake—
All shall see him that bee here—
And lay an apple upon his head,
And goe six paces him froe,
And I myself, with a broad arrowe,
Shall cleave the apple in towe.'

"The story is an old Aryan myth. Tell is the sun-god whose arrow (light-rays) never miss their mark, and likewise kill their foes."

The same author then continues to give the same source for the touching nursery story of the faithful dog Gellert killing the wolf which came to destroy Llewellyn's child, and how when the prince came home and found the cradle empty, and the dog's mouth smeared with blood, he quickly slew the brave creature, and then found the child safe and the wolf dead beside it. He says, "At Baddgelert in North Wales you may see the dog's grave neatly railed round." He then continues: "Now this story occurs in all sorts of forms in the folk-lore of nearly every Aryan people, and is found in China and Egypt. In India a black snake takes the place of the wolf, the ichneumon that of the dog, while in Egypt the story says that the cook nearly killed a wali for smashing a potfull of herbs, and then discovered among the herbs there lurked a poisonous snake. It is safe to conclude that marvelous things which are said to have happened in so many places never happened any where."

He then goes on to show that the beautiful Greek story of Cupid and Psyche, of Cinderella, Samson and Delilah, and other old stories of a similar kind, are simply ancient Aryan sun-myths that hav been repeated millions upon millions of times in the thousands of years that hav passed since the their origin.

To return to Tell, a quotation upon the subject from Johnson's Cyclopedia will be in order:

According to Swiss legends Tell was a celebrated marksman with the bow, living as a hunter at Burgelen, in the canton of Uri, and a member of the conspiracy which was formed against Austria at Grutli, November 7, 1307, by Walter Furst, of Uri, his father-in-law, Werner Stauffacher, of Schwytz, and Arnold von Melchthal, of Unterwalden, and which finally succeeded in freeing the country from the foreign yoke.

The story of the pole with the hat on it, of Tell's refusing to bow to it, of his being compelled, as a punishment, to shoot an apple from his son's head, is related, and this high authority concludes thus:

Of this story about Gessler, Tell, Stauffacher, etc., the oldest Swiss chroniclers, Johannes, of Winterthur, Justinger, of Berne, and Hemmerlin, of Zurich, know nothing. The first mention of these names and incidents is made in the latter part of the fifteenth century by Das weisse Buch, and a complete narrativ does not occur until the middle of the sixteenth century in the Chronicon Helveticum, by Ægidias Tschudi. The monuments erected in various places in honor of Tell are of a much later date. These circumstances early made the story of Tell somewhat suspected, though as a general rule it was considered as real history; even Johannes von Muller accepted it. Later critics, however, hav proved that the whole story is nothing but a legend common among the nations of the Aryan race, found, with all its principal features, in the Persian poet Ferid ed-Din Attar, the Icelandic "Vilkinasaga," the Danish historian Saxo Grammaticus, the English popular song on William of Cloudesly, and only modified to suit Swiss circumstances.

Here, then, is the whole thing in a nutshell. There might hav been in Switzerland between five and six hundred years ago a man by the name of Tell, who, perhaps, was a brave and valorous defender of liberty, or at all events there was a legend of such a character, and nearly two hundred years from the date of his birth the Aryan sun-myth about the apple was vaguely added to the story, and some two centuries later it was fixed up more definitly and was accepted, by those who did not know to the contrary, as absolute history, when, in fact, there was not a word of truth in the matter. That is the way in which legends hav been accepted as history in hundreds of cases.

So, in all reasonable probability, it was with the mythical story of Jesus. There might or might not, to begin with, hav been such a person as Jesus, and he might hav been put to death for political or other reasons, as thousands upon thousands of others hav been, both before and since, and within two hundred years from the time of his birth, when all the world had with reference to him were vague legends, these were dressed up and changed to suit the popular Christian demand; and the miraculous conception, his mother being a virgin, the visit of the Jew-God to see her, his wonderful miracles, his resurrection from the dead, and his ascension to heaven were added to the legend, and in the course of centuries such men as the Rev. John Smith hav accepted it as history, when, in reality, it is not history at all; it is not corroborated in the slightest degree by contemporaneous history, or writers of the time.

It is agreed by all reliable authorities that the writings of Paul are much older than any other parts of the New Testament—at least a hundred years older than the four gospels; but while his whole hobby and song was "Jesus and him crucified," he has not a word to say about Jesus being begotten in a miraculous manner by the Jewish deity; not a word about Jesus being the son of a virgin; not a word about his miraculous ascension; not a word about the wonderful miracles he performed. Neither does Peter in his Epistle (and one of them is considered genuin) set up any such claim. These facts, together with the additional one that these miraculous claims were not set up till the latter part of the second century, go very far to convince the candid thinker that the Tell tactics were employed in the case of Jesus. If he did exist, his story was greatly changed by the imaginativ and false writers of the second century, as was done in the case of Tell and the apple story. It is a matter of history that the myth of virgin and child—Isis and Horus—was believed in in Egypt nearly two thousand years before Christianity existed, and that in India the myth of a god overshadowing a virgin, of her conceiving and bringing forth an infant god, of his being sought by an arch enemy and large numbers of infants being slain, of his growing up and leading a wandering life, followed by disciples to whom he taught excellent morals, of his performing wonderful miracles, of his finally being put to death by his enemies upon a tree, and for the good of mankind, was believed nearly a thousand years before Christianity was known. It is known, too, that with different nations such demigods—divinely begotten—as Crite, Taut, Fohi, Zulis, Devatat, Prometheus, Esculapius, Adonis, Hercules, and several others were believed in and worshiped, all of them not less than five hundred years before the time of Jesus, and several of them were claimed to hav been crucified by their enemies. There was thus no more difficulty in finding material to finish out the legend of Jesus in the second century than there was with William Tell two hundred years after his time. And judging from the characters of the early fathers and leaders of the church, it is very easy to understand that they were the very persons capable of borrowing the miraculous features from the older nations and systems. That such appropriations were made there is the very best reasons for believing.

It is to be hoped that the Rev. John Smith's questions are answered to his satisfaction, to the enlightenment of himself and the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that the same is done in a "fair and square manner." If we hav failed to do this we will try again. We believe in discussion as much as himself. If the reverend gentleman has other questions upon which he wishes us to throw some of our strong light, he has only to apply; we will do the best by him we can. The same offer holds good to all others, whether Christian or otherwise. Whoever wants some of the light which we hav, or whoever wishes to know the reasons for the faith we hav within us, shall receive respectful attention by applying at our shop.

Since the Rev. John Smith was so kind as to say we might propound the same number of questions to him that he has to us, we will cheerfully avail ourselvs of his generous offer. Here they are:

1. Is there any reliable history in the world about Jesus save what is contained in the four narrativs attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John? If yes, please name it.

2. Is there any contemporaneous writer who can be relied upon as genuin and truthful who ever does so much as mention the name of Jesus Christ? If yes, please name him.

3. Is there the slightest proof that the four gospels attributed to Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were written by them?

4. Is there any proof whatever that those four gospels were known by the early fathers, by any of the bishops, by any of the earlier churches, or by anybody else before the year 181?

5. Is there a single dogma, rite, or sacrament in the Christian creed that was not hundreds of years earlier held by the pagan religions of Asia and Egypt?

6. Is there any more proof that the legend of Jesus—his divine parentage, his miracles, his teachings, his death on a tree—is any more authentic or trustworthy than the story of Christna in India, or the sun-myth legend of William Tell and the apple shooting from Aryan folk-lore?

If our friend will reply to these inquiries the same shall appear in these columns.

Book Notices.

THE SABBATH. By M. Farrington, of Denver, Iowa.

This is a series of twenty well-written articles, which were originally published in the Bremer county, Iowa, Independent. A thorough examination is made of the Sunday question by a full investigation of both Old Testament and New Testament authorities, and he finds no requirement at all in the latter that any particular day should be kept more holy than others. He finds there is no Christian authority for keeping any day as the Sabbath. Price only 10 cents. Sold at this office.

WAS JESUS DIVINE? By M. B. Craven. Barclay & Co., Philadelphia.

The author is clear, pointed, and concise in his various publications, and this pamphlet of thirty-two pages is no exception to the rule. The manner in which the subject is treated is able, and the conclusions arrived at, to Liberal views, entirely correct. Price 10 cents. Sold at this office.

METHODS OF ANALYSIS VERSUS DOGMA; or, The Data of Time versus The Speculations of Super-nature. By W. M. Lockwood, Ripon, Wis.

This is a pamphlet of some fifty large pages, in which the realities of nature are ably contrasted with the sophisms and fallacies of super-nature. The author says: "We affirm there is no analogy in nature for super-nature, and he who predicts a hypothesis for this unthinkable realm upon any fact or truth of time not only begs the whole question but perjures his own reason and would proselyte civilized methods with falsehood. There can be no mistaking the issues involved in a belief between nature and super-nature. Upon the former are established all human research, discovery, data, and truth known in civilization; out of the latter hav evolved wrangling, contention, violence, bloodshed, and the groans of wasted life." Price 25 cents.

CHARLES BRIGHT lectured in this city Sunday night. He will accept a few more engagements before departing for Australia.

FRIEND GEO. E. HARTLEY, of Turner's Falls, Mass., made us a call last week. He is now engaged in the manufacture of an arrangement for guiding and stopping sleds, which is an excellent thing, and one we confidently expect will make a fortune.

Organize, Organize!

Liberal men and women in the four counties of Dubuque, Delaware, Jones, and Jackson, in Iowa, let us unite in one solid body of soldiers of liberty, the better to fight the battle of mental freedom. Will not each one of you write me on the subject, and by that means open the way for united work? We work at a disadvantage, by going at it single-handed. Our forces are too much scattered, as it were. If we would do our best for the cause and principles which we advocate, we must work together. In the four counties named we are sufficiently numerous to form a very strong organization. Even our numbers, if fully counted, would giv us a power that we do not now enjoy. Then, friends, let us pound the superstition out of the masses with the club of mental liberty, wielded by the strong arm of organism.

I would like to hear from every Liberal in the four counties named. Yours "for three years, or during the war,"

Farley, Iowa, Sept. 10, 282. H. GILMORE.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sent three months new subscribers for 50 cents.

A Reply to Agnostic.

In a certain sense "Agnostic" is hardly worth replying to—he writes in so petty and narrow a spirit, as if he had reached the finality and knew the whole universe by heart. He seems entirely satisfied with his ignorance and is put out because others are not as well satisfied as he. He has reached the goal. Having knocked down all that is in his own particular way, he comfortably seats himself on the ruins and smokes the pipe of peace, and don't care a whiff what becomes of the rest of humanity. His shins are now safe, and he don't want any more trouble. Like the orthodox themselvs, he wishes to take a quiet nap. In another sense, however, I think it best to reply, for in so doing I can show what to my mind is the genuin purpose of Liberalism—a purpose to which "Agnostic," fluttering in the gray twilight of "Free Religion," is as blind as a bat.

In the first place the work of destruction must go on more relentlessly and radically than ever before. The old authority is by no means dead. The air is saturated with it. It is in our politics and social morality. In every way it deadens our progress. It is entrenched in institutions, and only by the most persistent efforts can it be dislodged. To let orthodoxy alone at the present stage of the world's progress would be sheer madness. There must be a thorough cleaning out of the ancient ideas. He who helps to do this is a benefactor, and is worthy of our heartiest support. If this is all one does, he is still a noble reformer. He is not fighting the air, but a tremendous and direful reality. The iconoclastic work of Chainey is immeasureable in its value. Every Liberal who believes in the new should aid him unflinchingly. Every stroke that he strikes is needed and helpful. He is simply making room for the better things to come. He who does not welcome the iconoclast to-day is at heart the ally of the dungeon and stake of the supernaturalist.

But what I want to point out more especially is this, that Chainey, although he seems to be altogether iconoclastic, is animated by a profoundly constructiv spirit. "Agnostic" is so agnostic that he does not perceive this. I presume it is a constitutional difficulty. No doubt he was born blind—not for nine days only, but for his whole lifetime.

His blindness is seen in the fact that he puts Underwood forward as a specimen of the constructiv school of thinkers. Now Underwood is anything but constructiv. He may want to be, but he can't be. In endeavoring to be constructiv he is simply conservativ. He is at a stand-still, and thinks that because other people are going right by him therefore they are going to the devil. Underwood is a born critic. Like Iago, he is nothing unless critical. He can only demolish. He is a first-class debater, I grant; but the mere debater is not an orator and therefore not a builder. Underwood has done a good thing in his day. He has been a successful skirmisher. He has hit off the enemy with some sharp shots. He has been a fighter, that is all. As to what is required after the theological fort is taken he has no comprehension. His shortsightedness is seen in the fact that he does not consider the question of liberty, as presented so brilliantly and powerfully by Tucker, worthy of discussion—a question which touches the most vital issues of the world's progress, and which every living and forward thinker must grasp and settle with the most searching analysis. Yet Underwood sees no importance in it. Nothing could so fully show that as far as the Liberal movement is concerned, he is laid forever on the shelf. Like his books, he has become stereotyped matter. His books are useful still. They are valuable criticisms. They are on the whole a very illustrious monument to their dead author. He has no more to say—they do hav something to say worthy of attention. Underwood, as I hav said, is only a critic. He has not the soul of a poet or artist. He has no deep insight. He is not even profoundly philosophical. This is demonstrated by his late criticism of Abbot, in which he utterly misapprehends the point that Abbot makes, and misses its immense importance. He cannot even understand Abbot, much less can he understand the Liberal movement and the work that Chainey is doing. Underwood does not appreciate Chainey for the same season that a formal critic cannot appreciate an original poet. Chainey is beyond the ken of Underwood. The building that is being built is invisible to his eyes.

The fact is that, though outwardly destructiv, inwardly, Chainey is most thoroughly constructiv. He aims for structure and not for ruins. He has a splendid ideal before him. He is full of the spirit of art. To be an artist in the grand sense of that term is his sublime ambition. All his discourses breathe of the magnificence of this new life of man; they are surcharged with its poetic fervor.

"Agnostic" can't see this. He is a dried-up scientist. He thinks that knowledge is all—that we are simply to know. He does not seem to realize that knowledge must flow to action; that action is the supreme thing. Knowledge is the means, but to do something is the end of all—the glowing fruit of knowledge. Science is not highest, but art. It is not science but art that transforms the world. Chainey looks beyond science to art—the application of truth, so that life shall become gloriously good and beautiful. "Agnostic" is so wedded to his ignorance that he does not see this. He wants science from Sunday to Sunday; that is, the mere skeleton of human progress, not the living flesh and blood; that is, truth applied to life.

"Agnostic" is satisfied simply to know. Chainey wants something done. His cry is, "Know and do." It makes me indignant to see "dry-as-dust" Liberals like "Agnostic" and his fry criticise a worker like Chainey, who is constantly building, but building so fine and deep that they can't discover it. They are as stupid as the orthodox themselvs. The fact of it is that the Liberalism of the Index, Underwood, "Agnostic," and that class is the Liberalism of a sophomore—of a dilettante. It has no sympathy with the vast and wonderful changes now going on in human thought and society. It hugs orthodoxy. It dwells under the shadow of the old. Its tongue is loose, but its hands and feet are bound. It is nothing but a voice. The Index has reached its limit. I honor it for its past, to a certain extent, but I despise it altogether for its future. It has no future. Hereafter it will be only an echo and a wail. It is the worst foe of a true and advanced Liberalism. It is already beginning to feel the dead-rot of insincerity. It meets no living issue. It lingers like a ghost over the grave of its bygone achievements.

"Agnostic" has no conception of Liberalism and of the wondrous future that lies before it. He sees not the work that is to be done—the poetry and art that is to be created. He is a self-satisfied bigot. The new light is too much for him; it has put out his eyes altogether.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Apocryphal Evidences of Christianity.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Rev. Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, preached a sermon on Sept. 3d, in which he is reported as saying:

A picture on the wall of a city recently exposed by the archeologist evidences the contempt in which Christ was held by many in his day. It represents a cross and a donkey nailed to it, and under it the inscription, "Jesus, the Christ whom the people worship."

This is probably a second-hand reference to a supposed caricature of Christ crucified, a fac simile of which is given in a book published in London in 1865, entitled "Gnostics and their Remains" We transcribe therefrom the following passage:

By this, too, we are enabled rightly to understand a rude drawing lately discovered on the wall of a vault of the Palatine (the cell of a slave, one of Cæsar's household), which represents this jackal figure nailed to the cross, with the inscription Alexamenos cebete theon [Alexamenos worships God], in reality the work of some pious Gnostic, but which is usually looked upon as a heathen blasphemy, because the jackal's head is taken for that of an ass.

The original picture is preserved in an Italian museum. A man with a jackal's head is extended on a cross, beside which stands Alexamenos with upraised hands.

But the idea of an ass's head in derision of Christianity first appears about A. D. 200, or later, when Tertullian wrote this passage:

But lately a new edition of our God has been given to the world in that great city [Rome]. It originated with a certain vile man who was wont to hire himself out to cheat the wild beasts, and who exhibited a picture with this inscription: "The God of the Christians, born of an ass. He had the ears of an ass, was hoofed in one foot, carried a book [Bible], and wore a toga. Both the name and the figure gave us amusement. But our opponents ought straightway to hav done homage to this bi-formed divinity, for they hav acknowledged gods dog-headed and lion-headed, with horn of buck and ram, with goat-like loins, with serpent legs, with wings sprouting from back or foot."

In the same sermon Dr. Talmage adduces an alleged discovery of a copper-plated table on which is inscribed the following:

In the year 17 of the empire of Tiberius, and the 24th of March, I, Pontius Pilate, governor of Praetory, condemn Jesus of Nazareth to die on the cross between two thieves, Quintus Cornelius to lead him to the place of execution.

This death-warrant is said to be signed by:

1. Daniel Robani, Pharisee; 2. Johannes Robani; 3. Raphael; 4. Capet, a citizen.

Various versions of this pretended discovery hav lately appeared. In every new one the dates and names differ. One account dates the discovery in 1810; another in 1820; a third in 1280, and now Dr. Talmage, if correctly reported, has it in 1200. One version has the death-sentence March 27th; another March 25th, and another March 24th, which last is Dr. Talmage's date. The plate is said to be now in the chapel of Caserta, six miles southeast of Capua, in Italy, and a fac simile is said to hav been bought by one Lord Howard for 2,980 francs.

If any such plate exists, or is alleged to hav existed, it is as big a fraud as the pretended plates of the book of Mormon. Presuming that March 27th is a clerical or typographical error, and that March 24th is the true date of the pretended relic (for in two of the versions it is March 24th), a sufficient exposure of the fraud is the fact that the Passover feast day, on which Jesus is said to hav been crucified, never occurs before March 26th (Chamb. Enc.).

Furthermore, the seventeenth year of Tiberius Cæsar was A. D. 31. But the latest authorities are compelled to abandon all other dates for the crucifixion but A. D. 29, which agrees not only with ancient authorities, but with recently discovered Syriac documents of a very early period. Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian positivly affirm that Jesus suffered in the fifteenth year of Tiberius, i. e., A. D. 29.

The credulity of Dr. Talmage is further shown in quoting from the apocryphal Report of Pilate to Tiberius Cæsar these words, "In all the world they lighted candles from noon until evening." Why didn't the doctor quote the preceding sentence of the report, which says that Archelaus (who had been dead some twenty years) was one of those who delivered up Jesus to be crucified? And how about Pilate's subsequent account of the full moon being like blood, and not shining at all, while the sun shone forth more brilliant than ever before, and ceased not all the following night? See "Apocryphal Gospels, Acts, and Revelations," Antenicene Christian library, vol. xvi, for different versions of this and other apocryphal literature. It is all as true as "Gulliver's Travels," and as entertaining as Talmage's sermons. In the days of the church militant babes in Christ grew fat on the milk of the apocryphal word, but it is apt to curdle on their stomachs now.

All attempts to prove a Christ crucified under Pontius Pilate are vain. Every scrap of testimony is a Christian forgery. The fact is, there never was any Christ crucified at all, but there was a Jesus stoned and hanged on a tree for sorcery by the Jews about a hundred years before the time of Pontius Pilate. The Talmud frequently refers to that Jesus, but never to the Jesus of the gospels, who is as much a myth as Robinson Crusoe.

Paul was doubtless a disciple of the Jesus who was stoned and hanged about 75 B. C. Paul flourished before the year 63 B. C., when Aretas, king of Arabia Petrea, held and governed Damascus (2 Cor. xi, 32). From the time that Pompey conquered Syria, 63 B. C., Damascus had an uninterrupted succession of Roman questors, propraetors, proconsuls, or legates for at least a hundred years (see Syria, in Smith's Bible Dictionary). Nor was it possible for any petty king of Arabia Petrea during all that time to march an army two hundred and fifty miles and take the strong city of Damascus out of the hands of the Romans.

Christianity, like all other religious systems, is founded in ignorance and imposture.

ANTICHRIST.

The Logic of Theism and Death.

From the Rochelle Register.

"Until Mr. Wettstein establishes his premises his arguments will scarcely convince."

In reply to your correspondent, "B. F. P.," in the last Register, I will endeavor, as briefly as possible, to comply with his demand and establish my premises, but request that, in reply, he will establish the premises of his belief as well, and this request I make the more freely because, in the discussion, he assumes, affirms, thus placing the burden of proof entirely upon himself. I simply deny, and, in so doing, "hav the argument," unless, indeed, he establishes his premises and thus proves the affirmativ.

Then, on the other hand, I affirm, and the premises for my belief I readily establish beyond doubt. But I admit that in this matter I shall be forced to appear very selfish, verging on avariciousness, as after I shall hav completed the massiv foundations for my premises, and then erected the lofty structure of my creed, there will, alas! be naught remaining but endless vacuum for my friend to build his faith upon.

To begin with, I take the great all of nature, filling endless space, which is not God. I take an absolute, infinit, eternal, self-existing universe for the grand basis of my faith. Every atom of matter, every known force, every chemical element and physical attribute; all that is, exists, and moves in the vast realms of space; all things specially and the great all of nature in its immense aggregate, all are at my service to erect the grand temple in which alone I worship.

And this comprises all we can see, feel, hear, comprehend, understand, conceive, imagin, reason, or think about; all we can discover by the aid of our microscopes and telescopes; all we can analyze in our laboratories; in short, all elements, things, powers, forces, potencies, functions, attributes, and phenomena, all these prove and absolutely establish beyond dispute the premises of the naturalist and Materialist; all outside of all these things, all outside of all—nothing—this alone is the "material," subject to the services of the Theist, to build his faith upon.

Imagin the sum total of all existence to be represented by 1,000,000. This million is not God. Now subtract 1,000,000 from the original sum and the remainder—0—this alone is God. The original million, it is conceded, is not God—this is nature; but the 0 is absolutely the only equivalent to a god; and if the combined wisdom of the church proceed to bring proof they cannot increase this 0 to a solitary unit.

But my premises require no proof. The universe existing to-day; this self-evident fact is absolute proof that at no time in the past could it possibly hav not existed. The contrary implies a beginning, and a beginning implies an eternity of time previous to this beginning, when all was forever dark, empty vacuum, nothing. But if six thousand or six millions of years ago all had been nothing, possessing no qualities, attributes, or potencies whatever to become the factor of something, of everything, and having, during the vast eternity of beginningless time preceding any supposed beginning, produced nothing, this nothing could not possibly ever produce something, and then of course nothing would exist to-day.

Therefore Materialism requires no proof; it alone is absolute, supreme, and established in the minds of all who hav given the subject abundant thought and a fearless investigation. It alone is all the church claims for God, only, contrary to God, it proves itself. Existence, consciousness, knowledge, science, the five senses, and common sense, all demonstrate and prove it.

And it is not incumbent on me or reasonable to demand that I should "prove the non-existence of a God or hold my tongue." A simple denial is all-sufficient to do that, unless, indeed, God is proven first. A. says he saw an actual live mermaid in Lake Michigan, and his brother Gullible insists that he actually came in contact with a real dragon the other day. We simply deny these assertions, and it proves their non-existence unless A. and his brother demonstrate to the world their actual existence. The affirmativ must ever be established. A person is arraigned in court, he pleads "not guilty," and this establishes his innocence until his guilt is proven.

So the burden of proof falls upon the Theist, who claims that in addition to this grand infinit universe there exists somewhere, outside or inside of this universe, or here and there and everywhere, another infinit something, force, spirit, power, person (about the exact nature of which being, however, no two agree), which is anterior and superior to all nature; but, alas! of which being we or science or the church cannot possibly form the slightest conception or obtain a shadow of proof! And it is insisted we must accept this imaginary being as the true premis of our faith in spite of the fact that it or he (why not a she?) is absolutely beyond our comprehension, and that by the light of latest scientific developments it is established that all things, effects, and phenomena are positivly the inevitable necessary result of preceding natural causes, all again in turn necessary effects of the spontaneous action and attributes of matter and force and its manifold variations, and not, never, the handiwork of a personal God.

And therefore we must conclude that if there is a God he is absolutely superfluous in the grand economy of nature, all forces and phenomena acting and appearing entirely without such divine assistance or personal caprice, and, furthermore, entirely without any evidences of design or wisdom.

But our friend seems to be sadly shocked at such doctrins, because he sees in their tendencies the agencies to blast his fondest hopes and most cherished aspirations, and not aware that these feelings properly defined are nothing less than cowardice and unworthy to be entertained by a brave and fearless man. Truth is desirable no matter where it leads. And if an old Calvinian hell of fire and brimstone and a special host of ten thousand devils to punch up the blazes for the benefit of all Infidels were a fact, the writer would strive and rejoice to obtain such proof.

"Hew to the line, let the chips fall where they will."

But fortunately truth leads not to eternal torment, neither to imaginary or fictitious joys, but to that greatest boon of nature which, if we only knew it, alone makes life tolerable—eternal rest! And this inevitable condition of man after death is no more to be dreaded than the condition of man previous to birth. Both are identical, equally free from pain and grief; and when all phases of this belief are properly analyzed and thoroughly understood, our final fate—eternal sleep—will be received by all the world with feelings of greatest delight and unmingled happiness.

The trouble now is, we are unable to fully comprehend a condition of absolute individual annihilation, and imagin that, when dead, we will still be partially conscious of our non-existence, separation from our loved ones, and our obnoxious condition of dissolution in the grave.

Therefore the dread and the desire to liv forever, even though the terrible alternativ must stare every believer in the face that the chances are small, and that, according to the "book," a vast majority are ever rushing o'er that "broad road" to eternal damnation!

But, I insist upon it, that when the world shall finally throw off ancient superstition and discard transmitted notions, and become truly wise and philosophical, they will find in the very event they now most dread—death—the source of their greatest joy and consolation through life.

A hundred years hence the 150,000,000 people now living will be no more; 200,000,000 or more will exist then who are absolutely non-existent, unconscious, and virtually dead and annihilated now. Who now mourns for this vast throng of our children's children not yet born, and who are non-existent now? Who pities their "dreadful fate," and who looks upon it as a terrible calamity that these millions should and do not now participate in all the joys and pleasures of all the multitudes living before them? Did you ever think of that, Bro. "B. F. P.?" No; it has never occurred to you! Why? Simply because non-existence is not a state to be dreaded or feared, but, on the other hand, the greatest and kindest gift bestowed upon man!

Then, if it must be conceded that the non-existence, now and in the past, of our successors in life is not a calamity, it must likewise be granted that our non-existence, when they shall exist, cannot possibly be a calamity. We miss them not, we mourn for them not, and both conditions are equally void of sensations or emotions, and consequently cannot possibly be a reasonable or legitimate source of fear.

See the infant slumber sweetly in its cradle. Tranquil and beautiful! Would you rudely awaken your darling from its glorious sleep of unconsciousness? Yet this is death; momentary death for the time being; nothing more, nothing less. We also long daily for the hours of this precious boon, and we accept joyfully from Mother Nature these delicious moments of absolute repose—unconsciousness—death! Then, supposing this night, after having fallen into a tranquil sleep, and, previously unknown to us, our hearts would cease to beat, and we should never awaken from this identical, unchanging, peaceful condition of total unconsciousness, would, could it possibly be a calamity to us, who, with the last throb of our hearts, are absolutely incapable of another thought or sensation?

Impossible! We hav simply returned to that eternal condition we were in during the long eternity previous to our birth. We hav lived and feasted (some more, some less; this is an inexorable law of nature); the festiv board is removed, and we must be content to retire and permit others to participate in the joys and vicissitudes of life. We shall miss the pleasures of life no more, but neither shall we be burdened any more with pain and cares and sorrows and grief.

And if investigation and truth lead to this doctrin, let us rejoice that death has now indeed lost its sting, and that the terrible doctrin of an eternal, continuous (impossible) condition of happiness for a select few, and eternal sufferings of a vast majority of frail humanity, which is the most monstrous doctrin ever conceived by brutal man and cunning priests, is fast disappearing from the face of our beautiful earth, and that the day of deliverance is near! And also that this "hangman's whip to keep the wretch in order," and the few sugarplums dealt out so stingingly by the church, hav ever been the cause of keeping mankind, now and in the past, in large proportion superstitious, vile, ignorant, and miserable, overlooking entirely the far grander code of morals which teaches us to do good without hope of reward, and avoid evil without fear of punishment, as this alone constitutes true manhood. And this grand natural law, independent of all religion, will eventually revolutionize the world and make it truly better!

OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Rev. George O. Barnes, the Evangelist, and W. H. Lamaster, the Infidel.

From the Indianapolis Sentinel.

Extremes meet occasionally, and such a conjunction occurred when the Evangelist Barnes admitted the Infidel Lamaster into heaven and asserted if the Infidel were not saved the evangelist would be willing to be damned. It seems that the Infidel Lamaster was at one time in his life a Christian, who now, according to the teachings of Mr. Barnes, is "going through an awful stage of spiritual lunacy." Lunacy is "mental derangement—madness in general," and such is Lamaster's affliction, as Mr. Barnes views his case. According to Mr. Lamaster's conclusion Mr. Barnes is the lunatic, and he, Lamaster, the man whose mind is sound, whose reasoning faculties are free from disease, whose perceptions are clear, and whose conclusions are based upon reason. Mr. Lamaster, in his youth, was a Christian—believed in God and in his son, Jesus Christ. As he advanced in years, as his head enlarged, giving ample space for his great brain to exercise its powers, Mr. Lamaster massed his intellectual energies and concentrated them upon the Bible. He says in his Iconoclast: "We once believed as strong as he (Barnes) or any other Christian in the Christian religion. We accepted Christ as our Savior, believed that he was indeed the son of God, and that he was commissioned by God to come to earth to save sinners. We once had no doubts regarding all those doctrins, but after years of reading and study of the Bible our mind has undergone a very radical religious change. We began to reason, and soon our belief began to fade away. Skepticism began to take the place of faith, and at last, instead of remaining a Christian, we found ourselvs an Infidel."

Now Mr. Lamaster denounces God and his son, Jesus Christ, the world's redeemer, and avails himself of every opportunity afforded him to flaunt his unbelief in the face of the world; indeed, he creates opportunities to bring to the attention of society the remembrance of the Bible declaration that "the fool hath said in his heart there is no God." Some days since Mr. Lamaster addressed the Evangelist Barnes a communication, in which he said: "I am an Infidel. I abhor the God of the Bible, reject Jesus Christ as a savior, and look upon faith, religion, and the church as huge impositions," and this is the man whom Mr. Barnes believes is "passing through an awful stage of spiritual lunacy," but who will be saved finally with an everlasting salvation, and who asserts, if such is not the case, he (the Evangelist Barnes) is willing to be damned.

It will occur to many readers of the Sunday Sentinel that the Evangelist Barnes and the Infidel Lamaster represent the extremes of belief and disbelief—one is all faith, the other is all faithlessness. They are antipodal; diametrically opposit; as unlike as light and darkness. The Evangelist Barnes glories in the light; every window of his soul is open to heaven's sunshine. If there is ever a cloud in the sky of his faith it is made radiant with bows of love and joy. Lamaster gets away from the light; prefers a cave, a dungeon; ranks himself with the beasts that perish; is willing to die and rot without resurrection or immortality, and still the Evangelist Barnes will hav it that the Infidel Lamaster is finally to inherit heaven and bask and bathe in supernal felicities. How grandly extremes meet! How harmoniously they blend! God be praised for a faith that takes all the "poor wanderers of a stormy day" at last into a haven of rest! It is no part of the business of the Sunday Sentinel to add to religious infelicities, to magnify doubts, or intensify errors. If the Evangelist Barnes can get the Infidel Lamaster into heaven at last the Sunday Sentinel will not object. Let mercy and forgivness hav full sway. The voice of joy is better than the wailings of despair. Heaven's hallelujahs are preferred to the howlings of hades. If to confess Christ is to receive an eternity of bliss after life's fitful fever is past, all hail! The Sunday Sentinel sends greetings of gladness to its fifty thousand readers. If Infidelity is a disease we rejoice to know there is balm in Gilead and a great physician who can heal the infirmity. We recall as we write the unfortunate man in the land of the Gadarenes. A legion of devils had possession of him. He loved to be in the neighborhood of tombs. He made day and night hideous. He was cursed. The devils were forced out of him and permitted to enter into a herd of swine. Right! Let the hogs hav all the devils and let men be clothed in their right minds and work together to bless the world. We like men who represent calm devotion, on whose brows the peace of heaven is forever brooding, and whose eyes are ever lifted to celestial glories; men who, having drank deeply at the fountains of love and forgivness, see at last the emancipation of the world from sin, and, in the grandeur of their conceptions of an "unsearchable God"—the God of the "old family Bible"—takes us all at last, evangelists and Infidels, all poor storm-tossed mariners, into the port of peace.

It is encouraging that evangelists and editors of leading journals are willing to do the fair thing by an Infidel—one who wholly disbelieves the claims of current theology. The Rev. Barnes is specially magnanimous to be willing that the editor of an Infidel paper should finally hav a seat in heaven, to wear a crown, and play a harp with himself. This is a great advance from the position heretofore held by the leaders of the Christian church, who hav not only consigned unbelievers to the fiery lake through the endless ages of eternity, but hav sought to make this life as unhappy for them as possible. When clergymen and evangelists can find it in their hearts to say a kindly word for an opponent, it looks somewhat as though Christianity is gaining in decency and liberality. But, unfortunately, while there is one Barnes there are many Cooks, Talmages, Fultons, Moodys, Crosbys, Newmans, and the thousands of others so fond of dealing hell and damnation to those who cannot accept all their demands. The editor of the Sentinel is also deserving of praise for the equal consideration he givs those whom he conceives to be at such opposit extremes. Let it be hoped that the thought of the world is becoming more fair and Liberal.

Book Notices.

"This bright world laboring in the eclips
Of priestcraft and of slavery."

The "Crimes of Preachers," second edition, is out, enlarged and revised, and containing so many new cases of criminality of these "mouth-pieces of Yahweh" that even the most prejudiced of pietists must acknowledge them to be the very worst instead of the best class of society.

The extra education and careful surroundings that should make them refined, cultured, and just are more than counterbalanced by the want of activ labor and real industry, as well as the habit people hav of worshiping these reverends as next to deity himself.

While we deplore the necessity of stirring all these cesspools of iniquity, we must own that it is absolutely necessary that the world should know the evils of a system of theology that breeds the majority of criminals in its own pulpits.

This last book of Mr. Billings contains a new list of 202 criminal preachers, all collected in one year, and from the northern half of the United States and Canada, and these 202 priests are charged with an aggregate of 500 crimes—more than one for every day of the year! And probably not more than one sin in twenty comes to light, for murder don't always out, nor anywhere near it.

It is the duty of all Liberals to help circulate such books as this, and I shall do my level best to scatter all I can of them. If we succeed in showing up these priests as they are we shall destroy their influence, and the go-betweens once out of the way we shall discover that the gods they pretend to communicate with are as surely myths as were all the gods of Greece and Rome.

It is the slowest of all works to destroy ancient superstitions; but remember every step is so much gained. One book well read will do a "power of work," especially if sent off into a back country place where the Bible, almanac, and county paper constitute far too often the whole library. We hav only one life to liv. Let us fill it full of good well done. Let us teach all of truth we can, and sow seeds of purity, goodness, and honesty. Only 25 cents will secure this record of the detestable doings of priests and preachers.

"Too long hav lordly priests
And priestly lords led us, with all our pride
Withering about us, like devoted beasts,
Dragged to the shrine, with faded garments tied."

ELMINA.

"The First Epistle of Bennett the Apostle to the Truth Seekers" is a nice little pamphlet, and full to the brim of good, sound, first-rate advice. Better than any creed or system of theology ever yet gotten up is the code of morals advocated in this volume. Yes, better, because there are no passages one has to twist, and turn, and jump over, lest one go astray by heeding them, as in the apostolic writings of the God-book and guide-book of the Christians of the land. Just this one paragraph is enough to make the follower of its suggestions wise, good, and generous:

"Let justice and right be the standard by which you govern your actions, and never forget that the grandest thing a man can perform is to do what is right under all circumstances."

Not satisfied with giving us a fine code of morals garnered up by a lifetime of experience, Mr. Bennett has in this little book given us many "re-echoes from the teachers of olden times." If anyone can rise from the perusal of even a single page of this epistle and not feel a resolve toward renewed righteousness, the hereditary instincts of that individual must be of the worst possible character.

I hope every Liberal will adopt this epistle as the "code of Infidel morals," and when friends ask us of our reconstructiv aims hand them this epistle of Bennett, the thinker and worker. Tell them here are rules for the guidance of all. Rules written on the very borders of the Holy Land, by one who has traveled in all lands, and carefully judged of methods and modes among many nations.

The Tama Meeting.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Tama Meeting was a complete success. We had fine weather (save Sunday forenoon), good speeches, good crowds, and good feeling. Our expenses were met on the spot to within $30. Dr. Severance, Mrs. H. S. Lake, W. F. Peck, M. Farrington, Col. M. E. Billings, Col. and Mrs. N. P. Fox, S. D. Moore, and the secretary, were the speakers. Besides these, many others spoke in the conference hour, which session was always a very lively and instructiv one. We had an abundance of good music, furnished by Prof. Peck, Mr. and Mrs. Caywood and daughter, of Albion, Iowa, and Mrs. Viva Alexander, of Carroll City.

Live issues were discussed fearlessly, especially by Mrs. Lake and Dr. Severance. The best of harmony prevailed—the harmony that is born of a free platform. Spiritualists and Materialists fraternized most grandly, and the influence for good left in Tama and vicinity will not soon depart. Our audiences reached as high as eleven hundred, and were large at all sessions.

And now credit where credit is due. Our Tama friends attended to the local expenses, and so are that much ahead of Marshalltown and Cedar Rapids, where the previous conventions hav been held. I am under especial obligations to Mr. Matt. Baker and Mr. S. D. Dye, of the Local Committee. But for their assistance the Convention and Camp-Meeting would hav fallen far short of the complete success which it was.

I hav to-day only time for this brief synopsis; will soon send fuller account.

E. C. WALKER, Sec'y.

And now I send a message to my prohibition opponents. J. H. Cook and Mrs. Everest write as friends and as Liberals, recognizing the fact that a man may oppose the legislation they favor and yet be a friend of temperance. But "Liberta" and J. A. Hallock cannot conceal their churchly parentage and education. With the priests of the dying faith, whose creed is the mother of prohibition, they imagin that abuse is argument, the aspersions upon the character or motivs of an opponent are a refutation of his statements, an exposure of his inaccuracies, and a demonstrating of his faulty logic. Being prohibitionists, it is next to impossible for them to treat fairly those who fight beneath the banner of individualism. So mote it be. I shall attend to these gentlemen next week, and before I am through with them they will most heartily wish that they had not grappled with a subject altogether too large for the caliber of their old-fashioned ordnance.

E. C. WALKER.

Letters from Friends.

GLOVERSVILLE, N. Y., Sept. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find check for $10 to pay my this year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $6.50 for "Around the World," in four volumes. I want them bound in sheep, library style. And I also want "The Truth Seeker Collection."

W. N. TRUMBLE.

BOSTON, MASS., Sept. 3, 1882.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Pardon my carelessness in not sending my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER before now, for I had everlooked it, not discovering that it was due three or four months ago, so please find $10 inclosed, $3 for the paper and the rest for your books of travel. Allow me to congratulate you on your safe return to your friends and home.

Yours for the truth, L. I. PUTNAM.

CARBONDALE, KAN., Aug. 29, 1882.

BROTHER BENNETT: Please count me as a life-subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I herewith send post-office order for $5. Please pardon my neglect, and accept my promis to do better in future. All my spare time from business for the last year has been spent in reading those splendid letters of the round-the-world traveler. Sorry I hav allowed myself to get in arrears. Hoping you may liv long to edit THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am, Yours truly,

WM. BROWN.

NEW YORK, Sept. 9, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I would heartily second the proposed resolutions in your late issue in reference to annual meetings of the Liberals at Paine's monument, and would suggest that the Fourth Liberal League, of which you are president, take the initiativ in the matter. This would be a fitting sequence to its course in reference to the repairing and re-dedication of the monument previous to your journey around the world. Let it be considered a fixed fact.

Yours truly, A. C. M.

WAVERLY, IOWA, Sept. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The annual meeting of the Liberal League of Northern Iowa was held the fourth Sunday in August at M. Farrington's schoolhouse. After the opening exercises were concluded the League proceeded to the election of officers for the ensuing year. They are as follows: M. Farrington, President; D. P. Walling, Vice-President; Mrs. Eli Barns, Treasurer; W. P. McCormack, Secretary. Delegates to the State Convention and an Executiv Committee were also chosen. Respectfully,

W. P. MCCORMACK, Sec'y.

BLOOMINGDALE, N. J., Sept. 11, 1882

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is just the paper I wanted. It was by accident I learned of its existence. My friends will not let me keep one in the house; they carry them off to read and pass them from one to another. Please send a three months trial copy to Mr. Henry Bigler, Butler, N. J.; also the "Real Blasphemers," J. R. Kelso, to my address.

Find inclosed the sum of $1 for the same.

CHAS. KRAHMER.

P. S.—I expect some more subscribers in a few weeks.

PORTLAND, Sept. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I rejoice that you hav been able to circumnavigate this green old earth and return to your many friends again. Long may you liv to spread truth and justice from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and to all the inhabitants of the islands of the sea.

Brother Bennett, you hav not one thing to fear, for every true man and woman that walks the earth is your friend, and is ready to gird on the whole armor and enter the wide field of combat, and fight for truth until the seventy thousand lazy ministers are driven from the coward's castle, and made to earn an honest living. The conquest is ours, and our army is on the advance. Looking and contending for the right, I remain your true friend,

H. A. LAMB, M.D.

PINE GROVE, PA., Sept. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I take the liberty and pleasure to inform you of the fact that Pine Grove, Schuylkill county, Pa., has a young Thomas Paine. Mr. Alfred Paine, a well-doing merchant, with an amiable, industrious little wife, of this place, had the good and noble principle (by a kind and encouraging word from a Liberal and Thomas-Paine loving friend) to call their first-born son "Thomas." This act, however, raised quite a breeze among the three old women and the preachers in the town. One old lady visited the house of the young "Thomas," asking the mother of the child to recall that name if possible, having, said she, in substance, no objection to Thomas, but that horrible Paine should be removed. In a congratulating conversation with the mother, Mrs. Paine (admiring, as I did, little Thomas), she told me that a certain preacher said to her that he could never baptize that child by that name. I hav the pleasure of seeing the about-three-years-old Thomas Paine daily, a very bright, lively child, strong and healthy. I met him this morning on the street. Said I, "Good morning, Thomas; are you well this morning?" His reply was, "Ah, ha!" vigorously tossing a big green apple in his play basket, showing considerable independence and attention to his own business. I love and admire that child over all others in town, for its name.

Your well-wishing friend, J. F. HALDEMAN.

COLCHESTER, ILL., Aug. 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find one dollar, as I see that I am somewhat in arrears on my subscription; will remit some more money to you soon. Am glad to hear of the grand reception tendered to you all along the line from the Pacific to the Atlantic. That is what should be done. Let us show the church and its saintly crew that we are a power, and that we intend to be heard from now and then. I was in hopes to hav met you somewhere on your road home, and to hav had the honor of shaking hands with the hero Infidel of our time. Wake up Underwood, Abbot, Bundy & Co. It seems they will never get through throwing dirt at you, but it is not doing you any injury; but with them it is, I think, and it is just what they deserve. Hoping that you will see proper to make a canvass of every state in the Union, and giv to the people the benefit of your travels in a series of good lectures, I remain as ever your well-wisher and a truth seeker, F. H. SHERWOOD.

KIRKSVILLE, Mo., Sept. 5, 107.

MR. EDITOR: I am not certain that my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER has expired, but if I understand the print on the wrapper correctly it has; but, however, that matters not (except, if in arrears, injustice to you), I send draft for six dollars for the continuation of the paper from the time my subscription did or may expire.

Should you make the contemplated trip over the United States, I will take a copy of the book which you may write up concerning the trip, and we should be pleased to hav you shape your course so as to call on us here.

We hav had a Liberal organization here for many years, but not an auxiliary of the National Liberal League. Our society is composed of Materialists and Spiritualists, and we meet regularly the year round. We are not so illiberal but what we can listen to views not in accordance with our own, believing that diversity of belief is only destroyed by the establishment of facts. Respectfully, WM. HART.

DUNDEE, MINN., Aug. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I see I am among the number of subscribers to the dear old TRUTH SEEKER who hav not paid up. I could not get the money when my time ran out, and hav not enough now to pay you all, but I will soon get it. We are intending to sell our farm. My husband's health is poor, and he cannot work. If we sell, I will buy your books of travel round the world. I hav read all of your letters as they came in the paper, and had many a good laugh over them, especially what you wrote about Yahweh leaving the courts above to come down into that dark cave to visit little Mary. The Catholics hav a book they claim no one can read and remain a Protestant. I do not believe an honest Christian could read your "Truth Seeker Around the World" and not change his opinions. We hav been doing what little we could to strengthen the cause of mental liberty.

Since writing the above I had the good fortune to get a five-dollar bill. Inclosed I send it to you.

LURY A. CRAPSEY.

MODESTO, CAL., Sept. 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3 with which I renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Please send me another dozen of "Deity Analyzed, and The Devil's Defense." This book sells well here, and the demand for it is increasing. "The Real Blasphemer" also sells well. The pulpit demagogs are beginning to help advertise these books by warning their congregations not to read them. These warnings help me a good deal.

For many years we hav had a Sunday law in this state, but it has never been enforced. This law is now creating considerable interest in our political circles. The Democratic party has adopted a platform in which the repeal of this law is demanded. The Republican party has adopted a platform in which the retention and the enforcement of this law are demanded. In this fight, which is growing quite hot, the Liberal Republicans are taking sides with the Democrats, and the most zealously religious Democrats are taking sides with the Republicans. Few Californians care much for party lines. They mostly vote to suit themselvs. This is particularly the case with the Liberals. Yours truly,

JOHN R. KELSO.

FRENCHTOWN, NEB., Aug. 18, 1882.

BROTHER BENNETT: Accept my kindest congratulations on your safe return to your nativ shores. How Anthony & Co. must hav torn their hair when they heard of the attention shown you wherever you went, and especially after you reached American soil again! I can imagin how they gnashed their teeth when they saw how the Inter-Oecan had to take it all back and giv you the fair history which you desired. So truth does rise again, it seems.

If our crops do well we intend to send for the celebrated four volumes, written by D. M. Bennett, entitled, "A Truth Seeker Around the World." We believe in this trinity heart and soul, and thank you for it.

My daughter, C. M. Finch, received the flower seeds in due time, and sends her thanks. The letter you wrote her while at San Francisco she will keep as a memento.

Before closing I must congratulate you on the many flattering receptions you hav had and the noble speeches that hav been made in behalf of Freethought, and whose greatest living champion and martyr the world sees in D. M. Bennett. With best wishes and regards for yourself, Mrs. Bennett, and Eugene, I am, Most truly yours,

MARY B. FINCH.

ANGOLA, IND., Sept. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad that you hav outrode the storm of abuse and lies of the church and hav got home safe and happy. And now, as the church has seen fit to drag their God and religion into our public schools here as well as elsewhere, I herewith offer an opening prayer for our schools: "Let us pray. Almighty God, once more we fall on our cowardly knees, asking thee to make one in our midst this day. And, O Lord, whilst we try to do our duty as teachers in this school, wilt thou, our father, keep these little sinners strict? And, O God, if any of these little children should in any manner offend thee, wilt thou, O God, run out some of thy old she-bears and let them tear up about forty of them in the name of Jesus? And we further pray thee, O Lord, that in case any of the big girls should escape the jaws of thy she-bears, wilt thou, O God, turn them into pillars of salt for Christ's sake? And O our dear father, wilt thou leave them standing as a salted monument to the folly and greed of our present school officers of the state? These favors we ask in the name of the murdered Jesus, and the church can hav all the glory. Amen."

Will Mr. Babcock. of St. John's, Michigan, please get us up a closing prayer for our schools?

C. H. WOODWORTH.

ADRIAN, MICH., Sept. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I look upon your paper, after having read it with increasing interest for several years, as truly Liberal, in the proper sense of the term. In its columns any of the various kinds of Liberals may hav a hearing; and, as far as I hav learned, all are treated fairly. Although others may be doing a good work in their own way, I think it must be admitted that THE TRUTH SEEKER is giving the common enemy by far more formidable blows than any of its fellows. I doubt not it was the intention to crush D. M. Bennett and destroy his paper. There are probably thousands of sincere, devout Christians indulging a secret wish that prison fare would wind up the career of this old Infidel. But how very different the sequel! Who that has been familiar with this history cannot plainly see that the trial and imprisonment of this honest man hav operated overwhelmingly against his accusers? Those that are watching closely the signs of the times can see clearly the elements of self-destruction in the great fabric of Christianity. The structure is already tottering, and when its days are fully numbered it must crumble to the earth. Jacob, the liar and deceiver, has nearly had his day; and Esau, the honest youth, whom the Hebrew God hates, must hav his. If honesty and truth are better than lying and deception, then I think the new and approacing epoch will be superior to the present.

Yours in hope, WM. F. LYON.

SOMERSET, N. Y., Sept. 1, 1882.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I do not wish to be regarded as a complainer or grumbler, but there are some things I cannot complacently endure. You agreed to furnish two volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," postage paid, for $5; then you had the audacity to ask us to take three volumes, postage paid, for $5; and now, as if not satisfied, you propose to inflict upon us still another for $1.50, you paying postage on the whole. Against all this, sir, do I beg respectfully to protest. You are asking us to take more than we bargained for, and, assuming a little too much, you are asking us to accept of your liberality at the expense of our generosity, and we can't afford thus to be outdone in the exercise of the virtues.

It seems to me that if we get three books instead of two for $5, and then get the fourth book for $1.50, we ought to pay the postage on the whole. It would be but a small thing for each of us, but a big thing for you to do—much more than was written in the bond, and, for one, I don't propose to let you do it, sir, but will pay the postage myself, and I trust you will pardon our fault-finding and accept the postage as a simple act of justice, then will I get the books at least fifty cents per volume less than first proposed, and you will receive $6.50 net for the four volumes, only $1.63 per volume, instead of $2.50 gross, or say $2.10 net. Your getting more subscribers than we anticipated is your good luck, and makes it no harder for me to pay than if there were less, and I am not a bit afraid of your getting too much. I am, sir, Most truly yours,

F. N. ALBRIGHT, M.D.

[We thank friend Albright for his kindness in sending us the amount of the postage on the books. It is true, the postage is decidedly an important item; on the four volumes it will amount to over one thousand dollars. It is not a large matter for each patron to pay his own postage; but for us to pay it all, it is a heavy tax. We are glad our friend thinks the work low in price. It certainly is. There is hardly any work in America where so much matter has been brought out for the same money. We hope this fact will be generally appreciated.—ED. T. S.]

PITTSBURGH, PA., Sept. 3, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me as one of the thousands of your friends to congratulate you upon your safe return home. We hav really to congratulate ourselvs upon your great success, as the success of the Liberal cause in general, and truth seekers in particular. Your description of your travels is worth more than all the so-called sacred writings of the Christians, and will do much toward enlightening minds darkened by falsehood and superstition. The exposition of the knowledge acquired during that trip around the world, as given in your letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER and in your books, will win more souls from Christ than the millions of Christian money expended by fanatics will make up by conversion in many years to come.

But, Mr. Bennett, the truth seeker's "harvest is ripe and the reapers are few," and we need your new and improved double-edged sickle-harvester to garner the grain from Hell's Gate to Golden Gate; we need you in Pennsylvania and in old "smoky city." Thousands will come to hear you speak where only tens will read your gospel, and thousands more will hear and afterward think and read and induce others to do the same.

Come, father Bennett, swing around the circle and see and grasp the hand of your friends and enlighten the dark places of the earth from the rich storehouse of truth and knowledge you hav acquired.

Our League here opened the ball to-day, after a two-months' summer vacation, with Mrs. Colby, of St. Louis, subject, "What is Truth?" and with her accustomed eloquence and powers of logic she left the old veil of the temple of darkness and superstition in rags and tatters. She is to be with us a month, and we expect the harvest to be great. Our League is alive and doing a good work.

Yours in the cause, J. F. CALDWELL.

CAMPBELLTON, TEXAS, August 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to congratulate you upon your safe arrival home, in spite of Comstock, Cook, Inter-Ocean, and the balance of the jealous deadheads. They remind me of so many curs barking at a train of cars as it swiftly passes on to its destination—and their cursed howls are of about as much significance. It only indicates that death to them has commenced. Now, old chief, you hav been around the world, and hav done great good for the cause, and put a star in your crown of which you may well be proud.

I propose now that the Freethinkers send you on a canvassing and lecturing tour around the United States, and, as a sign of good faith, you can just put my name down for $10 (ten dollars,) and notify me when you want the wherewith and I will remit at once. Now I mean business, and I want to see the thing carried out. The most of the Freethinkers are too far off to come to see you, and I want that you go to see them; and I would like very much that you take Bob Ingersoll along as companion, and if you giv out he can probably help you with a few remarks. My gods are Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll—the trinity—and I expect to go to them when I die.

Freethought is a-booming now, and now is the time to hit. We want a few lively men out in the field. Now, brother Freethinkers, come, chip in. I ain't got much, but I am good for a ten, and more if necessary. Let's hear from you. With our chief in the field, scattering the light of Liberalism, I think we can confidently count on having a funeral, and on the tombstone of Christianity will be written, "Here lies the remains of Christianity. Gone to the arms of its sweet Jesus."

Sincerely yours, H. BUNDY.

RENO, NEV., Sept. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Knowing that many of your patrons would like to know something about their favorit, viz., Dr. J. L. York, I now proceed to giv them an account of his rest and work while in our little town of Reno. Having learned of his illness, contracted while living in the miasmatic city of Sacramento during his service in the legislature, Mr. John Sunderland invited the great champion of human rights and mental liberty to come to Reno to recruit, if possible, in this healthy locality, and regain his former strength and endurance. He arrived here July 18th, and gave his first lecture August 20th. September 3d he closed his series of six lectures to good audiences in the largest theater in the town. His success in this benighted city will soon be apparent by inaugurating the Reno Liberal Union, which is being formed at the present time. Soon he will take his departure for his home in San Jose, with another call to return and giv us a few more of his highly entertaining Freethought lectures in December next.

Three of our daily papers hav given him gratifying mention. The Nevada State Journal has the following remarks upon one of his lectures: "The lecture at the theater last Saturday night was well attended, and was listented to from the beginning to the close with the closest attention. The speaker said, after alluding to the advertised topic for the evening 'Common Sense:' 'As the average good judgment which men and women attain to, relating to the various pursuits and business of this life, and for the purpose of his lecture, he desired to apply the same common sense as an instrument in reaching truth relating to inspiration in a natural sense, as opposed to the long-cherished notion held by the religious world that in the far off past God inspired to write books containing complete truth relating to the salvation of mankind.'

"'From what we may know of the divine activities there is a connection between deity and the soul of man—not in a supernatural but in a natural sense—as there is between light and the eye, sound and the ear, food and the palate, truth and the intellect, beauty and the imagination. So, as we obey the laws of the body, we hav health; so, as we obey the law of the mind, we get wisdom and skill for the mind; so, also, as we obey the law of the moral faculties, we hav moral life and peace of conscience for the mind or soul; for as we hav bodily senses to lay hold upon matter and supply our physical needs, so also we hav mental faculties which lay hold upon nature and upon deity, the soul of nature, and thus supply our mental or spiritual wants.

"'Inspiration is the breathing or infusing of the spirit of justice, purity, and love into the mind or soul of man, and is therefore the light of our being and the great background of all human faculties.'"

Yours fraternally, MARTHA J. YOUNGLOVE.

CARVERSVILLE, PA., Aug. 6, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: As I appear to be almost alone in my outspoken convictions of what I believe to be truth, will you publish this, my concludent opinion, on popular Christianity? After weighing pro and con evidence furnished to my mind on the subject—being now in my seventy-fifth year, and yet a youth scarce of age, having been nurtured and ground in the Quaker theological mill—I hav always felt a deep interest to understand truth from error, believing with Thomas Jefferson that "if there is a God, he must more approve the dictates of reason than blind ignorance"—hence, whilst

Some assert there is a God,
And some assert a devil;
I believe that all is God,
And that there is no devil;
That heaven is a blissful state
Of harmony divine,
Found in every soul
Where the virtues shine;
That hell is a degraded state,
Where virtue is not known,
So man becomes a devil,
The only devil known.

Now, finding that many of the best developed minds after a careful examination of history, hav come to the grave conclusion of doubt whether such a person as Jesus Christ of the Bible ever existed or not, but if a fact, he was only a singular person of his time, no uncommon thing, and the priesthood of the time seized upon and magnified his character as that of a god, to perpetuate a priestly rule over the mass of mankind that they (the priests) might liv in luxury and ease, free from the common business of life properly belonging alike to all the children of earth. Here, waving again the opinions of others, let me remark if the Jesus Christ testified of in the New Testament was a veritable person, without detracting from his many virtues, might he not properly be styled the "King of Tramps" according to his own reported words, that he "had not where to lay his head," and yet claimed to be the Lord of creation?

Wonderful, wonderful! how could it be,
The Lord of creation, no home could he see?
Granting it true, how does it sound,
The Lord of creation no home for him found?
Oh, wonderful, wonderful, wonderful mind.
Such a tramp on the roads we never shall find (Though we search through creation with candles and lamps
As said Lord of creation and king of the tramps!

CHORUS.—Lamps and candles, candles and lamps,
Lord of creation, king of the tramps,
Can it be possible, can it be true?
Lord of creation, what shall we do?
Oh!!!
Bogus Christianity, church-anity-vanity,
Plague of the world, curse of humanity,
Has slaughtered thousands in its course,
Till common sense subdued its force.
Oh, the misery suffered by it.
And not a soul that can deny it.
Hence the greatest humbug of our race,
The sum and scum of all disgrace,
Upheld by priests who fatten and thrive
From others' labor, as drones in a hive;
Whom Jesus cursed with awful woe,
At least we find it written so—
Matthew 23d chapter particularly so.

A TOAST TO D. M. BENNETT.

Hail to our chief from his long weary roam,
To the land of the free, his own nativ home;
May he liv to enjoy the fruits of his labor,
And rival forever his Comstock neighbor. E. W. A.

Bold, outspoken pioneers,
I honor and admire,
Who stand for truthful justice
And hail opposing fire;
Meet it with a firm resolve
Of high progressiv thought,
Till priestly rule shall vanish,
Become a thing of naught.

Respectfully, E. W. ALLEN.

DETROIT, MICH., Aug. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1 for my subscription, which ran out on the 1st. I hav done wrong in not sending it before, but I wished to say a few words to the many poorer readers who begin to feel the slavery of our false system of finance.

Mr. Petty, in May 28th, wrote a good article for workingmen, and a workingman answered it, but neither of them seems to see the cause of the evils that fill our land with vice, misery, and crime, and as Sada Baily, in July 1st, asks that everyone who has a remedy for our evils should ventilate it, I will try and do so.

First, the cause, and I want every Liberal who reads this paper to carefully read it, think on it, study it, for it is the most important question ever yet discussed. It is not money nor the love of money, but the want of money in circulation, that is the root of all evil. Do not forget it, my friends and fellow-sufferers, a contracted currency always makes the many the slaves of the few. It is the life of monarchies, aristocracies, and monopolies for twenty years past. The Republican party hav so fixed the finance laws that one dollar has become of more value than five hundred dollars ought to be. It has beeome more valuable in the sight of the millions than lands or homes, or wife or mother, or any other consideration, for all manner of crimes are readily committed for a few dollars or even cents of that money which should be furnished a full legal tender by the government only in such unlimited quantities that no man need to borrow or ask for credit, and no man could keep a pawn shop under three balls, or as a bank, nor any man liv by loaning money at interest. This is the remedy, and I freely challenge any man on earth to giv one sensible, unselfish reason why it should not be so. Had there been money enough twenty-five years ago to do all of the business that could and would hav been done on a principle of pay cash down, there would hav been no slaves in the South to free, and there would hav been no war for the Union. Had there been $500,000,000 issued by the government at the close of the war there would hav been no cry of "bloody shirt" for years after. In the past twenty years by speculating upon the credit of labor, labor has been put under a falsely so-called debt of $16,000,000,000 or more, which it is never intended that they shall pay, it is only hoped that they will quietly pay the interest while they sink into abject servitude. If all of the debt of England or Russia or France or Turkey, etc., were put into legal tender government money, all their crowns would drop off, aristocracies crumble away, and all distinctions of caste soon be leveled.

For twenty years past the children of this country hav been drilled and educated to be liars, thieves, robbers, murderers, and prostitutes. The laborers hav been taxed to build gallows, prisons, workhouses, insane asylums, and poorhouses. Nineteen men hav been hung on one gallows; thousands of men and women for want of money in circulation to set them at work hav been sunk to the lowest depths of vice and misery. Mr. Thompson, the oldest banker in New York, told the Bankers' Association last fall that there had never been money enough in circulation, and that at that time there was not five per cent yet of the amount then needed. Think of this, my Liberal and laboring friends, that a banker admits that last fall we needed twenty times as much money in circulation as there was then. But I tell you that we needed five hundred times as much money in circulation as we then had. I tell you that the want of money in circulation is the root of all the evil fruit that curses this land to-day with poverty, drunkenness, vice, and misery, and if there is a reformer of any kind who reads this article, let me say to them this is the only remedy, this is the cause, the support of all the evils. You can find all the rest are but effects of this everlasting evil root. Labor earns everything and never goes in debt, yet by contracting the amount of the medium of exchange labor has been blindly driven into a supposed or fictitious debt of over one-half of all the value of the whole country, and labor is exhausted to pay interest on this enormous amount, while at the same time he supports and sustains six thousand curses more vile, called national banks or pawn shops, to which the amount of interest paid no man is able to enumerate.

If the Liberals of this nation wish to separate church and state, and make this a free land, let them start a party with only one plank in their platform—"Free and unlimited legal tender money makes a free people." He or she that hath ears to hear let them hear, for I assure you there is no name given under freedom's banner whereby labor can be saved. But you must all prepare to bear a hand at repudiation, inflation, ruin, rag-baby that will beat the howls of the old man Judah that Elmina tells about in your paper of the 19th, for when labor claims its own the laborers must expect all the curses that the thieves can invent. But this is the only remedy. It is simple; it is just and right.

With a hearty welcome to our leader, Bro. Bennett, I am Fraternally, J. H. WOOD.

The Hebe of Canova.

BY ALHAZA.

"What grace divine
Did here with human workmanship combine!"
—Sophocles.

Full heavily a drop of deep regret
Falls like an Indian ruby on my heart;
But a sweet, snowy form of maiden grace—
Delicious sight—to me can peace impart.

That bosom white, from purest marble wrought,
And airy tread beneath a chiseled fold,
Convey more treasure to my aching heart
Than purple sail and mast of beaten gold.

How sweet was pagan art! No Christian frown
Chilled lovely Hebe in her flowery way;
So brightly bold, so exquisitly shy,
And charmed great Jove in beauty gliding by.

She met you as a zephyr meets a rose;
Her dalliance with the lilies by the stream
Made gods sink down, heart-smitten from the sky,
When morning gray disturbed their starry dream.

Her smile made autumn seem like glowing spring,
And cast a glow upon some ancient tomb,
Till holy Pan would fondly loiter there,
Slighting the sweetness of Arcadia's gloom.

(And frowning nymphs, with proud, disdainful lip),
The hymn that heaved sweet Hebe's snowy breast
Seemed woven in many a trembling mesh,
Where 'neath the sea bright shells and corals rest.

And cruel words may break my trusting heat,
But I can turn away and sadly gaze
On snow-white marble's budding loveliness;
Those melting lines hav no harsh Christian ways.

Perhaps Canova's heart was wounded sore
Till the sweet sky seemed sorrowing, sad, and dim,
And this angelic Hebe came in dreams,
And with her beauty cast a spell o'er him.

Not coldly sculptured, to a rock enchained,
But stepping gently from a marble stair,
A lovely priestess from an altar pure,
Who lightly moves and seems to tread on air.

Not earthly beauty has his soul adored,
His yearning bosom something craves divine,
As a sweet dryad sips the evening dew
And turns its essence to ambrosial wine.

For the pale artist never meets his love
But thorns are planted in that dangerous path;
Oh, better far to toil for high renown,
A glowing coronal, a fadeless wreath.

Are drops of peace within that carven cup,
With snowy violets wreathed about the brim?
"Press the chill marble to thy patient lip,
He will not liv for thee, then die for him!"

A Wonderful Ride.

BY ROBERT SWAIL.

Old Satan once took Jesus up
Into a lofty mountain top,
A pig back, that is, pick-a-pack,
And luckily did not let him drop.

Of all gymnastics e'er performed,
Adapted most to make us stare,
It was Christ bestraddling Satan's back,
And flying up into the air.

Then every country in the world
The devil pointed out to him;
This part we don't believe at all,
Though it be told with holy vim.

We know no mountain does exist
From whence the world can all be seen,
Should one reach even to the moon,
Believe it still, we're not so green.

It proves who e'er made up the tale
Just thought the world was spread out flat,
And thus a flat mistake was made—
We'll kindly set it down to that.

No need for comment on the rest,
Why should we wish the tale to blight?
We'd gladly giv a quarter for
A chance to see the funny sight.

The Mother.

BY UNCLE LUTE.

Baby-girls delight our fancy
With their guileless, winning way,
Maidens blooming into beauty
With our hearts a havoc play;
And a vision of the glory
Of a bride in her new joy
Proves a poem to our senses
Freed from passion's fell alloy;
But the halo round a mother,
With her baby on her breast,
Fills our souls with a completeness
Sweeter, grander than the rest.

Honor to the tender mother!
Poets, minstrels, let us sing;
Waft ye winds of every season,
Argosys love's gifts to bring;
Though we loiter at the cradle,
Kiss the maiden's blushing cheek,
Yield the bride an adoration
Greater than our words can speak,
Yet our sweetest benedictions—
Love creations of our art—
We will yield the faithful mother
With her babe pressed to her heart.

A JUNIOR clerk in an English government office was recently summoned before his chief and fined for having been seen in the possession of heretical books, including Paine's "Age of Reason." What makes this exhibition of tyranny doubly disgusting is the fact that the victim must keep strict silence under penalty of dismissal. These petty despots hav not even the courage of their villainy.

Our Auxiliaries.

From the Iconoclast.

The unprecedented progress of Mr. D. M. Bennett across the United States, if it has served no other good purpose, has been useful in drawing Liberals together, and in demonstrating to the people what the Liberal strength of this country is.

Even the most superficial observer must realize that Liberalism has immensely increased and thriven, both in numbers and in moral force, since the attempt to "stamp out" Mr. Bennett's paper first took practical form. This is shown in a great variety of ways. In the ovations which were everywhere tendered to Mr. Bennett. In the increased subscription list of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers. In the putting forth by new Liberal papers of their claims to public recognition. In the general decadence of the churches and the occasional squeals which we hear from the so-called "religious" press about the lack of interest in their matters. In the respectful attention and applause which await the utterances of Colonel Ingersoll whenever he addresses the people. In Mr. Henry Ward Beecher's recent article in the North American Review. In the adherence and support of Mr. George Miln; and in the enthusiasm shown at the Watkins Convention of Freethinkers just adjourned, and in the great number of people who considered it worth the pains and exertion to attend there from long distances. "Those who can read the signs of the times, read in them that the Kindom of Man is at hand."

At the banquet given to Mr. Bennett upon his return to New York, Mr. Louis F. Post, editor of Truth, in reference to the toast, "The Independent Press," said: "I am not oversanguin in asserting that the religions of superstition and faith are rapidly losing their holds on the minds of men. This fact is attested by the evidence of keener and less partial observers than I. Henry George, one of the clearest investigators and most eloquent writers on social questions, and a man who still clings to the religious traditions of his childhood, in his work on 'Progress and Poverty,' says that 'in the popular mind Christianity is dying at the root, as the old paganisms were dying when Christianity entered the world.'"

And Mr. Post went on to say: "What has produced the great change in public opinion? Not the press, but the labors, the sacrifices, the humiliations, the honest purpose and steadfast conduct of men like Thomas Paine, who laid the corner-stone of Infidelity and Freethought; like Bennett, who is rearing the superstructure, and like Ingersoll, who adorns the edifice with his eloquence and guards it with shafts of sarcasm shot from the bow of humor."

To the men Mr. Post has named, and to those who work in sympathy with them, much is certainly due. But there is another and a different class of men who hav done quite as much as they to impart momentum to the Freethought movement, and whose labors should not pass unnoticed, nor be overlooked in our estimate of the causes which are helping on the work of Liberalism. Let us be quite fair. Let us giv the devil his due. We refer to those self-constituted leaders who assume to represent the sentiments and feelings of Christianity, and whom the great body of Christians very unadvisedly allow to retain positions of leadership to the great detriment and disgrace of their cause. Men whose impertinences repel the thoughtful without winning the thoughtless. No one can find fault with the Christian system of morality. It is as good a moral system as has ever been presented to the world, or ever will be, but the men who preach it, and with their lives belie it, are constantly driving from its churches disgusted multitudes. These men are powerful workers for Liberalism, and we insist that they hav due recognition as such. It would require a man of wonderful persuasiv power to entice away from the church as many souls as were driven from it by the defaulter Pursell.

Consider this very case of Mr. Bennett's, which has attracted so much attention, and around which hovered, like vultures, several of the most efficient workers in the church and against it. There never was a clearer verification of Paine's maxim, that "there is nothing like a wrong to quicken the sentiment of justice," and the injustice of that case, practiced as it was by churchmen, and as they thought for the benefit of the church, has driven from the church many who, if they had not seen this injustice, would still hav been the church's firm supporters. The fact that Joseph Cook, who not only professes to be a leader in his sect but actually finds some support for such professions, should make use of such a disreputable tool as the infamous Benedict to accomplish the vilest purpose a man ever undertook, that he should sit in court and in cold blood egg on the prosecutor and encourage the judge in his work of injustice, and gloat over the result of his scheme, and glory over what he thought was going to be his triumph, and what he probably hoped would be the death of his victim. These facts, we say, giv the lie direct to his pretensions to morality, and no thoughtful man wants to be found in Joseph Cook's company. After the conviction and imprisonment of the victim, Howard Crosby arose jubilant on the platform of the Young Men's Christian Association, and with priestly unction gave his estimate of the great importance and immense value to his church of the atrocious imprisonment. He stated that value to be very large, but some how or other no one can now fail to see that the advantage must be expressed by a negativ quantity, and that by the Bennett outrage the church has lost what she can never regain in this country, the respect of thinking men. The church engineered the scheme, the church approved of it, and the church is abundantly welcome to all the glory she has got from it. Mr. Bennett will go on and liv in the grateful remembrance of free Americans long after Crosby and Cook shall be forgotten.

What shall we say of the jackanapes and theological straddlebug, Talmage, who has made the religion he professes a thousand times more ridiculous than all Ingersoll's sarcasm ever could or can make it? What shall we say of Morgan Dix, who preaches forbearance and forgiveness, and metes out to the man who plays a practical joke on him a most fiendish revenge? We consider Dix to be as much the murderer of poor Williamson as if he had driven a knife to his heart. Shall we not thank these men for the work they hav done and are doing for Liberalism? Shall we not thank them for driving over to our camp the best and the purest and the brightest men of our age? Shall we not also include in our grateful remembrance each and every man whose name figures in that long list of criminal preachers which Col. Billings has with so much diligence compiled?

Different men from Paine and Bennett and Ingersoll are doing work for Liberalism, and perhaps as much as they. Who shall say that the men who advertise Walt Whitman, and cause the people to seek his noble book and read it, hav not done as much substantial good as Whitman himself? Is not he that waters as worthy as he that plants?

Therefore, when our enemies howl about us like the wild bulls of Bashan, let us not be in the least discouraged, for they are doing our work. They are "building better than they know." Let us always bear in mind what an impulse Freethought has received from the Bennett outrage. Let us remember that Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" was little read for fifteen years, until some nasty fellows announced to the world that they saw reflected in its purity the obscenities of their own base minds. Let us unite with the spirit of Thomas Jefferson around the standard of eternal hostility against every form of tyranny over the mind of man, and let us be encouraged by the conduct of the enemies of Freethought, and congratulate ourselvs that we hav such enemies; confident that they will contribute largely, however involuntary, to do our work for us, and to do just that part which we could not do ourselvs.

Talmage's Last.

From the Montreal Daily Star.

Dr. Talmage, of Brooklyn, is nothing if not a scholar. It may be remembered that he violently assailed the revised version of the New Testament, and hinted that he could hav got a much better one made without going far from home. To be sure, the specimens of scholarship which he givs to his Brooklyn congregation from time to time are not such as ordinary students are apt to admire; but then that is because they are ordinary students, while he is an extraordinary divine and acrobat. The word acrobat means, in fact, one who walks upon dizzy summits; so that the reverend gentleman has earned the title in a double sense. He performs physical feats in the rostrum which would dislocate every joint in most men's backs, and at the same time he soars upon the high places of philosophy, theology, and erudition.

The last demonstration the reverend gentleman has given of his profound acquaintance with the Greek language is the invention of the word "prophoscope" as applied to some instrument through which Jacob of old "looked down through the corridors of the centuries." Poor Jacob! We don't believe a word of it. The telescope would hav bothered him a good deal; the telephone would hav made him "hello;" but the prophoscope—what would he hav done with it? It is a comfort indeed to think the poor old man whose days, as he told the Egyptian king, were "few and evil" had not to grapple with this fearful contrivance of Talmagian genius. That the word has no possible derivation or meaning is, we suppose, an irrelevant and almost impertinent consideration. It has a grand Talmagian sound; it was built to echo and re-echo through the vast expanse of the Brooklyn Tabernacle; sound and not sense was what was wanted, and "prophoscope" just fills the bill. As a real "comforting word" for pulpit use we think it beats either of those old favorits Mesopotamia and Cappadocia; for the meaning of these might some day be found out—and then where would their comfort be?—but the meaning of "prophoscope"—never! It is full of impressiv and mysterious suggestions. What might it not mean? It is a word of infinit terror to those evil-doers who study Greek roots; while to the ignoramuses who admire Talmage it sounds like a Pindaric strain of victory.

It is not every man who can thus grandly fling a new word into the vocabulary of his nation; but Talmage can do it. The next thing is to get it into Webster. It may not mean anything, as we hav said, but still let it go in and occupy the ground, and let a note appear that the meaning is in course of discovery, and will probably be ready for announcement in the next edition. Even if no meaning should ever be discovered, the word is grand in itself, and might easily be put to a variety of uses. How often it happens that we cannot find a word that exactly expresses what we want to say; and in such a case how convenient to take up some spare word of imposing sound, and wholly indeterminate sense like "prophoscope." Or in controversy with a formidable opponent whose logic was getting the better of us, how the tide of battle would turn if we could only tell him that, examined in the light of the "prophoscope," his argument appeared utterly frivolous! Even as a simple weapon of offense its effect would be prodigious. There are few unlettered men, or lettered ones either for that matter, who could stand for a moment being called "prophoscopes." The word sophomore is sometimes used in a derisiv way with great effect; but giv the right accent and intonation to "prophoscope," and you hav a term of contempt that would brand and hiss itself into the very toughest hide. The word would also be largely available in scientific discussions among persons wholly ignorant of science. In this respect it would far surpass the word "coprolite," which we hav heard very effectivly bandied to and fro by persons ignorant of its meaning.

The great need of the hour, therefore, is to get the word "prophoscope" into the dictionary. Leave it there, we say, as a spare word for use in emergencies of all kinds. It is Talmage's gift to the people, so let us keep it. If anybody seeing it breathes a devout wish that its inventor were so far down "the corridors of the centuries" that not even a "prophoscope" with a ten-foot reflector could bring him within sight, we may be sure it will only be some crusty scholar who fails to understand this progressiv age, or to realize how greatly an admixture of the mountebank improves the character of a modern minister of the gospel.

Circular.

To the Freethinkers of the United States and of Canada:

I propose to publish immediately a pamphlet containing the Articles of Association of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, including its creed and platform, viz: The demands of Liberalism, the resolutions passed at the late Watkins Convention, with the names of the officers of the association and an alphabetical list of the members with the full post-office address of each.

This association, in many respects, is national in its character. Its articles of association confine its membership to no section of country, and at each convention the Freethinkers of all the states and of Canada are invited to participate. And I wish to hav every person in the United States and of Canada, who desires to be known as a Freethinker (who has not already done so), to at once unite with this association, so that his or her name and post-office address may appear in the pamphlet. All that is necessary to become a member, is to send your name and twenty-five cents to me. The price of the pamphlet and postage will be thirty cents.

Those who are members are requested to immediately forward to me their names written in full with their full post-office address. These addresses should be written very plainly, so that no error shall appear when published.

Now, Liberal friends, whether you are known as Materialists, Spiritualists, Free Religionists, or Agnostics, at once send in your names, that we may hav a full and perfect list of the Freethinkers of the United States and of Canada.

The Phantom Form,

EXPERIENCES IN EARTH AND SPIRIT LIFE

Revelations, by a Spirit,

through the trance mediumship of

MRS. NETTIE PEASE FOX,

Mediumistic author of "The Golden Key, or Mysteries Beyond the Veil;" "A Search for the Temple of Happiness;" "The Unattained Attainable," etc.

Bound in cloth, $1. Sent, post-paid, to any part of the world.

This is one of the most deeply interesting Spiritualistic works ever published. Given in narrativ form by a lady whose earth life was one of strange vicissitudes, startling events, and wonderful mediumistic experiences. After many years in spirit life she returns to earth, and, through the fully entranced organism and powers of another, gives her earth history, followed by revelations from spirit life, interesting and instructiv to those who would know of the condition, opportunities, and employments of those who hav crossed the "narrow stream meandering these two worlds between." A better understanding of this remarkable book may be obtained by consulting the following table of a few of the many subjects upon which we hav revelations from the spirit world.

Death Foretold; Death-bed Visions and Revelations; Is There Another Life? Angel Ministration; Spirit Prophecy Fulfilled; Saved from a Horrible Fate by Spirit Warning; A Father's False Representations Corrected by the Spirit Mother; Life Saved by Spirit Power; My Death Foretold; My Sudden Departure from Earth Life; First Awakening in Spirit Life; Mansions in Spirit Land; Return to Earth Life; Some Spirits Still Worship a Personal God; Spirits Attend a Marriage Ceremony of Earth; Marriage in Spirit Life; Temple of Science; Library; Modes of Traveling; Visiting Another Planet; Meeting of Husband and Wife, whose earthly marriage had been unfortunate, and many important revelations are given of life and its employments in the spirit world; deeply interesting.

The Offering will be conducted independently, impartially. Nothing looking to man's welfare will be deemed alien to its pages. Offensiv personalities and indelicacy of language will be wholly excluded. In its editorial conduct the truth, beauty, and utility of Spiritualism will be advanced. It will not, in any particular, be a sectarian journal, but broad, progressiv, Liberal—will giv fair and equal expression to all forms of thought. Above all things, it aims to be Liberal, to be devoted to Spiritualism in its broadest, highest, most extensiv application.

Among its contributors will be found our oldest and ablest writers. In it will be found lectures, essays upon scientific, philosophical, and Spiritual subjects, spirit communications and messages.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION:

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations. The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH.

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey, Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon, Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Vol. I. or II. mailed on receipt of $2.

DEITY ANALYZED AND THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The singular audacity with which he attack. the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency,

as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, cured thoroughly and permanantly cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

Gems of Thought.

JUSTICE and freedom for herself is woman's latest and highest demand.—History of Woman Suffrage.

NOBLE work is the true educator. Idleness is a thorough demoralizer of body, soul, and conscience. Nine-tenths of the vices and miseries of the world proceed from idleness. Without work there can be no activ progress in human welfare. No more insufferable misery can be conceived than that which must follow incommunicable privileges. Imagin an idle man condemned to perpetual youth, while all around him decay and die. How sincerely would he call upon death for deliverance! "The weakest living creature," says Carlyle, "by concentrating his powers on a single object can accomplish something, whereas the strongest, by dispersing his powers over many, may fail to accomplish anything."—Dr. Smiles's Duty.

IN the morning when thou risest unwillingly [the emperor is soliloquizing and addressing his thoughts to himself] let this thought be present: I am rising to the work of a human being. Why, then, am I dissatisfied if I am going to do the things for which I was brought into the world? Or hav I been made for this to lie in the bedclothes and keep myself warm? But this is more pleasant. Dost thou exist, then, to take thy pleasure and not at all for activ exertion? Dost thou not see the little plants, the little birds, the ants, the spiders, the bees, working together to put in order their several parts of the universe? And art thou unwilling to do the work of a human being, and dost thou not make haste to do that which is according to thy nature?—M. A. Antoninus.

Go to the ant, thou sluggard! Consider her ways and be wise, which, having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer and gathereth her food in the harvest. How long wilt thou sleep, O sluggard?—Proverbs vi, 6-9.

ONLY those who hav taken as their guide knowledge instead of faith, those who submit to no authority as authority but bow solely to the dictates of reason, those only hav a right to reject the Bible as a moral teacher. There is no logical standpoint between entire submission to authority and entire freedom of judgment. Our opponents are continually urging this on waverers as a threat, and we reiterate the assertion as a deliberate and solemn warning. We had better quietly accept whatever is presented to us for our homage with a fair show of authority if we are not prepared to take the trouble to "prove all things" and to follow, at whatever pain, the guiding torch borne in the hand of Freethought.—Mrs. Annie Besant's True Basis of Morality.

THE present is the past grown older and wiser—it is time better understood. Free religion is religion grown older and wiser; it is God and man better understood. The highest fruit of a religion is a better religion. We are to honor the Christian protest for the liberty it secured the world. [When and where?] It is not for the result that the Reformation produced, but for the precedent it established that we value it. We respect the protest, not the Protestantism, of the reformers. That is the only true reformation that allows itself to be reformed. Free religion is the assertion of man's rights—of man's freedom; it is humanity in freer relations with man and in truer relations with the universe; it is human life not bound by creeds, not limited by customs. Its attitude is not of submission, but that of independence.—L. K. Washburn's Free Religion.

Is it natural that people should pursue an honest course through life when they are taught from their mother's knees, in the Sunday-school, and at every church they attend during childhood, youth, and mature age that however black their crimes, however base their sins, however dishonest or iniquitous their conduct may be, that it can all be blotted out; that their record can be made spotless and clean; that their sins, though as red as scarlet, can be made as white as wool; that they can be washed in the blood of an innocent lamb and be rendered immaculate, pure, and spotless; that however great the score of indebtedness that may be posted up against them in the great ledger, a kind-hearted individual will settle it all if they will simply believe in him—that "Jesus will pay it all?"—D. M. Bennett's Truth Seeker Tract No. 64.

To liv well is the best preacher. To set a lofty example is the richest bequest a man can leave behind him, and to exemplify a noble character is the most valuable contribution a man can make for the benefit of posterity.—Dr. Samuel Smiles.

ALL things hav I seen in the days of my vanity. There is a just man that perisheth in his righteousness, and there is a wicked man that prolongeth his life in his wickedness.—Ecclesiastes vii., 15.

OUR feelings are but little guide to go by. The feeble woman who has always been braced by whalebone and corsets says she cannot hold herself up without them, nor could she stand up if she had always been depending on props. If a faculty is not used it becomes weakened, and just so with any portion of the body. Keep it inactiv and it becomes helpless. It is said that God helps those who help themselvs; and a truer truth is it that we are as we make ourselvs. I read once of an old woman who had so long scalded and depraved her stomach with hot tea and coffee that even a moderate drink of pure cold water would produce painful cramps and convulsions. And there are wise, good men who hav contracted a habit of using tobacco, and know and feel that it is injurious to them, yet find it is almost worse than death to giv it up. To cease from its use makes them cross, irritable, and ill-natured, and often causes a loss of memory and mental power. There is but one way out of the trouble for these inebriates, and that is to adopt a pure, vegetable diet and cleanse out the whole system by hygienic living.—Elmina D. Slenker,

Odds and Ends.

IT was not as the doctors said,
Caused by a torpid liver,
But when the angels beckoned her
She went without a quiver.

"THAT," said Biggling to his wife when she told him that a new silk dress was necessary for her health and happiness, "is too diaphanous." "Now, Biggling," she answered tartly, "I want you to understand that I am not to be put down by musical terms. You may call it a fortissimo or a trombolo, but I'm going to hav that dress."

AN Indianapolis girl, forbidden by her parents to marry the man of her choice, appeared to be abundantly consoled by the promis of a grand birthday party. When all the guests were assembled on that occasion, she walked in on the arm of her lover, who had within the hour been made her husband by a clergyman round the corner.

HIS FODDER.

"What is your name?" asked a justice of a little saddle-colored darkey who was up for stealing clothes from a yard on Austin avenue.

"Bill."

"What is your father?" asked the justice, trying to elucidate the occupation of the culprit's parent.

"My fodder am what ebber I kin pick up in de way ob cold vittles."

"I mean who is your father?"

"Oh, yer means who am my fodder. Hain't got no sich fodder. De missuble, low-down, wufless, no-'count skunk went into de court and swored out ob hit. He has done swored off from being my fodder yeahs and yeahs ago, and I havn't had no fodder since, so my mudder says, and I reckon she knows.

AN EATING HOUSE "RUN BY A STOCK COMPANY."

It was on the line of the Q. and M. railroad in Michigan; a railroad traveler rushed into the eating-house and called for quail on toast.

"Sorry, sir, but quail are out of season," was the reply.

"Any partridges!"

"None."

"Any turtle soup?"

"Just out of soup, sir."

"Any spring lamb?"

"No spring lamb."

"Any spring chicken?"

"Served the last yesterday."

"You must hav roast beef?"

"No roast beef."

"Any leg of mutton?"

"No, sir."

"Well, what hav you got?"

"Coffee, corned beef, and sandwiches, sir."

"And you call this a first-class eating-house?"

"No, sir; this is an eating-house run by a stock company. Some want spring chickens on the bill of fare, and some say that ham is good enough; and so the cook splits the difference and sets out corned beef. Don't speak so loud, sir, as the stockholders are just now having a meeting in another room, and hav presented a resolution to buy fifty pounds of chicory per month to brace up our coffee."

THE MOUSE AND THE LION.

A lion who had lived for several years in a certain neighborhood and gained general respect for the manner in which he had conducted himself, was suddenly made the object of slanders and abuse. When he came to trace these stories back he found that they had been started by a mouse.

"Why hav you slandered me?" demanded the lion.

"Because the people will only accept me as a mouse," was the reply.

"But am I to blame for that?"

"Perhaps not; but why should you be a lion, able to strike down the ox, while I am but a puny mouse, able only to frighten women and children? What grieves me is the fact that nature made a mistake."

"Very well," said the king of beasts, "you go forth and roar and kill, and I'll become a mouse."

The mouse stalked into the forest and began to growl and roar, but his efforts were received with laughter. After he had tried it again and again, the owl dropped down beside him and observed:

"Instead of making me afraid, you only disturb my slumbers and annoy my friends. Come inside, out of the malaria."

MORAL.—The mouse who nibbles at crumbs is doing all that is expected of him. Secondly, He who looks for the mistakes of others simply shows the world his envious feelings.—Detroit Free Press.

THE BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?
BY
Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,
A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.
The author, though possessing all the prerogatives of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.
The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.
WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.
The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.
The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adqocated.
The strong commendations of the secular press show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."
Printed in good type and bound in cloth. Price $1.

HISTORY
OF THE
CHRISTIAN RELIGION
TO A. D. 200.
By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.
Verdict of European Scholars.
The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religio Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ("Sources of Our Gospels"), etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.
Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupf rschmidt, the secretary, says:
"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."
The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."
One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.
The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer 3m53

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A JOURNAL OF FREETHOUGHT AND REFORM.

Vol. 9. No. 39. | PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT. | New York, Saturday, September 30, 1882. | SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY. | $3 per year.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Rev. William R. Brooks, of Hampstead, R. I., is accused of having three wives. Should not the holy man be recommended for his moderation?

AN English "Public Analyst" says that all cheese should be washed before using, as a custom prevails among manufacturers of brushing them over with a solution of arsenic to keep the flies away.

THE catalog of the British Museum, now being printed, will fill five hundred volumes, and at the present rate it will require forty years to complete it, by which time there will be new matter enough to begin afresh.

THE colored preacher who was shot at Chattanooga the other night while stealing potatoes had been trying to liv on a salary of $2 per week. A preacher can't stand an empty stomach any better than other folks.—Detroit Free Press.

THE Salvation Army in England is now divided against itself, a large faction refusing to submit to the rigorous disciplin hitherto maintained by Gen. Booth. Opposing processions occasionally fight on meeting one another in the streets, and break up rival meetings. At Hanley a riot was quelled by the police.

LOMBARDY, although one-half of it is occupied by arid mountains, contains, probably, the densest agricultural population in the world. According to recent official reports, the provinces of Milan and Cremona hav 161 inhabitants to the square kilometer, and even in the mountain region of Como there are 67 dwellers on each square kilometer. On the same area England has only 30, France 40, and Ireland 60.

IN Dr. Blyth's new work on foods, a true "milk-tree" is described under the name of Brosimum glactrodendron. On incising the trunk it yields a slightly thick fluid in abundance, which, on analysis, is found analogous to ordinary milk. It has albuminous and fatty principles, sugar, and phosphates. The tree is found in Central America. Next a tree ought to be discovered that bears first-rate fresh eggs.

THE Rev. J. B. Courtney was trying to write a sermon, in London, when an organ grinder began to play under his window. The minister felt no profanity, he declares, when he said to the musician, "You fellows make this street a hell upon earth." A woman in the same house, however, liked the noise, and paid for its continuance. That led to an altercation, and all were taken to a police court, where they were fined.

HERESY is said to be rife in Lane Theological Seminary, where the Presbyterian orthodoxy used to be beyond reproach. Two of the professors are accused of teaching the students that the Pentateuch was not, as a whole, the work of Moses, that the Jewish ritual grew by a process of evolution, and that the Pentateuch was written by many men at remote periods and finally compiled into a body of records. There is similar trouble at the Ohio Methodist University, President Scott being charged with denying the trinity, the divinity of Christ, and the resurrection of the body. What is poor Christianity coming to?

A STORY of a Kentucky orator is told by the Louisville Courier-Journal. He had received $100 for defending McLarens, and only $10 from Ragg, who was on trial under the same indictment for larceny. Closing his appeal to the jury, he said: "And may it please you, gentlemen of the jury, when the last trumpet note is sounded, and the quick and the dead arise in the presence of the Awful Judge, on that final day, when the earth and the seas melt away, the angel of the Lord will be seen kneeling before the throne exclaiming, 'McLarens is innocent! McLarens is innocent!'" and suddenly remembering his ten-dollar client, he added in a subdued voice, "and also Ragg!"

THE clergymen of Springfield, Ill., hav undertaken to discourage young folks from going to justices to get married. They do not care for the loss of fees, but they regard marriage as a ceremony that ought to be religiously solemnized. More correctly stated, they wish to keep control of people from birth to death, including marriage, child-bearing, etc. They wish no important movement of life to be made without their sanction.

A PHYSICIAN at Lawton, Michigan, is also a clergyman. In a bill which he recently rendered for "professional services" was an item of $8 for visits which, as the patient claimed, were made solely to administer spiritual consolation, and therefore payment is refused. The doctor, on the other hand, declares that while it is true that he spent most of the time of these calls in prayer, he gave medicin for the body, too, and his charge is only for the latter. A lawsuit is to settle the dispute.

DR. VOEKER, in the Dairy Association's Journal (England), says: "None of the five samples of condensed milk analyzed by me were produced from whole new, but from more or less skimmed milk. Really good condensed milk, as a matter of fact, is always made from skim milk or a milk poor in cream. Condensed milk is not a perfect substitute for new milk, either chemically or physically. At the best, most kinds of good condensed milk are milk syrups, consisting of condensed skim milk and white sugar."

THERE is something the matter with the ministry of the country, and unless some explanations are made it will be mighty hard work to get any of us good men to occupy the pulpit. A minister fainted away in his pulpit the other day, another was stricken with paralysis a day or two after, and now an Illinois preacher is in a swoon, and the people can't tell whether he will liv or not. How much better it is to be an editor, with only the chance of being knocked down with a club when we turn the corner against us.—Peck's Sun.

JACOB LIVENGOOD is a wealthy Dunkard of Salisbury, Pa., and he seems to hav obeyed the command of his church to know nothing of the wicked world. Two men made his acquaintance. One was "the Rev. Wm. Miller" and the other "ex-Judge Wilson," and their pretended errand was to interest Mr. Livengood in Wilson's candidacy for Congress. They told him about a wonderful curly-haired horse on exhibition in a circus side show, and took him to see it, but managed to show him a bunko game. They suggested that a large amount of money might be won, and turned over to church uses. Livengood fell into the snare, and lost $3,000.

"WELL, what next, I wonder?" exclaimed Mrs. Goodington, looking up from her evening paper. "What with boy preachers and Sancho and Moody derangelists and salivation armies, things is coming to a pretty pass. Daniel and I sot under Parson Jones for nigh onty thirty years, and we never thought of asking for anything better. The parson used to giv us the true doctoring without any ifs or ands, and he made as many convicts as any of these newfangled folks ever did or ever will, I'm thinking." And the old lady glared at the paper with a look of severity on her dear old honest countenance that ill became it.—Boston Transcript.

BISHOP HUNTINGTON declares that the "task of life" is fearfully aggravated throughout the Connecticut Valley by malaria. "Laboring men," he says in the Congregationalist, "are disabled about half of their time. Hard-working women, needing every ounce of their strength and every hour of the week, are prostrated. Children are interrupted at school, and become objects of anxious care at home. The household economy is sorely strained. Spirits are depressed. In some instances important branches of industry are embarrassed enterprises are checked, business engagements are broken, temper and patience are tried. The moral atmosphere is disturbed with the physical." The bishop is hopeful that the nature of malaria will soon be determined exactly and remedies provided. He is inclined to accept the theory that the disease germinates in the human body from very minute spores. Assuming that the spread in that region may be due to mill dams, with their frequent exposures of damp ground and decaying debris, he says: "The great factory interests of New England are important to all classes. Some way must be found to secure the water-power without endangering life. When it becomes a question between life or health for the many and the fortunes of the few, it is plain which must finally go to the wall."—Sun. Is not this a good opportunity for the bishop and some of the noted experts in prayer to try their hand?

THE prize offered to the most beautiful woman at the people's festival in Buda Pesth, Hungary, created a national sensation, and attracted an immense multitude to witness the competition. Over 150 women presented themselvs before the bench of judges. They were inspected one at a time, and each canidate, as soon as judged, was passed on to a waiting room. When the whole number had been reviewed they were again taken before the judge singly, and finally all were placed together in a line. After critical inspection, the two most beautiful ones were selected and the rest dismissed, and then from this smaller number the two loveliest of all were chosen for the first and second prizes. But this was a work of difficulty, and was not settled to the satisfaction of all. The victor in the tournament was Miss Cornelia Szekely, a maiden of 16, the daughter of an official in the imperial household. Her claims to beauty rest upon a charming transparent complexion, melting brown eyes, a small mouth, rich dark-brown hair, and a form of youthful grace; but her features are not wholly regular, and the mouth and the head are not perfect in shape. Her photograph, taken in a dress that is being made for her by the first dressmaker of Hungary, is to be sent to all the illustrated journals of Europe for publication. The prizes were bracelets of gold inlaid with precious stones and of rare workmanship. This competition is said to hav shown the Hungarians that they can boast of every type of female loveliness, and they are taking advantage of the privilege.

ANOTHER fal len minister! The Barnesville (Ohio) Enterprise contains a painful account of the lechery and villiany of the Rev. Mr. Bedall, of the M. E. church, and located the past two years at Beallsville, O. To outward appearance he was a pious, godly teacher of the people, and was believed to be an efficient worker in the cause of Christ, but really he appears to hav been guilty of the vilest conduct, having seduced a girl named Rosa Arnold, fifteen years of age, working in his family. When his crime with the girl was discovered his wife caused the girl to be sent home, and in a few days the clergyman invented the falsehood that his mother was very ill and he must go to her, but instead he went to the home of the girl, when they eloped together. He added blackness to his crime by writing to his wife, asking her to meet him at Armstrong's Mills, and to bring the children with her. To do so she was forced to spend seventy-five cents of the only dollar he had left her, only to learn that he had played false to her and had gone in another direction with the young girl. The wife and children are left in utterly destitute circumstances, while the reverend villain took with him the various conference collections that had at different times been taken up, besides $400 collected at the dedication of a new church at Ozark. The notice of the man's crime is concluded by saying that Bedell's preaching to prove the existence of a hell may hav convinced many of his hearers, but that his conduct goes far to prove that there should be one to punish such scoundrelism as he is guilty of. Had he found saving grace?

News of the Week.

A COMET was seen near the sun on the 18th. It was traveling westward.

THE Connecticut Republicans hav nominated Gen. W. H. Bulkely for governor.

SIXTY new cases of small-pox were discovered in Pensacola, Fla., in one day last week.

GEN. BUTLER has been nominated for governor by the Massachusetts Democrats.

DILLON has retired from Parliament and politics, alleging as the reason his continued ill-health.

THE Massachusetts Republicans will vote for Robert R. Bishop for governor, and Oliver Ames for lieutenant-governor.

A CIRCUS train was wrecked near Lancaster, Ky., on the 24th, and three men were killed, three fatally and several severely injured.

THE great sugar refinery of Harrison & Havemeyer in Philadelphia was destroyed by fire on the 24th. Two men connected with the works cannot be found. Loss about $1,000,000.

FIFTY families hav been evicted in one town in Ireland during the last week by the police and military, and the remaining neighbors ordered not to shelter them. England is a Christian country.

BANDS of Egyptian soldiers are still surrendering. Admiral Seymour and Gen. Wolseley are to be made peers of the realm for their services in subduing the khedive's rebellious subjects.

THE Republicans hav nominated Judge Folger, now Secretary of the Treasury, for governor, B. Platt Carpenter for lieutenant-governor, A. B. Hepburn for congressman at large, and Judge Andrews was renominated for the Court of Appeals.

THE Harlem rapid-transit train telescoped the Portchester special train in the tunnel at 87th street in this city last Friday. Two persons were killed outright, and many severely if not fatally hurt. The accident was the result of carelessness on the part of the railroad employees.

IN saluting the French frigate Minerve last Monday at Castle William, on Governor's Island, in New York harbor, four cannoneers had their arms blown off by the premature discharge of two cannons, and so badly injured that two of them died, one is not expected to recover, and a fourth will be maimed for life.

THE Democrats hav nominated Grover Cleveland, now mayor of Rochester, for governor; David B. Hill for lieutenant-governor; Henry W. Slocum, of Brooklyn, for congressman at large, and Wm. C. Ruger for Court of Appeals. Tammany Hall was admitted to their State Convention, and will, so far as it suits John Kelly, work for the election of their candidates.

NEW YORK and vicinity within a hundred miles of here was visited last week with the most destructiv freshet that has been known for years. In this city many basements were flooded, and in the level streets water stood several inches deep. The cages of the animals at Central Park were submerged. Brooklyn sustained damages of several thousands of dollars. At Little Falls, N. J., a dam gave way, causing immense destruction. At Hohokus $75,000 worth of property was destroyed. At Plainfield a boy is missing yet, probably swept away and drowned by the rush of waters from broken dams above. Many were injured by the falling of bridges and buildings. At Bound Brook the water stood twelve feet high in the main street, and the residents were forced to to the second stories of their houses. The inhabitants of the low lands along Jersey City were compelled to take to rafts. On Staten Island the railroads were in several places washed entirely away. The Pennsylvania road is one of the heaviest sufferers, and mails over that road were long delayed.

Japan Continued.—The Ainos.

The peculiarity which distinguishes this rude mythology is the worship of the bear, the Yezo bear being one of the finest of his species, and it is hard to surmise why they pay him their worship, though, after all, he is a far better god than many people have worshiped. They set up the bear's head in their villages, yet they trap it, kill it, eat it, and also sell its skin. Perhaps this wild beast inspires more of the feeling which prompts their worship than the inanimate forces of nature; and the Anios may be distinguished as bear-worshipers, and their greatest festival of Saturnalia is the festival of the bear. Gentle and peaceable as they are, they have a great admiration for fierceness and courage; and the bear, which is the strongest, fiercest, and most courageous animal known to them, has probably in all ages inspired them with veneration. Some of their rude chants are in praise of the bear, and the highest eulogy on a man is to compare him to a bear. When they wish to bestow the highest praise on a special favorite they call him a young bear. In all Aino villages, epecially near the chief's house, there are several tall poles with the fleshless skull of a bear on the top of each, and in most there is also a large cage made gridiron fashion, of stout timber, and raised two or these feet from the ground. Such cages contain young but well-grown bears captured when quite small in the early spring. After the capture the bear cub is introduced into a dwelling-house, generally that of the chief or sub-chief, where it is suckled by a woman and played with by the children, till it grows too big and rough for domestic ways, and is placed in a strong cage, in which it is fed and cared for till the autumn of the following year, when, being strong and well-grown, the festival of the bear is celebrated. The customs of this festival vary considerably, and the manner of the bear's death differs among the mountain and coast Ainos, but everywhere there is a general gathering, accompanied with much saké, and a curious dance, in which men alone take part.

Yells and shouts are used to excite the bear, and when he becomes much agitated a chief shoots him with an arrow, inflicting a slight wound, which maddens him, upon which the bars of the cage are raised and he springs forth, very furious. At this stage the Ainos run upon him with various weapons, each one striving to inflict a wound, as it brings good luck to draw his blood. As he falls down exhausted his head is cut off, and the weapons with which he has been wounded are offered to it, and he is asked to avenge himself upon them. Afterwards the carcass, amidst a frenzied uproar, is distributed among the people, and amidst feasting and riot the head, placed upon poles, is worshipped, i. e., it receives libations of saké, and the festival closes with general intoxication. In some villages it is customary for the foster-mother of the bear to utter piercing wails while he is delivered to his murderers, and after he is slain to beat each one of them with a branch of a tree. When a bear is trapped or wounded by an arrow, the hunters go through an apologetic or propitiatory ceremony. They appear to have certain rude ideas of metempsychosis, as is evidenced by a prayer to the bear and certain rude traditions, but whether these are indigenous, or have arisen by contact with Buddhism at a later period, it is impossible to say.

"They have no definite ideas concerning a future state; and the subject is evidently not a pleasing one to them. Such notions as they have are few and confused. Some think that the spirits of their friends go into wolves and snakes; others, that they wander about the forests; and they are much afraid of ghosts. A few think that they go to 'a good or bad place,' according to their deeds; but Shinondi said, and there was an infinite pathos in his words, 'How can we know? No one ever came back to tell us!' On asking him what were bad deeds, he said: 'Being bad to parents, stealing, and telling lies.' The future, however, does not occupy any place in their thoughts, and they can hardly be said to believe in the immortality of the soul, though their fear of ghosts shows that they recognize a distinction between body and spirit.

"Their social customs are very simple. Girls never marry before the age of seventeen, or men before twenty-one. When a man wishes to marry, he thinks of some particular girl, and asks the chief if he may ask for her. If leave is given, either through a 'go-between' or personally, he asks her father for her; and if he consents, the bridegroom gives him a present, usually a Japanese 'curio.' This constitutes betrothal, and the marriage, which immediately follows, is celebrated by carousals and the drinking of much saké. The bride receives as her dowry her ear-rings and a highly-ornamented kimono. It is an essential that the husband provide a house to which to take his wife. Each couple live separately, and even the oldest son does not take his bride to his father's house. Polygamy is only allowed in two cases. The chief may have three wives, but each must have her separate house. Benri has two wives, but it appears he took the second because the first was unfaithful. It is also permitted in the case of a childless wife; but there is no instance of it in Biratori, and the men say that they prefer to have one wife, as two quarrel.

"Widows are allowed to marry again with the chief's consent; but among these mountain Ainos a woman must remain absolutely secluded within the house of her late husband for a period varying from six to twelve months, only going to the door at intervals to throw saké right and left. A man secludes himself similarly for thirty days. So greatly do the customs vary that around Volcano Bay I found that the period of seclusion for a widow is only thirty days, and for a man twenty-five; but that after a father's death the house in which he has lived is burnt down after the thirty days of seclusion, and the widow and her children go to a friend's house for three years, after which the house is rebuilt on its former site.

"If a man does not like his wife, by obtaining the chief's consent he can divorce her, but he must send her back to her parents with plenty of good clothes; but divorce is impracticable where there are children, and is rarely if ever practiced. Conjugal fidelity is a virtue among the Aino women; but 'custom' provides that, in case of unfaithfulness, the injured husband may bestow his wife upon her paramour if he be an unmarried man, in which case the chief fixes the amount of damages which the paramour must pay; and these are usually valuable Japanese curios.

"If one man steals from another he must return what he has taken and give the injured man a present besides, the value of which is fixed by the chief.

"They have few amusements, except certain feasts. Their dance, which they have just given in my honor, is slow and mournful, and their songs chants or recitative. They have a musical instrument, something like a guitar, with three, five, or six strings, which are made from sinews of whales cast up on the shore. They have another, which is believed to be peculiar to themselves, consisting of a thin piece of wood, about five inches long and two and a half inches broad, with a pointed wooden tongue, about two lines in breadth and sixteen in length, fixed in the middle and grooved on three sides. The wood is held before the mouth, and the tongue is set in motion by the vibration of the breath in singing. Its sound, though less penetrating, is as discordant as that of a jewsharp, which it somewhat resembles. One of the men used it as an accompaniment of a song; but they are unwilling to part with them, as they say it is very seldom that they can find a piece of wood which will bear the fine splitting necessary for the tongue.

"They are a most courteous people among each other. The salutations are frequent—on entering a house, on leaving it, on meeting on the road, on receiving anything from the hand of another, and on receiving a kind or complimentary speech. They do not make any acknowledgments of this kind to the women, however. The common salutation consists in extending the hands and waving them inward, once or oftener, and stroking the beard. The formal one, in raising the hands with an inward curve to the level of the head two or three times, lowering them and rubbing them together; the ceremony concluding with stroking the beard several times. The latter and more formal mode of salutation is offered to the chief, and by the young to the old men. The women have no 'manners.'

"They have no medicine-men, and though they are aware of the existence of healing herbs, they do not know their special virtues or the manner of using them. Dried and pounded bear's liver is their specific, and they place much reliance on it in colic and other pains. They are a healthy race. In this village of three hundred souls there are no chronically ailing people, nothing but one case of bronchitis, and some cutaneous maladies among the children. Neither is there any case of deformity in this and five other large villages which I have visited, except that of a girl, who has one leg slightly shorter than the other.

"They ferment a kind of intoxicating liquor from the root of a tree, and also from their own millet and Japanese rice, but Japanese saké is the one thing that they care about. They spend all their gains upon it, and drink it in enormous quantities. It represents to them all the good of which they know or can conceive. Beastly intoxication is the highest happiness to which these poor savages aspire, and the condition is sanctified to them under the fiction of 'drinking to the gods.' Men and women alike indulge in this vice. A few, however, abstain from it totally, taking the bowls in their hands, making the libation to the gods, and then passing it on. I asked one who abstained why he did not take saké, and he replied, with truthful terseness, 'Because it makes men like dogs.'

"Except the chief, who has two horses, they have no domestic animals, except very large yellow dogs, which are used in hunting, but are never admitted within the houses.

"The habits of the people, though by no means destitute of decency and propriety, are not cleanly. The women bathe their hands once a day, but any other washing is unknown. They never wash their clothes, and wear the same by day and night. I am afraid to speculate on the condition of their wealth of coal-black hair. They may be said to be very dirty—as dirty fully as masses of our people at home. Their houses swarm with fleas, but they are not worse in this respect than the Japanese yadoyas. The mountain villages have, however, the appearance of extreme cleanliness, being devoid of litter, heaps, puddles, and untidiness of all kinds, and there are no unpleasant odors inside or outside the houses, as they are well ventilated and smoked, and the salt fish and meat are kept in the godowns. The hair and beards of the old men, instead of being snowy, as they ought to be, are yellow from smoke and dirt.

"They have no mode of computing time, and do not know their own ages. To them the past is dead, yet, like other conquered and despised races, they cling to the idea that in some far-off age they were a great nation. They have no traditions of internecine strife, and the art of war seems to have been lost long ago. I asked Benri about this matter, and he says that formerly Ainos fought with spears and knives, as well as with bows and arrows, but that Yoshitsune, their hero-god, forbade war forever, and since then the two-edged spear, with a shaft nine feet long, has only been used in hunting bears. Benri appears to exercise the authority of a very strict father. His manner to all the men is like that of a master to slaves, and they bow when they speak to him. No one can marry without his approval. If any one builds a house he chooses the site. He has absolute jurisdiction in civil and criminal cases, unless (which is very rare) the latter should be of sufficient magnitude to be reported to the imperial officials. He compels restitution of stolen property, and in all cases fixes the fines which are to be paid by delinquents. He also fixes the hunting arrangements and the festivals. The younger men were obviously much afraid of incurring his anger in his absence.

"An eldest son does not appear to be, as among the Japanese, a privileged person. He does not necessarily inherit the house and curios. The latter are not divided, but go with the house to the son whom the father regards as being the 'smartest.' Formal adoption is practiced. Pipechari is an adopted son, and is likely to succeed to Benri's property, to the exclusion of his own children. I cannot get at the word which is translated 'smartness,' but I understand it as meaning general capacity. The chief, as I have mentioned before, is allowed three wives among the mountain Ainos, otherwise authority seems to be his only privilege.

"The Ainos have a singular dread of snakes. Even their bravest fly from them. One man says that it is because they know of no cure for their bite; but there is something more than this, for they flee from snakes which they know to be harmless.

"They have an equal dread of their dead. Death seems to them very specially 'the shadow feared of man.' When it comes, which it usually comes from bronchitis in old age, the corpse is dressed in its best clothing and laid upon a shelf for from one to three days. In the case of a woman, her ornaments are buried with her, and in that of a man, his knife, saké-stick, and—if he were a smoker—his smoking apparatus. The corpse is sewn up with these things in a mat, and, being slung on poles, is carried to a solitary grave, where it is laid in a recumbent position. Nothing will induce an Aino to go near a grave; even if a valuable bird or animal falls near one he will not go to pick it up. A vague dread is for ever associated with the departed, and no dream of paradise ever lights for Aino the 'Stygian shades.'

"These Ainos doubtless stand high among uncivilized peoples. They are, however, as completely irreclaimable as the wildest of nomad tribes, and contact with civilization where it exists only debases them. Several young Ainos were sent to Tokio and educated and trained in various ways; but as soon as they returned to Yezo they relapsed into savagery, retaining nothing but a knowledge of Japanese. They are charming in many ways, but make one sad, too, by their stupidity, apathy, and hopelessness, and all the sadder that their numbers appear to be again increasing; and as their physique is very fine, there does not appear to be a prospect of the race dying out at present.

"They are certainly superior to many aborigines, as they have an approach to domestic life. They have one word for house and another for home, and one word for husband approaches very nearly to husband. Truth is of value in their eyes, and this in itself raises them above some peoples. Infanticide is unknown, and aged parents receive filial reverence, kindness, and support, while in their social and domestic relations there is much that is praiseworthy."

Thus much I have taken from Miss Bird's account of the Ainos, which I trust you will find not wholly uninteresting. And now, presuming that I have told you as much about the country and people of Japan as you will care to read, I will detain you no longer at this time. Very truly yours, D. M. B.

YOKOHAMA, May 12, 1882.

DEAR FRIENDS: While still lingering on these pleasant shores I must tell you a little more about the false and slanderous Joseph Cook. The walls of houses and the fences here for several days were placarded with large posters saying Joseph Cook would at the City Hall on the afternoon of the 11th deliver his lecture, "Does Death End All?" I decided I would once more listen to the great sophist and falsifier, so I made one of his audience on the occasion, which, by the bye, was one of some fifteen hundred, for as there was no admission price, a goodly number of both Europeans and natives honored him with their presence. Here, as in all other Asiatic cities, lectures, instead of taking place at 8 P.M. are set at 5 P.M., before the dinner hour. Consul-General Van Buren presided, and made a very neat opening speech, in which he paid a fine compliment to Mr. Cook as a well-known orator.

For nearly two and a half hours Joseph worked hard to make appear true that which in my judgment is the greatest and central falsehood of the world, the one huge superstition, the parent of all the religious superstitions of mankind, and around which all darkening beliefs have clustered, and upon which they have depended for their life, and that is the existence of a personal creator, who brought existence out of non-existence, who created a universe of matter from a vast expanse of nothing—the great "weaver," who has done all the weaving performed in nature's looms. It was in part the same lecture which I listened to in Bombay, and it struck me as being as replete with sophistry as anything I had had occasion to listen to for a long time. One of the arguments he largely depended upon to prove his position was the concurrent testimony of the world, or the unity among men as regards a belief in a god and the immortality of man, as though the belief of millions will have the slightest effect in making true that which in itself is not true.

Besides talking about the "weaver," he said: "There is in the universe thought not our own. There cannot be thought without a thinker, and the thinker is a person. Some one made righteousness. All nature is bursting with evidences of thought. The thinker is God." Of course thought pertains to the universe; no thought can exist save in the matter and forces of which the universe is composed, and the same must be duly organized as in animal bodies, including the stomach and circulatory apparatus, the brain and nervous system, before any thinking can be done. He might as well have said that nature is bursting with evidence of eyesight, and that where there is seeing there must be a seer, and that seer is God. He might as well talk about a grand central eyesight, a grand gushing fountain of hearing, or of tasting and feeling, as of a grand bursting thought. All these are processes of nature, and are more or less developed in every form of animal life. The brain no more argues the existence of a personal deity than does the eye, the ear, the limbs, or any part of an animal. In the grand economy of nature all these phenomena take place in obedience to its laws; they contain no argument whatever of a personal deity. Cook sneered at the Agnostics and Atheists of the day, and said he could only regard them as fools for denying the existence of a supreme being. If they are fools, it is to be hoped that at all events they are not so false as he has shown himself to be.

He illustrated his arguments with two charts, on one of which were representations of animal cells highly magnified. He gave some description of the manner in which cells are built up, and characterized the process as a kind of "weaving," insisting when that kind of work is done a "weaver" is necessary. He would have it that a weaver stands back of all the processes of nature, and personally directs everything that takes place. This argument struck me as being particularly weak. If the weaver was powerful enough to create from nothing such a universe as this, it would seem he ought to have made it so grand and perfect that all its operations could be performed without his presence being necessary to throw the shuttle in every instance, for if it is necessary for him to do so in a single instance, it must be in all.

This is the way which I believe it to be. Nature is perfectly able to perform everything that transpires, and that without the aid of a superintendent, a "weaver," or a god. With nature all things are equally simple. It is no more for nature to evolve from nebulous mist a world, and set it in motion, moving in harmony with other worlds, around a common center, than to cause water to run down hill, the sun to produce light by its currents striking our atmosphere, the "weaving" of vegetable and animal cells, and the "throwing of the shuttle" in every case. Nature is equal to every emergency. All her operations are in obedience to unalterable laws, and everything is forced to take place just as it does, because under the circumstances it cannot be otherwise. There is no "chance" or "happen" in the matter. There is no "chance-work" with nature. Every effect requires a cause, and every cause must produce its legitimate result when conditions are favorable. These causes and effects are strictly natural. There are none but natural causes and effects. Such a thing as a supernatural cause, or a supernatural effect, never existed. Millions of men may have imagined them, but no man can point out a supernatural cause or a supernatural effect. Matter and force are ever present, and there is not a possibility that can arise where law and causes are not present to govern results.

If there is a being capable of creating such a grand and glorious machine as nature, producing all matter and force from nothing, and he is unable to set it in motion so it will run itself and perform all there is for it to do, without his standing by to turn the crank or to "throw the shuttle," he stands confessed of inability on his part to make a perfect machine; for a machine that cannot run indefinitely, without the maker standing by, either to turn the crank, to tighten the screws, to push when hard work is to be performed, and to keep it at all times from going to "eternal smash," is not a perfect machine. He cannot be a being of infinite knowledge and power to make a machine that cannot run itself.

The fact is, nature comprises all matter, all force, all motion, all power, all intelligence, all existence, all possibilities. She is infinitely and eternally independent of all superintendents, designers, directors, governors, conductors, managers, crank-turners, weavers, and shuttle-throwers. Those are really guilty of blasphemy and wicked falsehood who maliciously and ignorantly deny nature her grandeur and power, and supinely set up a little one-horse crank-turner or weaver to propel it, to direct her looms, and to keep all her machinery in motion.

But Joseph Cook and the rest of the theologians are not grand and truthful enough to be able to conceive that nature possesses all the power, all the qualities, and all the abilities which they so readily ascribe to their imaginary god, and they must needs devise and conceive a superintendent to direct grand old Nature, and show her in every instance how to perform her work. This absurd and essentially false business of god-making, getting up weavers and shuttle-throwers to aid nature and attend to all the events which transpire in the universe, is what is called theology—the science of God—the most false and most utterly contemptible employment which ignorant man, either in his primitive condition, or since he has become further advanced, has ever engaged in. Yes, I repeat, it is arrant blasphemy for Joseph Cook or any other theologian to despoil eternal Nature of her grandeur and glory, and set up some little, puny, feeble, fickle, fractious, changeable, passionate, angry god to show her how to perform her constant work.

Nature consists of all that is. There is nothing above, nothing below; nothing inside, nothing outside of nature. It is the Most High, the Eternal, the Ever-Present, the All-Powerful, the Self-Existent, the Uncreated, the Almighty. Nature is as much superior to all the thousands of gods which for millenniums short-sighted and ignorant man has been inventing and setting up to worship, as the glorious orb of day is superior to a farthing candle, and that after it is burnt out and nothing is left.

It is a narrow and pitiful mind that is unable to grasp the great truth that nature was never invented; never devised, never formulated, never started, never set a-going, never brought into existence from nothing. Like time and space, it never began, and like time and space it never can end. Why cannot Theists who so easily accord eternal existence to a deity they have never seen, and which nobody has ever had any proofs of, generously yield to nature, of which there are millions of proofs, the same eternal existence.

Is it any more difficult to accept the truth that the universe always existed than to think the creator of it always existed, and that for millions of ages he dwelt in a vast expanse of nothing, when one day or one week he took it into his head to make a boundless universe from nothing, but got it up so imperfectly that he has since had to personally supervise and direct every movement of it? Is it not as much a mystery for the designer to have an existence as the universe itself? Does it do away the mystery at all to say the universe was made? for how about the maker; whence came he? If the universe, being so great and grand, must needs have a designer and creator, does not the same designer and creator, necessarily possessing qualities superior to what he produced, also require a designer and creator? The truth is, the imaginary creator is a creation of man, while the universe is eternal, and never required a creator. When many say "Ah, but there must have been a beginning to the universe," they might more sensibly say, "There must have been a beginning to deity or the creator."

To me it seems far easier to accept the evident truth that existence or nature always was, than to believe the utter impossibility of the same ever emerging or being produced from nothing. It is only the ignorance of man of the great system of nature and its perfect and infallible code of laws that caused him to imagine some monster must have made it, as a man makes a wagon. A wagon, of course, has to be made, but the most skilful workman in the world could make but very poor headway in turning out a wagon without material of which to make it, for a wagon never comes from nothing. It is she same with the universe; it never came from nothing. It is vastly more reasonable to think it eternal, though ever changing, than that at a certain period in time it had a beginning and came forth from nothing.

If Brahma, Ormuzd, Osirus, Zeus, Yahweh, Odin, or Mumbo-Jumbo ever made the universe, he must necessarily have had something to make it of. In that case it was not a creation, but simply an evolution. If the material of which it is composed had a previous existence, the forces which permeate it must also have existed, and in that case we have nature eternal, without a beginning and without a designer; for what always was, needed no designer no originator.

When it is remembered that, with all the knowledge and power in existence, not an ounce of matter can be either made or unmade, neither created nor destroyed, neither increased nor decreased, some conception of the eternal character of the universe may be arrived at. Yes, it is far easier to think it always was than that there was a time when it was nothing, and suddenly, by the magic wand of an imaginary god, was converted into something.

Nature is replete with mysteries, subtle forces, and powers not yet understood, and which are being more and more known as we progress in the knowledge of its qualities, possibilities, and laws. And more and more as man progresses will he understand that there is no director or weaver needed to see that its eternal laws never cease to act.

I will not attempt to follow the sophisms of the false and conceited Cook in trying to cook up a theory in opposition to the foregoing, but let me assure you that bosh and bombast make up the bulk of his remarks. He flippantly takes up one author after another, culls a quotation here and there as it suits him, and then throws it down with the air of one who deems himself superior to all authors. Conceit, assurance, and dishonesty are his strong characteristics. He is never fair in describing the opinions of his opponents. In the first place, he claims as Christians the distinguished thinkers of the world, including such men as Thomas Carlyle and Ralph Waldo Emerson, the former of whom he styles as an "Old Testament Christian," and the latter a "Christian Theist," while those he does not care to claim as Christians he denounces and misrepresents.

This is the man who announces that he is "not a clergyman, but a teacher of axiomatic theology," a man who abounds in dishonesty and fustian.

Let me give you a specimen of his style of grandiloquent bombast: "Whoever ascertains the trend of the historic constellations through long periods obtains a glimpse of the hem of the garment of Almighty God." He does not tell us which garment the hem is on. We are left in ignorance whether it is his cloak or his shirt-tail. Could a man utter more ridiculous nonsense?

While listening to his lecture I thought if time would permit I would like to reply to him, if I could have the same audience, to show up his sophistry, his unfairness, and his misrepresentations; but there is not time. The steamer will sail on Saturday, and I must be duly on board.

On the day after Cook's lecture in Yokohama, however, I received from a friend in Colombo a a copy of the Ceylon Observer, in which was a full report of Cook's lecture in that city, in which he paid especial attention to your humble servant. It has been a long time since I have seen more condensed falsehood in a single lecture than this one contains. That I may not do even a slanderer injustice, I will here quote a few paragraphs from the printed report of his lecture. It will be remembered that I had been in Colombo before his Cookship, and delivered several lectures, in which, comparing Christianity with Buddhism, the former was placed at decided disadvantage. When the pious Joseph arrived there and learned these facts he of course must needs slander me and my friends in order to set aside the truths I had uttered. Here are some of his falsehoods as per the reports:

Turning again to America, he said that there were two kinds of Infidelity there—vulgar and the learned. Vulgar for two reasons, because its objections were ignorance mostly founded upon caricatures or exploded forms of objection, and because it was frequently associated with immorality. To look at the vulgar in contradistinction to learned Infidelity, he would do so frankly. While the church had increased in power, there had been a large increase in freedom of thought. Freedom of thought characterized every free nation. Every man in these days, in free nations like England and America, was learning to exercise his judgment, but every man had not judgment to exercise. It was the glory and peril of modern ages that multitudes were passing through the days of little knowledge, and a "little knowledge was a dangerous thing." In carrying the masses from a state of barbarous ignorance up to a state of half culture they must pass through the twilight. The trouble of our days possibly was largely to be found in this transitional state of the masses. Americans held it to be an axiom that every man must have an education. They wanted every man educated as high as his talents push him on without a large amount of spurring. Every facility was given to people to educate themselves. In Massachusetts the public was furnished not merely with common schools, but also with high schools open o the children of the poor as well as of the rich. His father ent no child to school for thirty years past, but he had been axed for the maintenance of schools all the same. They be lieved that property should be taxed to support education, and so carry the whole mass of the population upwards. They were, perhaps, aware that in American colleges there were four classes, the second of which was the sophomorical class. They had now reached the sophomorical stage; there were more squires to the square acre than ever. There were some parts of the world that had not come to college yet. The Americans were passing through the sophomorical stage to the stage in which people think for themselves, and now, he begged leave to say that it is easy to read the signs of the times in England and America. With regard to the idea that the world has been turned upside down by modern thought, it meant only that certain diseases of childhood were passing away; in effect it indicated the vigor of the constitution. It would grow into better things after a time, and now it is upon the sophomorical state of the mass in our Western nations that vulgar Infidelity seized. They had in the United States about 150 Liberal Leagues, most of them in the Mississippi valley. They were not much troubled with them in New England. He should not have known of the existence of those Infidel organizations if they had not called public attention to their enterprise. Five or six years ago those Liberal Leagues petitioned the American Congress for—what? The American law, like the English law and like laws of other civilized nations, forbade the transmission of infamous books through the post-office. The Infidels petitioned Congress for the abolition of that law. The foremost Infidel in the United States, a newspaper editor, was Mr. Robert G. Ingersoll, who headed the petition. The speaker had stated those facts in the presence of Mr. Ingersoll's friends in Washington, and there was no doubt about them. Congress replied that the petition of Robert G. Ingersoll and others could not be granted, because the post-office of the United States was not established to transmit over the land poisonous and infamous publications and instruments of vice. He had held that Congressional document before many an American audience, and he held it up here as a proof of the immorality of the majority of the Infidels of the United States. Who defended that petition? An editor in New York who was lately in Bombay. He published a paper never found in the public shops, and only to be obtained by looking for it—a paper that had some influence with the Liberal Leagues. It was ascertained that that editor was in league with some of the ogres and worse characters of New York city, who lived by pandering to the vices of the people. That man was found to be selling certain publications for which a man had already been put in jail. The editor was arrested and brought before a New York jury, which was not a very squeamish body, as they all knew. That man was proved before the judge and jury to be a thoroughly dangerous citizen. He had been sending dangerous publications into schools of girls and boys, and had been poisoning youth by transmitting utterly infamous publications. He was sent to jail and kept there for thirteen months. Robert G. Ingersoll, to do him justice, I will say, ceased to make a hero of this jail-bird editor. Several of the purer Infidels repudiated the man, and so he was the cause of division in the American Liberal Leagues, about ten of them going against and more than one hundred being in favor of him. He came out of jail and tried to make himself a hero in crowded places, where it was easy to get up a meeting for anybody, as they might easily do in some parts of London.

The editor of Scribner thought it worth while to point the moral of this procedure, and an impartial, just man wrote down the facts of the case; the title of the article was "The Apotheosis of Dirt." That jail-bird editor left his country for his country's good, and while the speaker was in Bombay he was there. Who was it that received him and made a hero of him? That hand of his that had poisoned youth and had been manacled by the only too tardy justice of a rather lax New York judiciary, into what palm was that stained hand received? Iuto the spotless palm of Colonel Olcott—into the lily-white hand of Madame Blavatsky. That editor, utterly infamous as he was, as the leaders of Theosophy in Bombay knew him to be, was taken by the leader of Theosophy and led to the front of the platform at one of their anniversary meetings, and allowed to make a long speech containing very virulent attacks upon Christianity. The editor of the Times of India met the speaker in a Bombay club, and asked him if the article in Scribner was true. He assured him it was. That editor (the editor of the Times of India) gloriously exposed the jail-bird editor. The speaker thanked him for doing it, and also the other good sheets which had spread through the continent the exposure which had appeared in the Times of India. It was the speaker's fortune to assist in that exposure. The editor thus exposed came to his lecture with a horsewhip under his coat, but did not use it, having found there was no use for it. In that exposure the leaders of Theosophy, knowing what indignant public sentiment in Bombay was, led this man again to the platform, Col. Olcott calling him one of the three martyrs of modern times, the other two being Ingersoll and Bradlaugh. Now he would put the question to the plain common sense of the citizens here, whether Infidelity of that sort was not vulgar? Bradlaugh and Ingersoll were simply new editions of Tom Paine, and Paine was out of date even with Infidels. Bradlaugh and others got a hearing simply because of their political connections. Bradlaugh called himself a republican, and Americans said: "God save us from our friends." He represented red republicanism, if republicanism at all, and red and American republicanism differed. He lectured in many towns where Bradlaugh has friends, and he found that it was only by quoting his political views that he gained influence with the operatives in England. Those operatives should be improved considerably, although Parliament had given more attention to that and the factory acts than in America; but in the English operative class there was a great number who are not well educated as to Christianity. They got soured concerning the church, and soured about politics, and were malcontents; and a man who would take up their grievances would get a hearing for anything he said. For instance, in America Bradlaugh could scarcely get an audience; there were no political grievances which he could fan. The fact was, he fanned the political enthusiasm of some of the English people into a flame, and then toasted his Atheistical ideas before it.

In the extract here made I have counted more than two dozen falsehoods, some of which I will take the trouble to enumerate:

1. The Liberals of the United States are not vulgar; they are as intelligent and as moral as any portion of the American public.

2. They are not associated with positive immorality; there is far more immorality in the church than in our ranks.

3. The petition referred to, presented to Congress for the abrogation of the Comstock laws, was not specially the work of the Liberal Leagues; nineteen-twentieths of the seventy thousand persons who signed it were not members of the League.

4. It was not an Infidel petition; many Christians and believers in Christianity signed it.

5. Robert G. Ingersoll is not a newspaper editor.

6. He did not head the petition.

7. THE TRUTH SEEKER is found in many public shops, and is kept for sale by the largest newspaper dealers in America, and by them sent to the principal towns of the country.

8. The editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER was never in league with ogres and the worst characters of New York city, who live by pandering to the vices of the people.

9. The editor of it was not proved before the judge and jury to be a thoroughly dangerous man. No person has been endangered by him.

10. He had not been sending dangerous publications into schools of girls and boys; the fact is, I never sent to any school-child, whether boy or girl, any publication, either good or bad.

11. He has never poisoned youth by transmitting utterly infamous publications; I have never circulated any infamous publication whatever. The matter upon which I was convicted was declared by the president, by the members of his cabinet, and by many other sound minds, to be no violation of the law of the land, or of good morals.

12. I was not kept in prison thirteen months; two months were deducted for good behavior.

13. The pure Infidels did not repudiate me; those who opposed me were the worst of our class.

14. I did not upon coming out of prison try to make myself a hero in crowded places; my friends tendered me a welcome home, which, of course, I gratefully accepted.

15. I did not leave my country for my country's good; my country was neither benefited nor injured by my leaving it, nor do I think it will be damaged by my return.

16. I did not attempt to poison the youth of Bombay, nor any other portion of the world. While in Bombay I neither sent nor gave out a pamphlet or a circular of any kind to any youth.

17. I have never been manacled by justice, tardy or not tardy, lax or not lax.

18. My hands have not been stained with wrong-doing.

19. I am not utterly infamous, as Cook declares me to be.

20. The leaders of Theosophy in Bombay did not know me to be infamous, but just the reverse.

21. I did not make a long speech on the occasion referred to; my remarks lasted only fifteen or twenty minutes.

22. In that speech I did not make virulent attacks upon Christianity.

23. I did not attend Joseph Cook's lecture with a horsewhip under my coat, nor a weapon of any kind; I never carried a weapon in my life.

24. Col. Olcott did not say that Col. Ingersoll is a martyr.

25. Thomas Paine is not out of date with Infidels; more people respect him to-day than ever before.

26. Bradlaugh does not represent red republicanism.

27. Bradlaugh did not attain his first popularity by giving political lectures, but by his anti-theological discourses.

Did any word-weaver ever weave into but a part of a discourse more absolute and blatant falsehoods? What can be thought of a man who publicly makes such reckless and utterly false statements? What kind of a man is he thus to positively accuse me of what I never did—to say I had been connected with ogres and vile characters, that I had sent foul and immoral books to boys and girls, that I had carried a horsewhip under my coat to attack him, etc., when there was not one word of truth in it all? This man probably stands to-day at the head of the lecturers of the Protestant branch of the Christian church in all the world. He may be a fit person to stand up before an audience and attempt by sophistry to prove the existence of a mythical, impossible god; but, whatever he may accomplish in that direction, when he makes statements about those opposed to him, he utters the most arrant falsehoods. I pronounce him, here and at all times, a malicious slanderer and a bold-faced liar, wholly unworthy the confidence and respect of good men.

He pretends to be the advocate and defender of the pure teachings of the "meek and lowly one," but were that personage alive and on the earth to-day and knew Joseph Cook as I know him—a contemptible liar—I am sure he would avoid him and spurn him as the detestable hypocrite that he is. If the occupants of the Christian heaven are to be made up of such as this man Cook, I am sure that I wish not to intrude even my nose in its precincts. I would much rather breathe pretty strong fumes of sulphur, and even suffer a little uncomfortable warmth, than be compelled to endure his company, or any others of the Christian clergy who lie as does he.

It was of this very man that Col. Ingersoll used the following emphatic language: "Meanness cannot descend beyond the level of him who will endeavor to blacken the reputation of another simply because he could not answer his arguments. I despise, I execrate with every drop of my blood, any man or woman who wilfully attempts to destroy the reputation of another."

In contrast to the malice and falsehood of Cook let me give you an extract of a letter I received here to-day from a friend in Colombo who also mailed to me the paper from which the foregoing extract is made. It is so much more appreciative, so much more congenial with my feelings, and puts such a different face upon the result of the effort I made in Ceylon, that I ask you to excuse me for placing it before you.

COLOMBO, April 30, 1882.

DEAR FRIEND AND BROTHER: I send you by this mail the Pali address chanted to you by a Buddhistic priest after your lecture at Panadure. The poem is also translated into English. I also mail you a copy of the Ceylon Observer, containing a report of your friend Cook's lecture here.

I could have sent you these earlier but for Cook, the report of whose lecture I wanted to send you at once. He seems to be a pretty fellow, for the stage rather than for the platform or pulpit. He delivered his lucubrations at Kandy, Galle, and Colombo, and in all of these places he blessed you and the Theosophist leaders alike. His lecture at this place was pretty well attended, and at the close of it we distributed two or three hundred copies of extracts from the Theosophist containing challenges made by you and Col. Olcott. The same were eagerly received by the audience, thinking they were issued by the Christian party in favor of Cook; but they found out their mistake when too late. Even among the Christians—those not bigoted—the impression Cook left was not favorable; they admired his eloquence, but despised his slanders of absent persons; so, in short, his mission here was a failure.

You will be glad to hear that your lecture delivered here is now translated into Singalese, and, as the public opinion is that it is the best lecture ever given in Ceylon with regard to Christianity and Buddhism, it will have a very wide circulation, more so because it is detrimental to the interest of the former and necessarily advantageous to the latter.

Your visit to other countries has benefited you and your people chiefly; but your visit to Ceylon has done more, inasmuch as it has benefited the poor Singalese Buddhists, who are indeed grateful to you, and has secured among them respect and honor to the memory of your name.

By a careful perusal of the report of Cook's lecture and the translation of the Pali address, you may judge of the (Christian) love of a Christian padre of your own country and that of a Buddhist priest of quite a different country far away in the East.

Wishing you good speed on your journey, I am,

Yours truly and fraternally, J. ROBERT DE SILVA.

There; is there not a striking contrast between the lies of the Christian slanderer and the truthful and kind utterances of this excellent and esteemed Buddhist? The good work I had performed in Ceylon, and which the black-hearted Cook inevitably heard of upon his arrival there, of course incited him to do his utmost to injure me in the estimation of the people of that country; and as naturally as a skunk throws his vile and offensive secretion around, so this blatant Christian threw out his slanders and falsehoods. But it seems he even defeated himself. His abuse and lies injured him more than they did me, who was a thousand miles away.

Cook made further allusions to me in his Ceylon lectures other than those which appear in the quotations given, in which he berated and arraigned Col. Olcott and Madame Blavatsky for recognizing me and treating me with common courtesy, he calling me a "jail-bird" over and over again. This seems to be his favorite epithet for me, thinking, doubtless, that if he can only bring the fact to the minds of his hearers that I have been in prison they will of course regard me as a depraved character. According to his rule, Peter, Paul, Jesus, and many other worthies of the Christian pantheon, ought to be very lightly esteemed, for they were not only charged, arrested, imprisoned, tried, and convicted, but they were executed (if the story is correct), thus showing them to be more despicable characters than myself. Cook professes to esteem Jesus, Peter, and Paul because they were unjustly condemned and punished, and he hates Bennett for precisely the same reason. Such is the inconsistency of a hypocritical blatherskite.

It may be noticed of this man that his tactics vary according to circumstances and locality. He knows that I am here in Yokohama, and he makes not the slightest allusion to me; but when he delivered his several lectures in Ceylon he knew that I had taken my departure, and he proceeded to slander me to his heart's content. This, at least, is not an indication of fair and honorable dealing. Why did he not make his attack upon me when he knew I was present to defend myself? He professes to despise and ignore me on the ground that I am a "jail-bird;" but he does not despise to slander me and lie about me when I am a thousand miles away and cannot know of his villainy. Such is the course of this dishonorable man.

But whatever may be said of Cook and his ability as a speaker, it must be decdied that he is full of unfairness, sophistry, and charlatanism, and this has been observed by persons far abler than myself. A friend has loaned me a copy of the North American Review for March, 1881, in which is a scholarly article on the charlatan Cook, by John Fiske, than whom there are but few fairer and abler minds in America. It is far less severe than I would feel inclined to write of Cook, but is eminently just and true. I am so well pleased with it, that I will insert it here entire, and ask for it your careful consideration:

THEOLOGICAL CHARLATANISM.

"The small philosopher is a great character in New England; his fundamental rule of logical procedure is to guess at the half and multiply by two [Applause]." (Cook's Boston Monday Lectures: Biology, p. 51). It is only two or three years since the "philosopher" from whom this text is quoted was himself "a great character in New England," inasmuch as he could give a lecture once every week in one of the largest halls of New England's principal city, and could entertain his audience of two or three thousand people with discussions of the most vast and abstruse themes of science and metaphysics. The success with which he entertained his audience is carefully chronicled for us in the volumes made up from the reports of his lectures, in which parenthetical notes of "laughter," "applause," or "sensation" occur as frequently as in ordinary newspaper reports of stump speeches or humorous, convivial harangues. As a social phenomenon, this singular career of Mr. Cook possesses considerable interest—enough, at any rate, to justify a brief inquiry as to "his fundamental rule of procedure."

Among the wise and witty sayings of the ancients with which our children are puzzled and edified in the first dozen pages of the Greek "Reader," there is a caustic remark attributed to Phokion on the occasion of being very violently applauded by the populace: "Dear me," said an old statesman, "can it be that I have been making a fool of myself?" So when three thousand people are made to laugh and clap their hands over statements about the origin of species or the anatomy of the nervous system, the first impulse of any scientific inquirer of ordinary sagacity and experience is to ask in what meretricious fashion these serious subjects can have been treated in order to have produced such a result. The inference may be cynical, perhaps, but it is none the less likely to be sound. In Mr. Cook's case one does not need to read far in the published reports of his lectures to see that his fundamental rule of procedure is something very different from any of the rules by which truth is wooed and won by scientific inquirers. Among Mr. Mill's comprehensive canons of logical method one might search in vain for a specimen of the method employed by Mr. Cook. Of the temper of mind, indeed, in which scientific inquiries are conducted Mr. Cook has no more conception than Laura Bridgman could have of Pompeian red or of a chord of the minor ninth. The process of holding one's judgment in suspense over a complicated problem; of patiently gathering and weighing the evidence on either side; of subjecting one's own first-formed hypothesis to repeated verification; of clearly comprehending and fairly stating opposing views; of setting forth one's conclusions at last guardedly and with a distinct consciousness of the conditions under which they are tenable, all this sort of thing is absolutely foreign to Mr. Cook's nature. To Mr. Cook a scientific thesis is simply a statement over which it is possible to get up a fight. The gamecock is his totem. To him the bones of the vertebrate sub-kingdom are only so many bones of contention, and the sponge is interesting chiefly as an emblem which is never, on any account, to be "thrown up." He talks, accordingly, of scientific men lying in wait for Mr. Darwin, ready to pounce on him like a tiger on its prey. He is very fond of exhibiting what he calls the "strategic point" of a scientific book or theory, and altogether his attitude is bellicose to a degree that is as unbecoming in a minister of the gospel as it is out of place in a discussion of scientific questions.

His favorite method of dealing with a scientific writer is to quote from him all sorts of detached statements and inferences, and, without the slightest regard to the writer's general system of opinions or habits of thought, to praise or vituperate the detached statements according to some principle which it is not always easy for the reader to discover, but which has always doubtless some reference to their supposed bearings upon the peculiar kind of orthodoxy of which Mr. Cook appears as the champion. There are some writers whom Mr. Cook thinks it necessary always to berate, no matter what they say. If they happen to say something which ought to be quite satisfactory to any reasonable person of orthodox opinions, Mr. Cook either accuses them of insincerity or represents them as making "concessions." This last device, I am sorry to be obliged to add, is not an uncommon one with theological controversialists whose zeal exceeds their scrupulousness. When a man makes a statement which expresses his deepest convictions, there is no easier way of seeming to knock away the platform on which he stands than to quote his statement and describe it as something which he has reluctantly "conceded." With the principal writers on evolution Mr. Cook is continually found resorting to this cheap and vulgar device. For example: When Prof. Tyndall declares that "if a right-hand spiral movement of the particles of the brain could be shown to occur in love, and a left-hand spiral movement in hate, we should be as far off as ever from understanding the connection of this physical motion with the spiritual manifestations." When Prof. Tyndall declares this he simply asserts what is a cardinal proposition with the whole group of English philosophers to which he belongs.

With Prof. Huxley, as well as with Mr. Spencer, it is a fundamental proposition that psychical phenomena cannot possibly be interrupted in terms of matter and motion, and this proposition they have at various times set forth and defended; and, what is still more to the purpose, have proved it. In the chapter on "Matter and Spirit" in my work on "Cosmic Philosophy," I have fully expounded this point, and have further illustrated it in treating of the "Unseen World." With the conclusions there set forth the remark of Prof. Tyndall thoroughly agrees, and it does so because all these expressions of opinion and all these arguments are part and parcel of a coherent system of anti-materialistic thought adopted by the English school of evolutionists. Yet when Mr. Cook quotes Prof. Tyndall's remark he does it in this wise, "It is notorious that even Tyndall concedes," etc., etc.

By proceeding in this way Mr. Cook finds it easy to make out a formidable array of what he calls "the concessions of evolutionists." He first gives the audience a crude impression of some sort of theory of evolution, such as no scientific thinker ever dreamed of, or, to speak more accurately, he plays upon the crude impression already half formed in the average mind of his audience, and which, to do him justice, he seems to share himself. The average notion of the doctrine of evolution possessed in common by an audience big enough to fill Tremont Temple would no doubt seem to Mr. Darwin or to Mr. Spencer something altogether fearful and wonderful. Playing with this sort of crude material, Mr. Cook puts together a series of numbered propositions, which remind one of those interminable auction catalogues of Walt Whitman, which some of our British cousins, more ardent than discriminating, mistake for a truly American species of inspired verse. In this long catena of statements almost everything is easily seen to disagree with the crude general impression to which the speaker appeals, and almost everything is accordingly set down as a "concession." And as the audience go out after the lecture they doubtless ask one another, in amazed whispers, how is it that sensible men who make so many "concessions" can find it in there hearts to maintain the doctrine of evolution at all? Sometimes Mr. Cook goes even further than this, and, in the very act of quoting an author's declared opinions, expressly refuses to give him credit for them. Thus he has the impudence to say: "Even Herbert Spencer, who would be very glad to prove the opposite, says, in his biology, 'The proximate chemical principles or chemical units—albumen, fibrine, gelatine, or the hypothetical proteine substance—cannot possess the property of forming the endlessly varied structures of animal forms.'" Mr. Cook here lays claim to a knowledge of his author's innermost thoughts and wishes which is quite remarkable. For a fit parallel one would have to cite the instance of the German who flogged his son for profanity, though the boy had not opened his mouth. "You dinks tamn," exclaimed the irate father, "and I vips you for dat."

As there are some writers whom Mr. Cook thinks it always necessary to vituperate, no matter what they say, so there are others whom he finds it convenient to quote, as foils to the former, and to mention with praise on all occasions, though it is difficult to assign the reasons for this preference except on the hypothesis that Mr. Cook has an implicit faith in the simple and confiding nature of his audiences. Before giving these lectures Mr. Cook had studied a while in Germany, and his citations of German writers show how far he deems it safe to presume on New England's ignorance of what Germany thinks. It is nice to have such a learned country at one's disposal to hurl at the heads of people whose "outlook in philosophy does not reach beyond the Straits of Dover;" it saves a great deal of troublesome argument, and still more painful examination of facts. This English opinion is all very well, you know, but it comes from a philosopher "whose star is just touching the Western pines," and a German whom I am about to quote, whose book I "hold in my hand," and "whose star is in the ascendant," does not agree with it. All this is extremely neat and convincing, apparently, to the crowd in Tremont Temple. With all Germany at his disposal, however, it must be acknowledged that Mr. Cook makes a very sparing use of his resources. He quotes Helmholtz and Wundt every now and then with warm approval, though wherein they should be found any more acceptable to the orthodox world than Tyndall and Bain it is not easy to see, save that the ill-repute of German Freethinkers takes somewhat longer to get diffused in New Enland than the ill-repute of English Freethinkers. Then, among these great Germans who are to set the English-speaking world aright, we have Delitzsch! To speak of Wundt and Delitzsch is as if one were to speak of John Stuart Mill and Stephen Pearl Andrews! And then comes the admirable Lotze, whom Mr. Cook is continually setting off as a foil to Herbert Spencer. On page 179 of the lectures on "Heredity" he enumerates with special importance with regard to the relations between matter and mind, and then proceeds to deprecate the "thunder" which he presumes he has evoked "from all quaters of the Spencerian sky." But, considering that the propositions he quotes from Lotze express the very views of Herbert Spencer, only somewhat inadequately worded, it would seem that the alarm Mr. Cook expresses cannot be very real, and the thunder in question is only a kind of comic-opera thunder, manufactured behind the curtain for the benefit of the acquiescent audience. For example, the fourth proposition quoted with approval from Lotze by Cook reads thus: "Physical phenomena point to an underlying being to which they belong, but do not determine whether that being is material or immaterial." Now, this is Spencerism, pure and unmitigated, and it is a crucial proposition, too, pointing out the drift of the whole philosophy before which it is set up. The fact that Mr. Cook adopts such an opinion when stated by Lotze, but vituperates the same opinion when stated by Spencer, reveals to us, with a pungent though not wholly delicious flavor, "the true inwardness" of his "fundamental method of procedure."

That method, it must be acknowledged with due reverence to the bon mot of the old Greek statesman, is a method well adapted to conciliate the favor of an immense audience, even in so cultivated a city as Boston. We are descended from fighting ancestors, and many of us, who care little for the disinterested discussion of scientific theories, still like to see a man knocked down or impaled, provided the knocking down be done with a syllogistic club, or the impaling be restricted to such a hard substance as is afforded by the horns of a dilemma. It satisfies our combative instincts without shocking our physical sympathies or making any great demand on our keener thinking powers, which most people do most of all dislike to be called upon to exercise. To this kind of feeling Mr. Cook's lectures appeal, and the peculiar character of his success seems to show that he knew very well how to deal with it. In a moment of winning frankness he exclaims: "Do you suppose that I think that this audience can be cheated? I do not know where in America there is another weekly audience with as many brains in it; at least I do not know where in New England I should be so likely to be tripped up if I were to make an incorrect statement as here" (Biology, page 67). After this persuasive little dose of what the newspapers call "taffy," Mr. Cook proceeds to show his respect for the learning of his audience in some remarks on bathybius, which, as he condescendingly exclaims, is derived from two Greek words meaning deep and sea! The profound knowledge of elementary Greek thus shown is quite equaled by his account of bathybius from the zoological point of view. He began by telling his hearers that, in a paper published in the Microscopical Journal in 1868, Prof. Huxley announced his belief that the gelatinous substance found in the ooze of the beds of the deep seas is a sheet of living matter extending round the globe." Furthermore, of "this amazingly strategic (!!) and haughtily-trumpeted substance . . . Huxley assumed that it was in the past, and would be in the future, the progenitor of all the life on the planet." Now, it is not true that, in the paper referred to, Prof. Huxley announces any such belief or makes any such assumption as is here ascribed to him; but we shall see in a moment that Mr. Cook's system of quotation is peculiar in enabling him to extract from the text of an author any meaning whatever that may happen to suit his purposes. This slanderous misrepresentation enables the lecturer to come in with great effect at the close of his third lecture, and earn an ignoble round of applause by holding up the current number of the American Journal of Science and Arts (which he would appear to have picked up at a bookstore on his way to the lecture-room) and citing from it, as the fifty-first and closing "concession" of evolutionists, "that bathybius has been discovered in 1875 by the ship Challenger to be—hear, O heavens! and give ear, O earth!—sulphate of lime; and that when dissolved it crystalizes as gypsum. [Applause]." This is what Mr. Cook calls striking with the "latest scientific intelligence" at the "bottom stem" of the great tree of evolution. The "latest scientific intelligence" with him means the last book or article which he has glanced over without comprehending its import, but from which he has contrived to glean some statement calculated to edify his audience and scatter the hosts of Midian. In point of fact, the identification of bathybius with sulphate of lime was set down by Sir Wyville Thomson only as a suspicion, to which Prof. Huxley, like a true man of science, at once accorded all possible weight, while leaving the question open for further discussion. Only a mountebank, however, dealing with an audience upon whose ignorance of the subject he might safely rely, could pretend to suppose that the fate of the doctrine of evolution was in any way involved in the question as to the organic nature of bathybius. The amazing strategy was all Mr. Cook's own, and the haughty trumpeting appears to have been chiefly done with his own very brazen instrument.

I said a moment ago that Mr. Cook's system of quotation is peculiar. The following instance is so good that it will bear citing at some length. According to Mr. Cook, Prof. Huxley says, in his article on Biology, in the ninth edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica:" "Throughout almost the whole series of living beings, we find agamogenesis, or not sexual generation." After a pause, Mr. Cook proceeded in a lower voice: "When the topic of the origin of the life of our Lord on the earth is approached from the point of view of the microscope, some men, who know not what the holy of holies in physical and religious science is, say that we have no example of the origin of life without two parents." Mr. Cook then cites the familiar instance of parthenogenesis in bees and silk moths, and proceeds: "Take up your Mivart, your Lyell, your Owen, and you will read [where?] this same important fact which Huxley here asserts, when he says that the law that perfect individuals may be virginally born extends to the higher forms of life. I am in the presence of Almighty God; and yet, when a great soul like the tender spirit of our sainted Lincoln, in his early days, with little knowledge, but with great thoughtfulness, was troubled by this difficulty, and almost thrown into Infidelity by not knowing that the law that there must be two parents is not universal, I am willing to allude, even in such a presence as this, to the latest science concerning miraculous conception [sensation]."

Concerning the good taste or the orthodox propriety of "approaching the origin of the life of our Lord on earth from the point of view of the microscope," something might be said were there need of it. The rhetorical vulgarity of the above passage will be as obvious to most of our readers as its logical absurdity. All that I am now concerned with, however, is its unscrupulous misstatement

Let us look back for a moment at the italicized quotation from Prof. Huxley upon which Mr. Cook builds up the statement "that the law that perfect individuals may be virginally born extends to the higher forms of life." Then let us turn to Prof. Huxley's article and see what he really does say. Treating of the whole subject of agamogenesis in the widest possible way by including it under the more general process of cell-multiplication, Prof. Huxley says: "Common as the process is in plants and the lower animals, it becomes rare among the higher animals. In these the reproduction of the whole organism from a part in the way indicated above ceases. At most we find that the cells at the end of an amputated portion of the organism are capable of reproducing the lost part, and in the very highest animals even this power vanishes in the adult. . . . Throughout almost the whole series of living beings, however, we find concurrently with the process of agamogenesis, or sexual generation, another method of generation, in which the development of the germ into an organism resembling the parent depends on an influence exerted by living matter different from the germ. This is gamogenesis, or sexual generation." (Encyclopedia Britannica, ninth edition, Biology, page 636). Comparing the italicized passage here with Mr. Cook's italicized quotation, we see vividly illustrated the "fundamental method of procedure" by which the "Monday Lectureship" jumps from a statement about the reproduction of a lobster's claws to the inference that a man may be born without a father. Every one has heard of the worthy clergyman who introduced a scathing sermon on a new-fangled variety of ladies' head-dress by the appropriate text, "Top-knot, come down." On being reminded by one of his deacons that the full verse seemed to read, "Let him that is upon the housetop not come down," the pastor boldly justified his abridgment on the ground that any particular collocation of words in scripture is as authoritative as any other, since all parts of the Bible are equally inspired. Probably Mr. Cook would justify his own peculiar principle of abridgment on the familiar ground that the end sanctifies the means, and that if a statement seems helpful to "the truth" in general it is no matter whether the statement itself is true or not.

Enough of this. If we were to go through with Mr. Cook's volumes in detail we should find little else but misrepresentations of facts, misconceptions of principles, and floods of tawdry rhetoric, of which the specimens here quoted are quite sufficient to illustrate his "fundamental method of procedure." I have not treated him seriously or with courtesy, because there is nothing in his matter or in his manner that would justify, or even excuse, a serious method of treatment. The only aspect of his career which really affords matter for grave reflection is the ease with which he succeeded for the moment in imposing on the credulity and in appealing to the prejudices of his public. The eagerness with which the orthodox world hailed the appearance of this new champion—whose very orthodoxy, withal, seems to be but little sounder than his science—cannot but remind one with sad emphasis of Oxenstjern's famous remark, "Quam parva sapientia mundus regitur."

JOHN FISKE.

The reader cannot fail to perceive the justness of Mr. Fiske's remarks touching the dishonesty of the great charlatan who, in order to prove Christianity true, must needs slander and defame men far better than himself. If the system which he so valiantly supports is no truer than himself, it is false indeed. It is a question, perhaps, not easily solved—What would the meek and lowly Nazarene think of such a false and malicious man as this Joseph Cook? Would he accept him as one of his apostles and defenders were he in the flesh to-day? It is my opinion if he understood the pompous and false maligner as I do, he would not even be seen walking with him on the street.

Besides all the falseness and malice of the man, he is inherently an ill-mannerly boor, a coarse, disagreeable, self-conceited mortal, such as scarcely any man in the world would wish as a companion. He makes an unfavorable impression upon nearly all who come in contact with him. I have met with a friend who some two years ago made a visit to the Yosemite Valley, and it chanced to be just after Cook had been there, and the friend tells me that a most unpleasant opinion was held of this man Cook by the hotel keepers, the stage drivers, and the guides of that locality who came in contact with the great "blowhard." They pronounce him little better than a hog; a man who would not relinquish a seat in favor of a lady; a man who selfishly insists upon having the best place, the choicest advantages, with little or no respect for the rights and comforts of others. The people of the Yosemite Valley insist that the term "hog" better describes the character of Joseph Cook than any other. But did they know him as well as I do they would think the term liar would be equally appropriate.

Perhaps a trifle of charity should be extended to this Christian defamer on the score of an unsound mind. It is well known that he has served a term in an insane asylum, and it has been thought he was liberated quite too soon, and that he ought, by right, to have been retained till the present time. If, however, it is true, as is asserted by those who claim to know, and to be able to prove, that he became insane in consequence of excessive self-abuse, there are less grounds for charity. But, be that as it may, that he is a lying, black-hearted slanderer I stoutly affirm.

I learn that Cook will sail from Shanghai to Australia and New Zealand, but that his wife will not accompany him, instead thereof taking an early steamer for San Francisco; so she will arrive home several months before her coarse and false "lord and master."

This letter shall not be a long one. I purposed in it to merely tell you a few things with reference to Cook and his very Christian conduct, and, having accomplished the little that I attempted, I will not now detain you longer. I have some small matters to attend to before embarking on board the Oceanic, so, with your permission, I will bid you good-bye, and get ready for going to sea.

Yours truly, D. M. B.

Homeward Bound.—Across the Pacific.

On Board the Oceanic, May 13, 1882.

Dear Friends: Here I am, on the steamer which is to bear me across the bosom of the Pacific and transport me to the land of my birth, the land I prize and love above all others. It is with pleasure that I now turn my face homeward, with the assurance that the next landing I make will be on American shores. In fact, I am growing a little impatient; I have been so long away that, although I am not absolutely homesick, I feel desirous to be in my own country once more, and to be able to take by the hand the many dear friends I know are there holding out their palms to receive me. I long to again tread the soil of what is called the New World, where enterprise and thrift abound more fully than in any land I have visited. This is not wholly because our loved America is in all respects superior to the rest of the world, but because it is certainly, all things considered, not inferior to other countries, and more especially because it is my home, and because it is the home of those I love.

I have seen the better parts of the earth, extending my visits to many latitudes and longitudes far separated from each other; I have seen the blooming of gay and beautiful flowers, the abundance of rich and luscious fruits; I have seen abundant crops growing upon thousands of broad acres; I have seen millions of the sons and daughters of the oriental world toiling in the sun and pursuing various avocations in their shops and other shaded places; I have witnessed wealth and poverty, affluence and indigence, plenty and beggary, grandeur and squalor, but far before all the lands and races I have seen I prefer America and Americans. It is true, we have our faults and defects; we are, perhaps, conceited and boastful; we worship the almighty dollar with more devotion and persistency than any pagans worship their idols; we are not as sympathetic and watchful over those who need our aid as we should be; we are often hard-hearted and unfeeling; we are selfish and grasping; in our eager scramble for wealth and self-promotion we too frequently show but slight consideration for the rights and needs of our fellows; but, America, with all thy defects, and Americans, with all your imperfections, I love you still. To me you are dear, and in truth I can say I have seen no land, no city, no quiet, secluded country, no place on this side of the globe, which I have felt like accepting in exchange for my home in America.

I have been highly interested in the many countries I have visited; I have enjoyed the long journey I have made; I have with pleasure viewed these Eastern lands and peoples of which I have read since the days of my childhood; I have watched with interest the varying manners and customs of the inhabitants of the many lands I have visited; I have looked upon the grandest mountains upon the globe, with ten to twelve thousand feet of their summits clad in eternal snow and ice, whereon the foot of man has never trod; I have ridden over the finest plains and valleys to be found in any country; I have seen and rode upon the large and famous rivers — even holy rivers — of the world; I have seen the teeming growths of many tropical lands, with flowers, fruits, and foliage quite unlike our own; I have visited many ancient temples and shrines, watched the religious ceremonies of many kinds of worshipers, serenely and reverently bowing before their numerous polyform and nondescript gods; I have seen the countries whence came the elements of our language, our literature, our philosophy, our superstitions, and our religion; I have traveled over the lands where the human race has lived for many millenniums; I have visited the localities where many wars and battles have raged, where the hands of thousands of men have been raised in deadly strife against the lives of other thousands of their fellow-men; I have seen the countries laid waste and desolate by those bloody conflicts; again, I have visited crowded cities, the marts of many countries; I have watched the toiling millions at their daily labors in their thousands of workshops and attending to their almost endless stores and bazars; I have seen the myriads of peoples in different climes, often smiling and gay as though bathing in the sunshine of happiness and contentment, while other myriads were sad, despondent, in evident want and wretchednees. Much have I looked upon which thrilled me with emotions of pleasure or pain which I cannot now recall, but after spending the better part of a year in visiting these varied lands and peoples and seeing quite as much that is wonderful and varied as I expected; and now that my mind is charged with both pleasing and unpleasing memories of the endless panorama of busy life, and sometimes of living death, that has for months been passing before me, it is with positive pleasure that at last I feel myself "homeward bound," and that I have embarked upon the ship that is to bear me to my own land.

Yes, I return home feeling fully assured that though other lands have their grandeurs, their antiquities, their beauties, and their attractions, America, young and vigorous as she is, and full of promise, after all her drawbacks and disadvantages, is really the finest and most desirable portion of this earth's surface. I turn my face toward beloved America feeling convinced that she contains the elements and possibilities of greater prosperity, progress, and happiness than is to be found in any other quarter of the globe. America presents herself to my yearning vision as the present and future home of hundreds of millions of our race, affording advantages not to be found in any other land, spreading her broad domain as she does over far more thousands of square miles, and including a greater extent and variety of climate, soils, and productions than any other country on the earth. Yes, America, I turn my eager eyes toward thee, and proudly declare thee the Land of the Blest.

All is life and activity on our steamer to-day. We are lying a mile or more from the docks, so it is quite a little journey in small boats to reach the noble craft that is to bear us to the Western hemisphere; though to reach it we go directly east. Almost everybody is on board in pretty good season, many being sculled out in the small Japanese boats, while others make the passage in small steamers which ply around the harbor in all directions.

Chinese Passengers.

The number of cabin passengers is not very great, amounting to less than a hundred, all told; but when the deck passengers are taken into consideration the amount of human life on the Oceanic seems very abundant, for we are conveying from this port to California eleven hundred Chinamen. About this number are taken as live freight upon every steamer, and this will probably continue until Congress gives the word of command, Halt, which is now daily expected to be heard. The population of China—estimated at 400,000,000—is teeming and overflowing, and America offers her promising homes for the overplus millions seeking advantages they cannot find at home.

This exodus from China to America would be beneficial were it not for the drawbacks which inevitably exist. They have many qualities most desirable on the part of emigrants to our New World; they are healthy, industrious, temperate, energetic, peaceful, and well-disposed, but like armies of locusts, they are able for years to pour into our country in such overwhelming numbers as to absolutely swamp us with oriental life and customs. They can work and lay up money on one-third the amount required to keep an American family in only tolerable comfort. They are the bane of the American working classes, for they can thrive and amass wealth where the the American artisans and laborers with their families must almost starve. Chinese life and civilization are inimical to the prosperity of American workingmen. For the capitalist and heavy operators of America the cheap muscle of China is a great desideratum, for as a rule the Chinese are faithful, reliable, and apt, but an American laborer cannot live in any comfort upon the wages with which a Chinaman is perfectly content. When the dignity of labor is destroyed in any country then the prosperity of that country receives a fatal blow. This is the very effect which the influx of Chinamen is having in America.

It seems un-American, too, to say to the quiet and industrious Chinaman: "You shall not approach our shores. Our country and our cities are open and free to the people of all other lands, but the men of China shall not seek homes among us." It does not seem in keeping with the spirit and genius of our institutions, which boastfully offer a home to the downtrodden of all lands. But if it it true that the influx of Chinese labor in America is promoting idleness, pauperism, thriftlessness, prostitution, degradation, and crime, self-preservation, the first law of nature, would seem to say, Stop, this must go no farther. America's own children must not starve and become paupers and criminals that the sons of China may improve their condition.

One of the worst features of this Chinese question is the permanent distinction which exists between Americans and Chinamen, and the unassimilability of the Chinese with Americanism. The Chinese must ever remain a foreign element with us. They do not become American citizens in the sense that people of nearly all other countries do. They may reside with us and toil with us for a quarter of a century, but they do not assimilate with us; they do not become American citizens. They emigrate to our shores for a limited period only, to earn wages, to make money, which they will not spend with us, but hoard it up to take back with them to the Flowery Kingdom when they take themselves back, which every one sooner or later intends to do who visits our shores. Though residing with us and toiling with us, they do not become of us. They are emphatically a permanently foreign element that will not Americanize. They simply remain a Chinese colony, holding itself in antagonism to American sentiment and institutions. They visit us to stay a few years, to get all the money they can, and then return with it to their own land. Their religious prejudices and superstitions impel them to this. The Celestial Kingdom is to them the holy land of promise, the haven of felicity, the only land where the bones of the faithful ought to repose. To such extent is this carried that most of the Chinamen who die in America and other lands are sent back to their own country, which they believe to be the only place where their bodies and their spirits can rest in peace. No, the Chinese will never become American citizens.

The Oceanic's Cargo.

For two or three days Japanese coolies or alongshoremen have been busy in putting aboard our cargo, which largely consists of tea. Lighters having one thousand or two thousand chests of tea are rowed out from the shore, and here they wait, perhaps for hours, for their turn to come up "alongside" to discharge their burden, to help make up the ship's cargo. The chests are rapidly handed up on a staging before an open door in the hull of the vessel and are rapidly passed inside and carefully packed away in the spacious hold, while tally-men stand by and take note of every chest as it passes in. It takes but little over an hour for one of these lighters to be thus discharged and the burden to be transferred to the much larger craft. Thus is packed away in the nether regions of the Oceanic the very tea, in all probability, prepared within the past two weeks by the scores of Japanese women whom I saw making their way to the tea-curing houses, as early as five o'clock in the morning. I looked in, you will remember, one of these establishments, and saw the various curing, packing, and enveloping processes going on.

As fast as the chests are completed and made ready for export they are conveyed to the ship to next set sail for foreign shores; and within the last day or two before sailing shipping the tea is specially active. I learn that through the night a steady stream of tea-chests was pouring in from the lighters to the bosom of the Oceanic, so that betimes today the tea was all aboard, leaving the preparing establishments to get ready a cargo for the next steamer. The main portion of the tea exported from Japan goes to America, it being held in much higher favor there than in Europe. My favorite tea is the Japan, and I do not drink it strong. I like a good grade of tea, but prefer it weak. I notice hundreds of sample parcels varying from three to fifteen pounds each, have been sent aborad, marked for dealers in San Francisco, Chicago, St. Louis, Cincinnati, New York, and Philadelphia. These, of course, are samples sent on of the new crop, with the hope that heavy orders will be returned. The tea business of the world is indeed an immense thing; and we are taking enough along with us on this passage to make many a grateful, refreshing cup. The officer having charge of the freight department informs me that the Oceanic's cargo comprises of tea 18,710 packages of about 80 lbs. each; vegetable oils, 1,770 cans; raw silk, 883 bales; sample parcels of tea, 162; coffee, 471 sacks; opium, 100 packages; saltpeter, 535 bags; sugar, 91 packages; tapioca, 200 packages; tobacco, 28 bales; cigars, 25 cases; spices, 140 bags; assorted merchandise, 1,810 packages. Of the tea 1,473 chests are for San Francisco, and 17,237 are to go overland to the Eastern cities. Of other freight 1,093 tons are for San Francisco, and 1,465 tons to go overland to New York and other cities.

Although the cabin passengers are not extremely numerous, a large amount of baggage has been sent aboard, and a considerable proportion of it seems to be curios, antiquities, and specimens of oriental manufacture. Many who are returning to America are taking far more of this kind of merchandise with them than I am myself. I would have availed myself of the opportunity of taking home with me more of the curious oriental wares than I have done, but having only a single satchel in which to transport my luggage I have made it my constant care not to burden myself with more of the articles to be found everywhere in this Eastern world than I could accommodate in my limited space.

GODS, ETC.

I fear, however, that I have made a mistake in not taking with me a much larger supply of gods. Many of the Americans are such a godless set of people, having only a single god, and he one that was gotten up by the Jews three or four thousand years ago, that I believe should I take a thousand of the Asiatic gods home with me, I could find market for them in our god-poverty-stricken country. Even many of you who have faith in no god would undoubtedly avail yourselves of the opportunity of laying in a stock of two or three of them just to have before you specimens of the gods worshiped on this side of the globe. Even with those who have no god of their own, and find no need of one, to bow down to and say their prayers to, and to ask favors of, it is nevertheless sort of handy to have a god or two in the house, if only a sample god, to show to those not posted on the god question as to what kind of gods men are still worshiping.

Yes, I have made a mistake in not taking home more gods, and I have doubtless also missed doing a pretty extensive business in the godly line. The next time I make the tour of the world I think I will lay in a large trunkful of gods, just as a speculation. I have certainly visited god factories enough to have selected a large variety of gods of assorted sizes and materials, at such prices as could hardly fail to pay a handsome profit. But as Birmingham, England, has now engaged in the manufacture of gods for the worshipers of the Eastern world, I can, perhaps, send an order over there and obtain all the gods I will need to supply home demand. And as our people in America are very enterprising and ingenious, should a demand spring up for an unlimited number of gods, I have not the slightest doubt that they could be turned out at short notice in our mechanical country. Pittsburgh, Pa., and Waterbury, Conn., ought themselves be able to manufacture or create a great number of gods, should the demand justify the enterprise. But inasmuch as the intelligent portion of the world are learning more and more every year that they can get along just as well without gods as with them, it is hardly to be supposed that many god factories will need to be started in America for some time yet. The Asiatics have been par excellence the god-makers of the world, and from them many other countries have borrowed the gods which the latter have used.

We cannot forget that the God which is principally worshiped in America is of Asiatic origin, having been gotten up in the western portion of that continent, while the more Eastern nations have indulged in a much greater variety of godly characters. The gods of Central and Eastern Asia have chiefly been content to remain at home, foregoing the temptations of a residence in foreign lands, while the god of Western Asia has entirely left the country where he was devised—that contracted bit of land which he is said to have selected as a residence in preference to all other parts of the world—and emigrated to countries far removed from the place where he was born and reared. From a lack of inventive ability in the god-making line, or from some other cause, this god of Western Asia has been adopted in several populous countries, and his fame and following have thereby greatly increased. His own original worshipers have never been but a mere handful compared with the millions who have peopled the earth, and this has been a lucky circumstance for him, as but for this his reputation would have been vastly less than it is. As a matter of fact, however, he appears to be an uncertain quantity, a mere unknown quotient, and equally a mythical character with the more numerous gods of Central and Western Asia. But in the conflicting claims for recognition by the sons of men which exist among these Asiatic gods, it is perhaps difficult to decide which has the prior claims upon our respect and which presents the strongest proofs that he is entitled to our belief and worship. To me there is not very much difference betwixt them—between Baal, Chemosh, Melodah, Asherah, Adad, Ormuzd, Varuna, Agni, Brahma, Vishnu, Pak-Tai, Chang-ti, Fohi, Yahweh, Allah, and scores of others of these Asiatic gods. I certainly can see but little difference as to reality, authenticity, and actual existence between the gods of Eastern, Central, and Western Asia. To me they alike seem mythical, diaphanous, and totally unreal, and I do not believe one of them ever had an existence save in the superstitious brains of their designers and worshipers.

I notice among the personal baggage or freight a large, neat-looking box for Gen. U. S. Grant, and am informed that it contains Japanese paper. The people of this country excel in the manufacture of paper, turning out a smooth, tough, and durable article, probably superior to what is manufactured in America. It is not generally understood that Gen. Grant does so much writing that he is under the necessity of importing his paper. It is more probable that he made use of Japanese paper when here, and since prefers it.

JAPANESE FIREWORKS.

An hour or two before the Oceanic was ready to weigh anchor, we who had nothing to do but look at what was passing in the busy bay were delighted to look at the very fine display of air rockets which were sent up perhaps for our benefit. For nearly an hour were fired up at intervals of a few minutes a lot of rockets which not only went very high in the air, but which presented many features which I had not seen in rockets before. Some of them upon bursting threw out a kind of smoke or effect which assumed the shape of enormous spiders, more than fifty feet across, with dozens of enormous legs spreading about strikingly in the air. Other forms of animal and vegetable life were also presented, most curious to look upon. And what was also quite new, upon the bursting of the rockets at their highest altitude, the figure of a woman, apparently as large as life, and gaily decked out in robes of brilliant colors, standing upright in the air, sank very slowly toward the water, bowing repeatedly with true Japanese politeness and grace during the several minutes consumed in reaching the surface. It was a wonder to all beholders how such perfect-looking women could be so suddenly evolved from a sky-rocket. They had somewhat the appearance of being made of extremely light tissue paper in very bright colors, which upon the bursting of the rocket became inflated with air or gas, and being slightly weighted so as to make them assume the proper upright position, descended in that position gradually to the water below. The rockets were sent up by two or three Japanese in a small boat by themselves, and they succeeded in contributing very much to our amusement. As it was perfectly free, and no one even came around with a hat to ask for a few sen, we could not complain that the exhibition was expensive.

GOOD BYE TO JAPAN.

Just before the hour of 11 A.M., all the passengers having arrived, all the tea and other freight being aboard, the adieus and kisses between those departing and those remaining being duly exchanged, and all the preparations being consummated, we started on our long journey across the Pacific of five thousand miles.

The morning was thick, and almost of a disposition to rain, and it was with difficulty that we could take a parting glance at grand old Fuji-yama as we steamed out of the capacious harbor and took our last view of Yokohama and the bluffs west of the city. Feeling a high respect for Fuji, I strained my eyes to their utmost to obtain a farewell look at his snowy summit, feeling almost positive I would never look upon him or his equal again. For an hour or two, and perhaps more, we steamed along in sight of the coast, thus having a good opportunity to throw our good-byes to the Land of the Rising Sun, with its thirty-five millions of industrious, plodding, and very polite inhabitants, whose genial and friendly characteristics I shall long remember. It is with pleasant memories its green hills and lovely plains recede from view, and as we lose sight of them altogether we realize the fact that the next land we see will be grand old America.

Soon after riding out into the Pacific the rain began to pour down, and a northeast wind rushed roughly and strongly away from the neighborhood of Kamschatka, causing us to shiver and shake, and to wish the weather would get warm again; the steamer rolled in a manner anything but pleasant and reassuring. We had fancied that the Pacific is true to its name, and indeed pacific in its character, and we were led to expect a very pleasant voyage; but we were soon ready to conclude that the name of this great ocean is a misnomer.

Sunday, May 14th.—A heavy northeast wind prevails, and almost amounts to a gale. The Oceanic is thrown far over on her starboard side, and the heavy billows now and then dash entirely over the upper deck, producing anything but pleasurable sensations. My berth, or room, is No. A on the main deck, and the foremost of a large series of rooms. In ordinary fine weather it is a very pleasant room, but in a severe storm as we are experiencing now it is the very reverse of pleasant. The immense waves ever and anon come against the broadside of the steamer, striking my room with such force and anger as seem calculated to wash the whole upper works of the steamer into the unpacific ocean. And when those immense surges come rushing entirely over my apartment, the water flows freely in at the windows, and even finds its way through the iron roof, suggesting shipwreck and discomfort. The carpet on the floor is saturated with the water of the sea, and even the bed is well dampened with a fractional part of the furious waves which appear disposed to overwhelm us and send us to the bottom. I cannot think it was much rougher when the tourist Jonah embarked from Joppa, on his sea voyage to Tarshish; neither could I think that the storm and roughness of the ocean is on account of my presence on the Oceanic, for I have been on several other waters where placidity, quietness, and smoothness were the prevailing elements. I am, accordingly, very glad my fellow-passengers do not regard me as a Jonah, and, by casting lots or throwing dice, fasten guilt upon me, and in consequence reach the conclusion that I must be thrown overboard. Should they take this notion, believing that that I am under the ban of the god of the ocean, who is disturbed by my presence, and then to appease him proceed to cast me headlong into the furious waves. I feel very sure it would be the last of me, for I cannot think any big fish is prepared to take me in out of the wet and to furnish me with comfortable quarters for three or four days, and then deposit me safely on terra firma. All this is saved me, and I remain as quietly on the Oceanic as under the circumstances could be expected.

THE REV. T. F. CLARK.

This gentleman traveled in my company from Singapore to Hong Kong, thence to Canton, where we looked over the city together; then from Hong Kong to Nagasaki and Yokohama, making an aggregate of some two thousand miles. Although an ardent Methodist, and charged with considerable confidence that he has the "boss religion" of the world, I found him a very genial companion, and far more liberal and tolerant than the average orthodox clergyman is in the habit of showing himself. Of course we could not quite agree upon theological subjects, not arriving at the same conclusions with regard to revelation, the divinity of the scriptures, the truth of Christianity, and the nature of supernaturalism generally, but we were able to discuss pleasantly upon these subjects and not lose our temper. He more than once admitted the force of my arguments, and I sometimes hoped that he would see the superiority of naturalism over supernaturalism, but by pondering upon my remarks over night, his love of Jesus returned, and he seemed to regard his religion as still better than mine.

As Mr. Clark and I had got along so pleasantly together in the two thousand miles we had traveled, finding that we are also to be fellow-passengers on our voyage across the Pacific, I deemed it would be pleasant for us to become room-mates during the voyage. Mr. Clark is also on a tour around the world, and having undertaken it on a sum of money very much smaller than I thought it necessary to provide myself with, he was unable at Yokohama to procure a cabin passage, which, as I said, costs two hundred and fifty dollars. He secured a steerage passage, which required him to room with some rough, drunken sailors, and to be closely surrounded by the eleven hundred Chinamen aforesaid. I deemed this too unpleasant for such a gentleman to endure, and I took it upon myself to see if his condition could not be somewhat ameliorated. I saw the purser of the steamer, and described to him that Mr. Clark is a gentleman of too fine taste and intelligence to be obliged to lodge with a lot of brawlers down in the hold of the steamer, and I requested him to allow Mr. Clark to room with me. He gave his permission. The steward of the steamer, a very genial German gentleman, agreed to see that Mr. Clark is duly supplied with meals during the passage; so Clark becomes my fellow-passenger and occupies the room with me. We compare notes freely together, and have, of course, many interesting conversations, and during this severe storm the steamer rolls so excessively, and is so much of the time lying over on her side, that we are compelled to keep our berths, deeming it fortunate, in the lurches of the steamer, that we are not thrown out on the floor. We manage, however, through all this fearful commotion, to keep our equanimity of mind and to be cheerful under adverse circumstances. When a specially heavy lurch comes upon us, and it seems as if the iron steamer itself would be shivered to atoms, I sing out merrily, "Brother Clark, let her roll!" And his response is in the same cheerful spirit, "Brother Bennett, let her roll!"

During this long-protracted storm on the Pacific, when the sea is far rougher than I experienced in either of the three times I have crossed the Atlantic Ocean, or what I saw upon the Adriatic Sea, the Mediterranean Sea, the Red Sea, the Bay of Bengal, the Indian Ocean, from Singapore to Java, the passage up the China Sea, and from Hong Kong to Nagasaki and Yokohama, on nearly all of which I was more or less affected with sea-sickness, strange to say, I am not sea-sick at all. True, I am compelled to keep a horizontal position, but my stomach does not revolt; it retains the food I eat, and makes no disturbance, and for this I feel duly grateful.

Although this day has been Sunday, and we have several clergymen on board, no public service has been held, save the reading of the English service by an officer of the boat. No sermon was preached and no prayers made, save those read from the English prayer-book. This is a little out of the ordinary course for Christians, but I manage to survive the deprivation. I am glad to keep my room and my berth, omitting my dinner, thinking I will be better without it.—(To be continued.)

Mr. Whitehead Again.

Two weeks ago we published five questions propounded by W. M. Whitehead, and made what we hoped would be satisfactory replies, but it seems they did not quite answer the purpose, and that the person who asked the questions is not pleased with our responses. He has written us again, and here is what he says:

STONE, PA., Sept. 20, 1882.

Mr. BENNETT, Dear Sir: A short time ago I asked you a few questions, and in answering them you labored hard to show that the religion of Christ was false and unworthy of belief, and that it was founded on a fable and a dream.

The account of creation, as given in the Bible, you regard as a fable; we regard it as veritable history. You make the Bible say the earth was created six thousand years ago, and you expect us to gulp it down without questioning the assertion. We hav searched for the place in the Bible where it is definitly stated when it was created, but we hav failed to find it. The first passage in the book says, "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth," and that affirmation stands to-day unchallenged by science. There is not a fact or principle that is established in science that is inconsistent with it. It is not a fable; it is history.

Of course, you will claim that the Mosaic cosmogony is utterly inconsistent with the demonstrated truths of geology. We hope you will show wherein they differ. Both records show that the ocean givs birth to the dry land and givs inhabitants to the sea first. Allow me to call your attention to the consistency and the harmony of the Bible and the teachings of science on this point. Turn to the 104th psalm and we read: "Who laid the foundations of the earth? Thou coveredst it with the deep as with a mantle" (the original chaos.) In the 24th psalm, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, for he hath founded it upon the seas and established upon the floods." Solomon, in the eighth chapter of Proverbs, says, "When there was no depth I was brought forth." You may find lots of objection to revelation if you are so disposed. Every page of the Bible, as well as every appearance of nature, will furnish plenty of food for your skepticism. We do not, however, feel disposed to esteem a few unwarranted assertions as unanswerable arguments against the truth of revelation. We feel disposed to cling to our religion until we understand thoroughly what we are embracing in its stead.

Another objection (and you are not alone in urging it(is the eternality of matter. But however well you know that matter is eternal, I do not know any such thing. I know it cannot be annihilated by any process we can subject it to. But because we cannot destroy it does not prove it to be eternal. It would hav been as consistent for you, while in Egypt, to hav butted the pyramids, and when you had discovered that it was useless to try to destroy them in that manner, to hav said they are eternal. "In the presence of eternity the mountains are as transient as the clouds." But what is matter? It certainly is not a philosophical abstraction known by that name, nor is it a single substance, but a great variety of them. We hav hydrogen, oxygen, sulphur, carbon, iodine, and many others, all of which resist the efforts of chemists to reduce them to anything simpler. Which is the eternal matter you speak of? Is it iron or clay? If it is any particular one, where did the others come from? If it is all of them, hav we between sixty and seventy kinds of matter that are eternal? and are they eternal in their present combinations? or is it the simpler elements that are eternal? But should we grant that matter is eternal, how would that account for the formation of the world and the origin of life? The world is governed by law. Who or what first opposed a rule of action upon inert matter? Where did the first life-germ come from? and how did it assimilate to itself a material body?

"We may speculate about questions of this character; we may examin the lowest manifestation of life as it connects itself with the lowest organized being, still the nature of life and the manner of its union with materiality no one may know. To know where the inertia of matter ends and ths motion of life begins is and will be forever beyond the limit prescribed to the human intellect." Where inertia ends and life begins is a mystery inconceivable, unthinkable, and impossible according to your theory of things.

We believe the Mosaic account is about right in the time given of the existence of man on earth. We regard the small multiplication of human species as a demonstration of truthfulness on the part of Moses. But that the earth was created when man was first placed upon it I do not believe.

Geology is a broken reed upon which no dependence can be placed. One new discovered fact sometimes upsets a whole theory. Every new theory is the epitaph on the tombstone of the old. It would be difficult to find two geologists who agree either in their facts or theories. Their facts are generally as airy as their theories. Mr. Barnes says, "On the one subject of geology, so early as 1806, the French Institution counted more than eighty theories hostil to scripture history, not one of which has stood to the present day."

It will hardly do to say that the New Testament is "founded on a dream." The vision was given to quiet the jealous fears of the "old man" Joseph respecting the condition of the girl to whom he was engaged. This circumstance is established by the fact that he sought to put her away privately.

To say that the gospels are inventions of "ignorant and designing" men is rather absurd. The invention of such a character as Christ by any man, wise or simple, would be a greater miracle than the fact. When Jesus was presented as the Lord of life to the Romans and Jews, so far from admiring him as a hero, they crucified him as an impostor. The authors of this "ignorant" invention suffered too much persecution for any man to believe for an instant that they would thus suffer in order to palm off on the world a lie of their own manufacture. Such a thing is "utterly unthinkable."

It certainly does look strange that the gospels were not known until the year 180, and stranger still is the fact that Celsus had written a book before that time refuting the doctrins contained in the gospels which did not exist. Is it not self-evident that if Celsus wrcte a reply to the gospels they were then in circulation and commanded some belief?

But there was another heretic, the celebrated Marcion, who lived in the beginning of the second century, and had every opportunity of discovering forgeries if any then existed, but not one word does he say. It will not do, friend Bennett, to tell us that the gospels were not known until the year 180. The gospels are as well authenticated as any other books in existence. They were so acknowledged in the apostolic age. They were quoted "word for word by the immediate scholars of both Paul and John, viz., by Barnabas of Cyprus, the patron and companion of Paul in his first apostolic tour (Acts ix, 27, etc.), by Clemens Romanus, bishop of Rome, A. D 91, 92, and the disciple of Paul (Phil. iv, 3); and by the following disciples of John: Ignatius, bishop of Antioch, who died A. D. 106 or 115; Polycarp, bishop of Smyrna, who died A. D. 169; and Papius, bishop of Hieropolis, in Syria, who lived about that time, and, according to some, was a fellow-disciple of Polycarp under the apostle John" (Wheeler's Summary of N. T. History, p. 26).

"The teachers of the church in general recognized the apostolic writings, and especially the gospels. Irenæus, the disciple of Polycarp, who went into Gaul and became bishop of Lyons in A.D. 177, expressly declares that Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John wrote the gospels; Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, who died A.D. 184, wrote a commentary on the gospels; and Clemens of Alexandria (between 211 and 218) repeatedly cites passages out of the gospels and epistles. In the same way Tertullian (220) and Origen (254) and the ecclesiastical historian Eusebius (340) speak of the books contained in our New Testament, which at this time were almost universally spread and acknowledged" (Wheeler's Summary of N. T. History, p. 28).

I think enough has been said to show that Christianity is not founded on a fable and a dream, and that the New Testament is not the invention of "designing" men, but what it pretends to be, the word of God. Respectfully yours,

W. M. WHITEHEAD.

It is quite possible that we may not be able to induce Mr. Whitehead to accept the correctness of our opinions, but we can do no better than to defend them with such ability as we possess, and show such good reasons as are at hand.

Our friend will not consent that Christianity is founded upon a fable and a dream, but it does not appear that he has rebutted the proofs adduced by us to show the fact. Mr. Whitehead being a Christian, it is not to be expected that he will easily relinquish the ground upon which his system rests. A religion in which $600,000,000 are invested, with 250,000 priests living upon those who accept it can not be expected to be relinquished without a very earnest struggle. The main hope we can indulge in is that our correspondent, and others like him, will accept the truth when they see it. We cannot expect them to do so before.

Our friend's first effort seems to be to claim that the "beginning" spoken of in Genesis was far more than six thousand years ago, and that consequently the earth is much older than that. But how can he deny the record? The first chapter in Genesis in which the beginning is spoken of, the entire creation, of the earth, all it contains, and all other suns and worlds, is given as being performed in six days.

On the first day the heavens and earth were created; light was made and divided from darkness (whether darkness was made at that time we are not told), and day and night were named.

The second day was occupied in creating heaven over again, and naming it the firmament and the office of this uncertain something was to divide the waters under it from those above it, and hold the upper lot from falling down aud mixing with the lower lot—mythical proceeding altogether.

The third day's work consisted in teaching the water to run down hill, so that the mountains and elevated lands could appear. After naming the dry land earth, and the water seas, he caused the earth to bring forth grass, herbs, fruit, trees, perfecting their seed and fruit the same day. This was a remarkable rapid growth of vegetation, and no day since has begun to compare with it.

The fourth day was occupied in making the sun and moon, and apparently for good measure, the stars were made also. When it is borne in mind that the sun is a million times as large as the earth, that some of the planets are several thousand times larger than the earth, that including the asteroids and satellites there are over two hundred of them in the solar system, that some of the stars are more than a thousand times larger than the sun, some of them hundreds and even thousands of billions of miles away, and that there are millions of them, some slight idea may be formed of the fourth day's work, compared with the other five. Inasmuch as light had already been created, and as vegetation was so perfect that grasses, herbs, and trees could perfect themselvs and produce seeds and fruits in a single day, it would almost seem that that hard fourth day's work was unnecessary, and the question naturally rises, Why that great effort? This is answered by the information that the sun and moon were created to mark and govern time, the sun, the the day, and the moon the night. What the stars were for we are not informed.

The fifth day was a tolerably busy one, though not a millionth part so much as the day before. On the fifth day the tens of thousands of fishes, from the minnow up to the whale, that inhabit the waters were made; also the birds of the air. No one ought to complain of that day's work; but

The sixth day was still a busier one, for on that day all the creeping things, all the amphibious animals, all the reptiles, all the worms, bugs, and insects were made long before sundown, for there was still ample time to make man and woman, as we are told in the next chapter, of the dust of the ground, at least the man was made of dust, and the woman of one of his ribs. The last job of all is thought to be the best of the lot.

The six day's work thus described seem to hav been quite fatiguing, for on the seventh God found it necessary to rest, thus finishing up the week. For this reason the Jewish Sabbath was founded, and every seventh day has been kept as a day of rest by both Jews and Christians.

Thus we hav an account of the first seven days that existed. If time existed before that it is supposed that nobody knew it, or knew how to divide it. Whether God went to work on the eighth day, and what he did on the ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, and subsequent days, we hav no information.

It is, however, one of the simplest things in the world, according to the record, to calculate how long ago "the beginning" was. It was but a short time after seven days before Adam and Eve became acquainted, and after that they raised Cain, and after a subsequent acquaintance Abel came along. An unpleasantness, however, arose between the two brothers, and Abel ceased to exist, when Cain emigrated to the land of Nod and married a wife.

But when Adam was one hundred and thirty years old he begat Seth; when Seth was a hundred and five years old he begat Enos; when Enos was ninety years old he begat Cainan; at the age of seventy Cainan begat Mahalaleel, who at sixty-five begat Jared, who at one hundred and sixty-two years begat Enoch, who at sixty five begat Methuselah, who, having a good long time before him, led a quiet bachelor life, and at one hundred and eighty-seven years begat Lamech, who at a hundred and eighty-two years begat Noah, who after leading a celibate life for five hundred years begat Shem, Ham, and Japheth. When they had become men the flood took place, and they all took the remarkable cruise described in the eighth chapter of Genesis.

This damp affair, according to Bible chronology, took place 2,349 years before the Christian era, so by adding to the sum the 1,556 between the time Adam was created till the time of Noah's sons, adding thirty years for them to grow up, and seven years for the necessary periods of gestation of the nine generations between Adam and Shem, and these, added to the 1,882 years of the Christian era, and we hav the sum total of 5,824 years, and seven days, since the beginning. If Bible language has any meaning at all that is the period since the creation, and it is hard to see how Mr. Whitehead is to escape from it. If a day means a day, and a year means a year, no other conclusion can be arrived at.

If, then, proofs are found that the earth is older than the 5,824 years which the Bible calls for, the claims of that book are entirely at fault, and are of no value. It so turns out that these proofs are abundant. There are the strongest proofs that the earth is millions of years old, and that man has lived not less than fifty thousand years. These proofs were alluded to in our former replies, and as they hav not been set aside by our friend, it is not necessary to repeat them. In the state in which Mr. Whitehead livs (Pennsylvania) there are thousands of proofs that the earth has existed far more than six thousand years. Her immense strata of coal, the result of a rank vegetable growth, which must hav taken place long before man appeared in the world, and these strata in many places being covered hundreds of feet in depth, showing that immense changes in the earth's surface took place long ago; this, with the fossils in the strata of rock, the effects of the glacial period, which was before the era of man, are conclusiv as to the vast antiquity. There are millions of proofs of the earth's great age, but they need not be enumerated.

It will not answer for believers in the Bible story to claim that by the days mentioned in Genesis eras of millions of years were meant, for the language will admit of no such construction. The person who wrote that account meant a day, with a morning and evening—a day of twenty-four hours, and nothing more was meant. If it meant millions of years, then the first Sabbath must hav lasted millions of years, for that day was of the same length with the other six, and Adam must hav been millions of years older than Eve, for in the second chapter of Genesis Adam is said to hav been created before the animal kingdom was created. God made the garden, and Adam named the animals as they passed in review before him before Eve was created. Thus it is seen if the days of creation are claimed to mean millions of years the extremely awkward predicament arises that God must not only hav remained idle in a state of rest for millions of years, but Adam must hav lived the same great length of time before his rib was taken out and a woman made of it. So which ever horn of the dilemma is taken, the result is disastrous to Christian claims. But so great is the credulity of some people that they can believe it was either way, or both ways if necessary.

Our friend says some very disparaging things of geology, and quotes a defender of theology to show that the former is a failure and that its advocates are greatly at variance. This appears unjust. In the earlier days of geology, when its teachings first attracted attention, it is not strange if different theories were held as to the age of the world, its former state, the condition of the interior of the globe, the era of man, etc., but it is beyond all dispute one of the most grand, instructiv, and reliable of scienes, and of a thousand times more value than all the theological claims of supernaturalism that priests and Bible writers hav set up.

Our friend asks what geology teaches that the Bible story does not teach. The reply is easy: Geology teaches that the earth was once a fused fluid mass of rocks and minerals, and that upon the cooling, congealing, and crystallizing of the surface, varlous strata of rocks hav been formed; that these strata are divided into four general divisions, and again subdivided into lesser portions, and between the formation of the different strata immense periods of time must hav elapsed. The Bible has not a word of this.

Geology teaches that great numbers of volcanoes hav existed in many countries of the globe. All Europe was once volcanic, and living volcanoes still exist in Iceland in the north, and in Italy and Sicily in the south, Asia was also largely volcanic. Java has forty-five volcanoes, many of which are still activ. Sumatra and many other islands of the Indian Archipelago hav had almost countless volcanoes, and many still exist. Japan has a score or two, some extinct and some alive, one of them forming an independent mountain thirteen thousand feet in hight, disconnected with mountain ranges and rising like a pyramid, or cone, from the surrounding plains. Our own continent has greatly abounded in volcanoes. From the southern part of South America to the northern part of North America a range of volcanoes once existed, some of them, like Teneriffe, forming mountains twelve thousand feet in length. West of the Rocky Mountains are abundant proofs of extinct volcanoes—4,000 square miles of trap rock once in a melted state are found there. The Sandwich Islands and the islands of the Pacific hav had many volcanoes. Volcanoes hav burst up far below the deep waters of the ocean, and in time hav formed high mountains. In our own part of America are many proofs of former volcanoes and melted rocks. Geology teaches all this, while the Bible is as mum as the grave upon the entire subject.

Geology thus teaches that the earth must once hav been a fused mass of molten rocks and minerals. The numerous volcanoes, only a few of which hav been named, and which once existed in nearly all parts of the earth, the great number of hot springs in various portions of the earth, the fact that as we descend in mines and excavations the heat increases one degree of Fahrenheit every fifty descended, all prove that the interior of the earth must still be highly heated; and the same is made more than certain by the rivers of lava which still, at intervals, are poured out from the bowels of the earth. But the Bible has not a word of all these important and incontestable truths.

Geology teaches that the rocks forming the crust of the earth are of two classes—the igneous and the aqueous; the first are brought to the condition in which they are found by the action of fire; the second by water. A very large portion of the rocks of the earth, including trap, basalt (cooled lava), etc., are of the former class, while perhaps a larger portion of the earth's rocks were formed by deposits made in water, the same being formed in layers or strata not found in the igneous rocks, and which, in process of long epochs, became hard rock. That these rocks were once in a soft, plastic state, is proved by the thousands of impressions found in the same made by the feet of animals, and also great numbers of fossils of animals, reptils, insects, worms, limbs, leaves, etc., are found in these rocks, great numbers of which forms of life hav not existed on the earth for thousands of years. All this geology emphatically and unmistakably teaches, but the Bible story has not the first word upon the subject.

Geology teaches that very long periods of time must hav elapsed between the formations of the different strata of rocks from the lower to the higher; that in the lower rocks of earlier periods, called the Eozoic, are found very few forms of life, and hence is called "The Period of the Dawn of Life." The next division or formation, called the Paleozoic, divided into the Cambrian, or Primordial, the Siluro-Cambrian, the Silurian, Devonian, Carboniferous, and Permian periods, is called "The Period of Ancient Life." The next ascending division, the Mesozoic, subdivided into the Triassic, the Jurassic, and the Cretaceous periods, is called "The Middle Period of Life." The Upper grand division, the Neozoic, subdivided again into the Eocene, the Miocene, the Pliocene, and Post-Pliocene, is called "The Recent Period of Life." Geology teaches that these four grand divisions of time in the earth's existence must hav been incalculable ages apart; but the Bible has nothing at all of it.

Geology teaches how small marine insects called polyps, and which exist in countless numbers in tropical seas, by the secretion of carbonate of lime, build up vast masses of what is termed coral, the same often being found upon volcanic cones beneath the waters of the ocean, and covering areas of many square miles in extent and rising a few feet above the surface of the ocean. Hundreds of these coral islands are known to exist, besides large reefs which utterly preclude the passage of vessels. There is an almost endless variety of these formations, many being as beautiful as the most intricate vegetable growths, including elaborate flowers; but the Bible says nothing of this, simply because the writers knew nothing of it.

Geology teaches of the carboniferous era, when in a vastly distant age of the world the great and extensiv strata of coal found in many countries was produced by a wonderful growth of the coal plant, and which, by the action of water and other forces of nature, was gathered into strata and covered with earth and rock. But the Bible has not a word to say about coal, nor petroleum, nor any of its products.

Geology, in its teachings of the order in which animal life came into existence, differs materially from the Bible account. The latter says the aquatic animals were created on the fifth day, and of course did not exist before that time, that the birds of the air were created on the same day, and these before the reptils and creeping things of the earth. Geology teaches very differently; that the remains of marine animals are found in the lowest strata of rocks, and long before birds had an existence. It also teaches that reptils and creeping things on the earth existed much earlier than birds. Here the Bible and geology decidedly clash. The discrepancy in the order of creation, given in the first and second chapters of Genesis—the first chapter stating that all forms of animal life were created before man, while in the second chapter it was directly the reverse, man being created first, and the beasts of the field before the birds of air—shows how incorrect the Bible story is. One statement must surely be wrong. Animals were either created before or after man. It could not hav been both ways.

Geology teaches that there was a time when the granite and metamorphic rocks covered the whole globe; on them the water rested, and of them the land-surface was everywhere composed; though at the present but little of this primitiv surface remains. It has been covered by sediment, carried down or worn down by the waters, and only those portions which hav not been worn away or under water, and so hav never been covered by sediment; but the Bible has nothing upon this subject.

Geology teaches that the pebbles and the gravel found in such almost endless quantity on and near the surface of the earth are disintegrated portions of rock, and in the course of ages hav been worn round and smooth by the action of water. The Bible has nothing to say of this.

Geology teaches of the glacial period, which must hav been long before the era of man, when large portions of the earth's surface must hav been covered with vast bodies of ice, which moved somewhat as glaciers do now on the elevated mountains of Switzerland, in Greenland, and other cold countries, and carried immense bodies of rock, cutting and plowing into the surface rocks of the earth, cutting grooves and furrows, and making the rocks thus carried smooth and roundish in form. In thousands of cases these large transported boulders are found at a distance of hundreds of miles from where kindred rocks exist and from where they must hav been taken. In this way, by rock-grinding and wearing away for great periods of time, together with the oxydization of rocks, soils were produced. But the Bible tells us nothing of all this.

Geology teaches that great changes hav taken place on the earth's surface. Where large bodies of dry land once existed is now covered by waters of the ocean, while in numerous other cases land, and even mountains, hav been thrown up from the sea. On some of the spurs of the Himalaya Mountains marine fossils, coral remains, sea-shells, etc., are found, which prove that those mountains were once forced up from the level of the ocean. The same proofs are found high up on other mountains, and we hav the same in our own country. Certain portions of the earth's surface hav been depressed, while other portions hav been greatly elevated. But the Bible teaches nothing of this kind.

There are many other lessons taught by geology which are not alluded to in the Bible, and which were wholly unknown to those who wrote the fragmentary books of which the Bible is composed. It is the same in the grander portions of the universe. Astronomy teaches that the sun is a million times larger than our earth, that some of our sister planets are thousands of times larger than the earth, that many of the fixed stars are immense suns and centers of other systems, and that they are vastly larger than our sun, and many of them so far away that light, which travels nearly 200,000 miles per second, requires millions of years to travel from them to us. This is additional proof that the universe has existed for inconceivable periods of time. But the writer of Genesis knew nothing of all this. He clearly did not know that the earth is round, turns daily on its axis and revolves annually round the sun. He did not even know of the Western hemisphere on which we liv. His knowledge was far less than that of a schoolboy of our time, ten years of age.

Still Mr. Whitehead insists that the very crude and imperfect story of the Bible must be taken not only as veritable history, but as the word of God. Before even the credit of history is accorded to it we should know when it was written, by whom it was written, what facilities were possessed for obtaining information, whether the writers were reliable and worthy of credit. But unfortunately we hav none of this information. We hav no knowledge as to when the book of Genesis was written nor by whom. Whoever wrote it could not hav lived till millions of years from the time of the creation he attempts to describe, but of which he clearly knew nothing. His story is not entitled to credit, and falls far, far below the dignity of "history." It is merely fable.

It is commonly ascribed to Moses as author, as are the first five books in the Bible, called the Pentateuch, but there is not an iota of proof that the claim is correct, for it is nowhere stated in the books, nor in any part of the Bible, that Moses wrote them. But there is positiv proof that he could not hav written them because they refer to events that did not occur till long after his death—for instance, of the city of Dan, and the kings of Judah. It is asking quite too much that we must believe he could write correctly of what took place thousands of years before he was born, and hundreds of years after his death, as well of his own death and burial. The greater portion of the Bible is of the same anonymous character. Nobody knows who wrote it nor when it was written, and the writers do not claim they wrote by divine aid. Yes, theology makes far too heavy demands upon our credulity. As there is no merit in believing that of which there is no proof, it is absurd to accept groundless statements as truth.

The soundest and most reliable students and critics of the Bible are of the opinion that Genesis was not written till a few centuries before our era, and that the Pentateuch is the work of different individuals. It is belived that the cosmogony of Genesis was borrowed from the Babylonians when the Jews returned from their captivity in that country. It is clearly proved by the earthen tablets found in Nineveh and Babylon, and which are now in the British Museum, that the people of those cities had such a theory of cosmogony nearly four thousand years ago. That the Jews borrowed this theory seems highly probable, and there is certainly no proof to the contrary.

The aid of inspiration in the writing of Genesis or the Pentateuch is not even claimed in those books, and there is not the slightest reason for thinking that Moses or God had anything to do with the writing of them. The story of creation and the Garden of Eden is clearly allegorical or fabulous, and was written by one who knew less about the origin of things than is known to-day. Mr. Whitehead is clearly too intelligent a man to think for a moment that they are "veritable history," or should receive any more credence than any other ancient fable, written by those who knew nothing of what they wrote.

We hav replied to but a portion of Mr. Whitehead's remarks, but will hav to defer the remainder till our next.

We wish to return thanks to the numerous kind friends who hav responded to our appeals to square up arrears. It is unpleasant to be compelled to make calls of this kind, but when friends respond so promptly our gratitude is awakened.

Dr. M. Rowe, just returned per the Inman line from a four months' tour to Europe, in company with his wife, called upon us last Sunday, and reported himself in good health and much pleased with his journey. He is a warm friend to The Truth Seeker. Long may he wave.

Friend White, an page 619, makes the inquiry whether Origen renounced Christianity in the latter part of his life. We hav the authority of Robert Taylor, in his "Diegesis," that he did, and he says an account of the same is to be found in Origen's own writings, and is confirmed in his Life in the Greek of Suidas, although Eusebius and Lardner make no mention of it. There may be some doubt upon the subject, though Mr. Taylor certainly cites very high authority.

The Liberal Age.—We hav received the first two numbers of this sprightly monthly published in Milwaukee, and it should hav been noticed earlier. It is conducted with ability, is an earnest advocate of free thought, free speech, a free press, and free mails, and is specially opposed to such ecclesiastical influences as seek to interfere in any way with these vital principles. This new candidate for Liberal patronage is well worthy of support, and from the low price at which it is published should receive it. Price 50 cents per year; five copies for $2.00. A Letter from Kansas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Welcome, thrice welcome home, Brother Bennett! You hav not fought with the beasts of Ephesus, St. Paul-like, but with the powers of ignorance and Christianity, the Young Men's Christian Association, Judge Benedict, Comstock, and fraudulent Rutherford B. Hayes. But you hav conquered them all with "The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times." The reception the Liberals gave you at Chickering Hall was another broadside at old ship Zion, and she lowered her flag half-mast when the Liberals commissioned you to circumnavigate our mundane sphere. With your descriptiv powers you make lasting impressions on the minds of your readers. I regret to think that the Liberals neglected to make the necessary arrangements for you to hav extended your travels into other parts of the Old World, to hav given us the customs, habits, and religions of those peoples, as well as those you visited. Your letters on Occultism in India open up new avenues of thought on physical and mental science, and admonish us that with all of our progression in the different sciences, the Theosophists of the oriental world are far in advance of us in the psychological laws governing the human mind. I hav been of the opinion for a number of years that we as a people were very deficient in the powers and sphere of the human mind. And will not the science of Occultism help explain the mysterious phenomena of Spiritualism which hav baffled the wisdom of some of our most profound thinkers, and the searching skill of our astute scientists, and which, combined with the other orders of Liberalism, are undermining the whole superstructure of Christianity, and are causing her to seek refuge in the pretense of harmonizing science with the Bible? There is an undercurrent of Liberalism here in Burlington that dares not speak out for fear of the church. This is the case with all business men, office-seekers, and office-holders. This policy is owing to the fact that this class of Liberals do not read sufficient to understand the numbers there are in the country that do not believe in Christianity.

We hav here in Burlington, with a population of about three thousand, eight church houses of different denominations—Catholic, Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, Christian, and colored Baptist. In round numbers their membership will not exceed six hundred—about one-fifth of the population. I think that about the ratio of church membership throughout the country, and I am satisfied in my mind that if all Liberals would withdraw their influence and money from the support of the church, it would soon be numbered with the institutions that were. I believe that the Liberals outnumber the church-members two to one.

I will write a verse that I think givs my views of the money question:

> Money is the god of civilized life,
> The cause of wars and civil strife;
> Worshiped by priest, and king, and slave,
> Adored by sinner, saint, and knave.

I hav often thought of the prediction of the late Henry Wilson, while making a tour of observation through the Southern states in about the year 1868 (his letters published in the New York Tribune), to view the ravages that the late war had caused. In one of his letters he writes, "The curse of African slavery is obliterated from our national government; the next enemy that our country will hav to contend with will be combined monopolies." And anyone that will giv the question a careful investigation will be convinced that the late vice-president was a true prophet, for the monster, monopoly, has developed nearly to full proportions It has captured many of our state governments, has nearly taken in the federal government, and is devouring our manufacturies and public lands. To sum it up in a small compass, I will make this prediction, that in a few years we will hav one of the largest land aristocracies in the world. It is estimated that we hav four billion dollars' worth of railroad property in the United States, and seven railroad magnates control three billion of it. President Jackson, in his veto message against re-chartering the old United States Bank, in 1834, claimed that a capital stock of twenty-eight millions of a bank monopoly was dangerous to our institutions, for they were granted exclusiv privileges at the expense of the people. If twenty-eight millions is dangerous, what of our present national banking monopoly, with a capital stock of three hundred and fifty millions of untaxable United States bonds, drawing from three to six per cent interest, paid by the industries of our country? And I consider that the destruction of the greenbacks and fractional currency by the Republican party, and creating them into a bonded debt, one of the most accursed outrages that ever was perpetrated on the American people. The greenbacks are claimed to be a part of the national debt by national bank advocates. If so, who are we in debt to for them? I hav pressed the question in that form, and the answer given is, To the government. Then the question arises, Who are the government? Answer, The people. Then we owe them to ourselvs, and are no debtors. They were created as a war measure, and they were an important factor in saving the country from desolation, and now the Shylocks hav taught the people to say that they are not money and worthless and not fit to be used in time of peace!

I fear this article is already beyond limits, but bear with me while I giv you a few items on prohibition in Kansas. There is quite a difference of opinion in regard to the execution and the effects of the prohibitory law. I cannot say that it is a success or a failure here, where I am acquainted with its effects. It is claimed by those who profess to know, and perhaps with some truth, that there has been as much liquor drank here in Burlington during the fifteen months since prohibition took effect as there was under the dramshop law for that length of time prior to May, 1881, when prohibition became the law of the state, and what is true here is true in other parts of the state. Instead of liquors being sold by licensed saloons, beer is shipped in by express by the case (two dozen bottles in the case), and bottles of beer packed in dry barrels as glassware, and other liquors are shipped by express and as freight. And my opinion is that when the people hav the appetite for strong drink they will hav it some way, and there will be others to sell to them and defy the law. For we should remember that adults are children of larger growth, and we all know by experience that when we wish to restrain a child by force from wrong habits, it has a tendency to create in them a desire to persist in their waywardness.

There is but one way to make the question a success, and that is by education, and not by the force of law. The lawyers and the officials whose duty it is to execute the prohibition act are making a rich harvest. The evil effects arising in the execution of the law is that the witnesses on the stand and jurors in the box are charged with perjury by the losing party on either side. I do not vouch for the truthfulness of the charges, but it would not be strange if they did prevaricate when we take into consideration that one of the highest tribunals ever conveped in our country in 1877, composed of judges and statesmen to agitate the case of Hayes vs. Tilden as to their claims to their being president, each and every one of them voted according to their political convictions. I came to Burlington in 1871, a radical prohibitionist; but by careful observation and reflection on the question, I am now a conservativ. I do not believe that all liquor dealers are murderers and thieves, as they are denounced by radical temperance people. I find honest, upright men among them; as in all classes of society, they engage in the traffic for the money there is in it.

If The Truth Seeker will giv me space at some future time, I will giv my views how to solve the question. But this is an inexhaustible subject, and I must leave it.

Wheat in this section is harvested, and considerable of it threshed, and report says it will average here in Coffey county twenty-three bushels per acre. Potatoes and corn promis an abundant yield. Fruit of all kinds promises us a good supply. Taking all things into consideration, the people of Kansas hav reason to feel grateful to the farmer and weather that we hav a good supply of cereals, vegetables, fruit and hay.

In conclusion, we repeat, we welcome you back to our common country with your pen, which is more powerful than the sword. Chris. Brown.

Making it Warm for Winter.

BRAIN WAVES VS. SPIRIT COMMUNICATION.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav been somewhat amused at one of your correspondents, Mr. T. Winter, who has such a summary way of answering his opponents in arguments. He assumes that there can be nothing which he cannot taste, feel, see, etc., and that the highest form of any matter must come within his grasp. He seems to hav arrived at the conclusion that the highest form of matter is brain, at all events, brains seem to be his hobby, and brains are his conception of the highest conditions of matter. When he learns, or acknowledges if he knows, that there are many kinds or forms of matter that he cannot grasp by the ordinary use of his sensations, he will be in a fit frame of mind to learn something about what "spooks" are made of, and he will find that they are not devoid of matter either. The misfortune of such minds is that they are too grossly material, if I may use the expression, to candidly weigh any evidence that goes to establish a future life, or the true life of this organism we inhabit; for in spite of all external reasoning and contention, the consciousness of animal life is something more than organization, and the brain of man is as much an organ, and but an organ, as any other portion of his body.

The most absurd theories are from time to time invented to account for those manifestations claimed to be spiritual. The latest is called "brain waves." A short time ago a family residing in England, and having a brother in the army at Alexandria, heard one day the words, "Mother, mother, mother," three distinct times, spoken aloud in their home, and supposing it to mean a death notice, went to the publication and telegraph office to find out whether any dispatches or news had arrived that day from Egypt. They were informed that none had arrived, but were anxiously awaited. In the course of the afternoon they came, and it was also stated in them that this brother, on patrol duty in Alexandria, had been shot that day, and corresponding to about the time (making due calculation for locality) that these words were heard by the family.

Now, the class of minds of the T. Winter stamp are ready to acknowledge any absurd theory to account for this and similar things, rather than to candidly investigate them and see what bearing they hav upon a future life.

Now, to be a little critical, suppose a brain wave could take place to make an effect upon another brain for a thousand miles, to what attenuation must the wave be reduced at such a distance! Then by what manner of means could a brain wave speak the name of "mother" three distinct times! If this theory is not a thousand times more absurd and impossible than any spook story, I would like to hear something to equal it.

A friend of mine went to Philadelphia about a year ago, and by a mere accident called upon a medium whom she had never before met; she was quite alone. This person began describing her brother John, sisters, and friends in the spirit world, and finally said, "Your spirit sister Helen is here, and wants you to do her a favor. Before her last sickness she went shopping one day and called upon a Mr. ———, a merchant, and bought some articles amounting to $1.60, and she bought also from another merchant, Mr. ——— (giving the full names in each case) a little bill of $1.20. Please go there when you return home and pay those small bills for me, and I will ever befriend and love you." Now, here was a fact to be tested, and on getting home she went to these merchants and found it to be just as stated, $1.20 and $1.60, and she paid these bills. Here are facts that bear no corelation except on the ground of an outside intelligence, for there was nothing in the mind of the inquirer to giv any clue to the medium if she had been a clairvoyant.

Mr. Winter says that "Materialists cannot be satisfied with anything short of proof," but the misfortune is there are no proofs can reach such minds. They do not seem to be able to comprehend a plain solution, but are quite ready to assume and invent all sorts of nonsense instead, and the cry is still, "Proof, proof!" You might as well try to demonstrate an abstruse mathematical problem to a booby as to attempt to convince such minds of the truths of immortal life. They hav neither patience, honesty, or brains enough to comprehend an argument on the subject, and as the future can get along without them, and as there is no hurry nor necessity to hav them investigate or believe in a future life, the better way is to let them alone to enjoy their absurdities as they please. In fact, the world is so full of evidence of an outside intelligence that is outside of the medium, that ponderable objects are being conveyed about from place to place, and that these movements are taking place in daylight, and are conveying an intelligence which is beyond dispute, that it sounds refreshingly ignorant to hear our extra substantial Materialists shouting for proof of immortality. Why, gentlemen, we hav been rapping, rapping, and rapping at your shallow theories and obfuscated brains for thirty years, and with all your profundity of intellect you hav failed to account for one tiny rap, or the intelligence these raps convey. I challenge Mr. T. Winter and the whole school of material thinkers to make or explain one rap. Prof. Sunderland and all the rest are deceiving themselvs when they think they hav solved this nineteenth century wonder.

It is a noticeable fact in the Freethinker movement that fully two-thirds of all the persons it embraces are Spiritualists, or hav strong leanings that way. In fact, when they hav followed up their investigations sufficiently they invariably land in that camp, and when Spiritualists hav acquired sufficient backbone and strength to unceremoniously kick out, with less show of charity, all the pretenders and mountebanks that want to make a living by deceiving their fellows, it will become the universal faith of the world, the fires of hell will become extinguished, and a pure, natural, scientific religion established, free from the festering dogmatic sins of the past, and its priesthood.

Time and again hav such persons as Mr. Winter in The Truth Seeker classed Spiritualism with superstitions, to be routed and put down, while in fact there is no superstition connected with it. It is the only reasonable solution of the phenomena that are before us, and is gaining more converts than any other movement of this day. In fact, one well attested fact, such as there is an abundance of, is better than a thousand negations of the uneducated and ignorant, who, while they cry for light, more light, are actually unable to see the noonday sun of this age as it sheds its luster of immortality upon us, and are holding a heavy screen before their mental vision. They cannot see if they desired to do so.

Now when these philosophers hav disposed of the little things, we will "trot out the larger spooks" for their inspection and consternation, and they will find they did not know it all afterward. What the world wants is truth, and we want to be seekers of truth, no matter in what department of life we find it.

Yours for honest and fair investigation,

J. R. PERRY.

Wilkesbarre, Pa., Sept. 16, 1882.

A SORT OF CHALLENGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your paper of the 16th inst. I notice in T. Winter's criticism on Mr. Hale's article these sayings: "All statements without proof are worthless. Materialists cannot be satisfied with anything short of proof." If T. Winter or any of his friends will prove by demonstrations to my senses that man does not liv as an individual man after he leaves the physical body, I will pay as much or offer as great a reward as is offered for the spook of old Nero with his fiddle and bow. It is time that wisdom like Mr. Winter's should demonstrate what it claims to believe.

Alleghany City, Pa. MRS. A. H. COLBY.

LET HIM READ THIS AND REFORM.

"Pity persons hav not got sense enough to write a few plain and sensible words with a clear mind if they desire to benefit others." So thought I when I had read Mr. Winter's criticism of Mr. Hale in No. 37 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I wondered how a man who professes to be a Liberal could be so dogmatical. His whole article, instead of being a criticism, is mere balderdash "stretched out for egotistical effect."

He stretches up on tiptoe and seems to use all his strength in his effort to make his mud-balls strike the "Spiritualistic cranks."

"No doubt, plenty of brain is a nice thing to hav," but the way some "hard-headed Materialists" talk causes me to think of the old darkey woman, quarreling with one of her own sex and color, who said, "You ain't got no brains nohow—nuffin but a little dirty water in your head."

"Get their brains scooped out" is good; but as it is Mr. Winter and the "hard-headed Materialists" who want the test, suppose he or some of the "hard-headed Materialists" scoop out his or their brains and giv the thing a test.

I do not claim to be a Spiritualist, though perhaps I lean that way, but I hav many friends who are what Mr. Winter is pleased to term "Spiritualistic cranks," and knowing them to be intelligent, truthful, just, and kind, I naturally feel a little indignation when I hear such an epithet applied to them.

Now I am eager for the truth. The Spiritualists tell me that "the spirit livs and death does not end all," and that they are convinced and can giv me proofs if I choose to investigate. The Materialists tell me that death ends all; now can Mr. Winter prove to me that there is no spiritual existence after death? Spiritualists hav thousands of well-authenticated facts to bring forward in proof of their belief. There are many things that cannot be accounted for except through Spiritualism. I say this from my own experience, having once lived in a haunted house. Mr. Winter will probably indulge in a scornful smile at the bare mention of such a thing as a haunted house, but neither scornful smiles nor scornful words hav ever obliterated facts.

It does appear to me to be the ne plus ultra of bigotry and egotism for a man to completely ignore the testimony of hundreds, even thousands, of honest and intelligent people. If one is not convinced in one's own mind, why giv the lie to every one of his neighbors who claims to hav seen?

"It would really be a pretty nice thing if all those immortality-mongers were in full possession of the article." Yes, it would be a "pretty nice thing" for the small minority to which Mr. Winter belongs, but I don't think it is a pretty nice thing to say, for really, you know, some people might construe the remark as emanating from a feeling of jealousy and intolerance.

"Muddled or addled pates" may be a pretty nice term to apply to all those people who disagree with one, but there is not much logic or reason in such terms

Any allusion to Spiritualism seems to intensely irritate Mr. Winter, so that he frequently presents himself before the public something after the style of a tempest in a teapot.

Why fight so bitterly against that which in our hearts (or heads, more properly) we pray (wish) for—we long, viz, a continuation of life after the death of the body? Perhaps Mr. Winter does not long for such a condition. They say there are exceptions to all rules, but I will boldly assert that it is the secret—if not openly—expressed hope and wish of ninety-nine hundredths of the human race.

What does all our education and progression amount to if we are to be in a few years mentally annihilated? We might as well eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die. Why cultivate our minds to all the higher sentiments when death will soon end all—all the longing to do good—the wish to penetrate into the mysteries beyond? I, for one, would protest against being placed here with mind to think, to feel, to love, to know, only in the end to come down to a level with beast and reptil, bird and fish. Is it not a debasing, repulsiv thought? Ah, think of the grand men and women who hav lived and died, of those who are living now, and ask yourself if it seems in accordance with grand old nature that such a thing as a human mind should die!

Better be an Agnostic, Mr. Winter, if you can't believe in Spiritualism.

WINEFORD V. ASPINWALL

Loudonville, N. Y., Sept. 19, 1882.

MR. WINTER INDORSED.

MR. EDITOR: Infidelity, to me, is a grand word, full of liberty, peace, and human happiness.

You may not believe in conversion, but I do, and for the best of reasons—I hav been converted. Robert G. Ingersoll, to my mind the grandest man of this century, and yourself did the business—converted me from superstition to the truth as it is in nature and common sense; so that from being a class-meeting Methodist of the strictest type, I hav evoluted into a full-fledged, perfect, Infidel. Henceforward for me there is no superstition, no gods, no devils, no heaven, no hell. Your correspondent, T. Winter, hits the nail on the head, and strikes the key-note of the gospel of truth, every time he writes. Like him I cannot see that there is any halting-place on the road between orthodoxy or blind faith, and absolute Atheism, or perhaps, as some would hav it, Agnosticism. I was much interested in the articles on the Slade exposure, fully believing that Spiritualism, with Barnum, is one of the world's humbugs, but could not understand whether it was definitly settled, that the Belleville man was the genuin Henry Slade or an impostor. If you hav the knowledge, and can set me right, I shall be obliged. Another question, and I am done. You appear to be so full and running over with information that, while my hand is in, I feel like improving the opportunity offered. It was stated in an article written by the editor during your absence that Origen, the famous Christian father of the second century, and the opponent of Celsus, before he died renounced Christianity and relapsed into paganism. Is this a correct statement? Judge Waite, in his masterly work, says nothing about it, and I hav seen no mention of it in any of the various works I hav read on early church history.

If you can giv me the desired information on these two points, you will confer a favor on at least one reader, and perhaps many others.

Your friend, WM. H. WHITE.

Liberals Should Look on the Bright Side.

A FEW WORDS TO A CORRESPONDENT.—NO. 2.

Our friend A. says, "Infidels seem to be aimless, without any motiv to sympathize with their co-believers." Is not this a mistake? Why do we see so many warm, sympathizing letters sent to our "co-believer" D. M. Bennett, if the writers are "aimless?" Why hav thousands of letters been sent to take him around the world, if none felt sympathy with his labors? Why hav we built Paine Hall as a home for the Investigator and place where Liberals might meet for social communion, pleasant recreation, or earnest effectiv work, if we hav no sympathy for co-believers? Why are Leagues forming and lecturers traveling and newspapers springing up all over, if we are so cold, aimless, and indifferent?

Why are we trying to kill the demon of theology and destroy the weed of superstition, if we hav no aim to improve humanity? Why, when a Liberal is Comstocked for opinion's sake, do all his "co believers" become indignant and enthused with a desire to right the wrong and foil the aim of the oppressor? As to health, I do not know that the Liberal has any more "perfect freedom to obey the natural law" than the Christian has. Should I feel a desire to hoe an hour in the garden on Sunday for exercise, would I hav perfect freedom to do so any more than has my Cambellite neighbor? Would I not be liable to a fine? Indeed, we Infidels are obliged to be even more careful not to infringe on the law than Christians are; for we are always under vigilant observation and suspicion, just as one who has once stolen is always liable to be suspected of doing so again. I think, too, that as a general thing Liberals are healthier than others, as they study better modes of dress and hygienic diet, pure air, and other disease destroyers I know I'm the only woman in Snowville who generally answers the question, "How are you, ?" by saying, "Very well." Most of them are never more than "tolerable."

As to finances, perhaps the reason why there are so few rich Liberals is because it is the reading and thinking class generally who outgrow and outstudy the myths, and their minds run more towards laying up truth than gold and silver. If it be a true rule to judge by one's self, I must say that in all my work for Liberalism I do not think I've cleared one dollar. If a little pay comes from one source, it is used for some work in another direction. To keep the ball rolling is the idea, and not to become wealthy working for truth. Our friend says "he has taken two Liberal papers for over a year, and they hav not in all that time published a dozen articles calculated to make man better or happier." Now I take those same papers, and I must say I hav been made better and happier by hundreds of articles in them. Every new idea we get makes us better and happier. Every noble aspiration we read helps to make us better. Every line of good advice is an aid to well doing. Every argument against intemperance in eating or drinking, or any other way, is a helper. Every one who sends money or sympathy to the unfortunate is a pointer that guides us to a better way. I don't believe our friend could read carefully one page of any prominent Liberal paper and not find on it some sentiment, some word of advice, or some suggestion which is "calculated to make man better or happier." If he can, I am sure I cannot. Here is a sentiment I just clipped from THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"For benefits return benefits; for injuries return justice without any admixture of revenge.—Confucius."

Would it not make us all better and happier were we just and yet never revengeful?

"A bitter warfare against Christianity seems to be the one idea that possesses the Infidel press," is the next complaint. Well, if we wished to kill rum and tobacco with papers, would we not fill them with this one idea? Would we not giv all the testimony we could collect to prove them injurious to mind, morals, and physical health? And is not this just what Liberal papers do as regards their mission of destroying error and establishing truth?

"The future, which is hid from view,
Is full of hope if men prove true
And follow reason's call;
For then is progress sure to prove
That peace and plenty, joy and love,
Will be the lot of all.
—Truth Seeker Collection.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Bible Morality in the Town of Webster.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: One of the most priestridden towns in the state of New York is the town of Webster, in Monroe county. With a population of about three thousand, they hav a dozen churches and about the same number of clergymen, who are hired to do the thinking for the inhabitants and preach the infamous doctrin of hell-fire, in all its pristine cussedness, to their orthodox hearers. As a natural result, Solomon, with a thousand women, is considered the author of much scriptural wisdom and morality; David, the keeper of concubines, the destroyer of all domestic felicity, whose hands were red with innocent blood, is considered "a man after God's own heart," and the polluting rottenness of the Bible is accepted as the divinely-inspired word of God, which we must all believe or be damned.

These foul records of scripture hav been recently illustrated by some of the lambs of the flock in said town, which has caused no little scandal. One of the most deluded of the good Methodist brothers began to rejoice at the prospectiv addition to his family, but his good Christian wife said, "Nay, do not rejoice, for, like the Virgin Mary, I hav been overshadowed, and it is not your child." The parties involved do not charge it to God, as the Virgin Mary did, but one of the good orthodox brethren acknowledges himself guilty of the overshadowing during the absence of her husband, and the letters of resignation are now pouring into that good Methodist church.

These revelations hav caused some to begin to think for themselvs in this vicinity. Some even think that good old Solomon should hav been satisfied with 999 women—that to make it an even 1,000 was a little off, and that good old father Abraham, of scripture fame, should not hav destroyed the virtue of his maid-servants; in a word, that the Bible records of murder, slavery, polygamy, and falsehood among God's chosen (too obscene for decent publication) is an inspiration of wickedness and shame unworthy of our respect.

The erring brother in Webster was not as depraved as David, for David murdered Uriah after he had ruined his wife; nor was his act worse than that of the orthodox God when he is said to hav destroyed the virtue of Joseph's wife to produce an illegitimate son, in the seed also of the monster David, yet the church and clergy unite in declaring this book, the Bible, the most sublime code of morals ever given to the world.

We hav no desire to deny that many excellent people are still connected with the orthodox church. They are better than their faith. Their deeds are better than their creeds. Their faith is the result of early training and orthodox influences. The masses are beginning to discover that all the hell we need to fear is the poverty, iguorance, vice, and superstition of this world.

The Bible and its teachings are the products of a barbarous age, and are fast giving way to the spirit of advancing thought and scientific inquiry, which hav made possible the grand achievements of modern times. GEO. W. TURRELL.

West Webster, N. Y., Sept. 10, 1882.

IN this land of freedom no particular religious faith is recognized. Why should ancient forms of religion and of superstition be insisted upon? While liberal laws have been enacted which permit a person to be affirmed or to swear in the presence of the Everliving God without making use of the gospels if he so desires, what benefits can accrue from maintaining a practice which shocks the sensibilities of one class of the community and excites the derision of another? Why would it not be sufficient if the laws provided ample penalties against all who should giv false evidence upon the witness-stand, and that the clerk of the court should distinctly state to each witness at the commencement of his examination what those penalties were?—Judge E. A. Thomas: Oaths in Legal Proceedings. N. A. Review.

Letters from Friends.

MONTPELIER, OHIO, Sept. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find post-office order for $10, for which you will please giv me credit. Thus I pay more in advance than I hav been in arrears. Yours truly, I. M. SNYDER.

BRONSON, MICH., Sept, 15, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to learn of your proposed trip around "Free America," and had thought of suggesting it, but didn't want to "crowd the mourners," and sometimes wonder if you ever rest.

Yours, FRANCIS RUGGLES.

MANSFIELD CENTER, Sept. 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Excuse me, I am one of the kind that are going to do big things but never get at it. "All is well that ends well." Here is $10 for the support of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours forever,

J. S. MACFARLANE.

HANSON STATION, KY., Sept. 10, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: You will find herein $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would send more, but I am old and don't know how long I will need it. I voted for General Jackson in 1828, and still vote the Democratic ticket.

Ever your friend and well-wisher, D. HAYNES.

FORRESTON, ILL., Sept. 18, 1882.

BROTHER BENNETT: I hope I hav been the worst patron you hav had. Money has been scarce with me, and I am very thankful to you for bearing with me as long as you hav. I am much pleased with the paper, and would rather be deprived of almost anything than it. Very respectfully, C. E. NICODEMUS.

MONMOUTH, ILL., Sept. 17, 1882.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: We are glad you are safely at anchor in THE TRUTH SEEKER harbor, and hav been delighted with your letters while on your journey round this little globe, upon which so much ado has been made about its Creator having so much to do in peopling and taking care of it.

Yours truly, S. W. SMITH.

LEESBURG, OHIO, Sept. 20, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I never was so glad in my life as when I read of your safe arrival home. I am not much on the mutual admiration business, but permit me to say to you that I think you hav done more to enlighten the world than any man that has ever lived in it. That is saying a good deal, but I think it is true nevertheless, Voltaire did much, Paine did much, but neither of them made the voyage of the world. Yours, H. R. JOHNSON.

FARMER CITY, ILL., Sept. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Your appeal of Sept. 20th, reminding me of my carelessness in not remitting what I owe you, is just received, and I hasten to comply with your request by mailing you a draft for $3, which will pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER until Jan. 1, 1883. I hav taken your paper from the publication of the first number in Paris, Ill., and hav no notion of stopping as long as you continue to publish it in advocacy of truth and in opposition to error.

Yours truly, O. J. SMITH.

DAVIS, LA., Aug. 26, 282.

MR. EDITOR: I am very glad indeed that you hav finished your long journey. I congratulate you upon your reception at San Francisco, and along the line of your travel home. These Liberals hav acted grandly. What an ovation to the convict! What a stinging rebuke to Comstock, Hayes, Benedict, & Co.! I hope that Brother Macdonald will accept my congratulations and my thanks for the very able manner that he conducted the paper while you were away. Yours fraternally, W. V. TAYLOR, M.D.

SAUNDERSVILLE, MASS., Sept. 17, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Your appeal to me for what is justly your due is not without avail. I am in urgent need of the gospel of truth (not faith), for which I am most willing to pay, and I hope you will excuse and forgiv me for not remitting sooner. THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav received regularly up to date, for which I am greatly obliged. If it should happen that I should ever get in arrears again send along another bombshell and I will rebound it with the price postpaid. I inclose $3 to pay up to February, 1883.

Respectfully yours, N. L. RANDALL.

YPSILANTI, MICH., Sept. 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: You don't know how many glad hearts your arrival home again has made in these United States, but they are thousands. I should hav remitted promptly, but did not know whether we would go North, East, South, or West, nor do we yet know. However, send the paper till it is time to renew, and then if you do not hear from us you will stop my paper and conjecture I have passed in my checks or removed to parts beyond the reach of the best bible we ever had the happiness of reading, to wit, THE TRUTH SEEKER. We shall ever esteem you one of the greatest giants of this era. Yours truly,

J. W. BABBITT, M.D.

SEATTLE, W. T., Aug. 28, 1882.

MR EDITOR: I hav just had the pleasure of reading H. W. Beecher's sermon on the progression of thought in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I feel like expressing thankful congratulations to you and all the great and lesser thinking minds who hav been brave enough to express in public, by the press, in the lecture field, and in private conversation, the great Freethought question in all its bearings, until it has become possible for a preacher of Henry Ward Beecher's world-wide reputation and vast ability to dare to preach such a sermon as that from a pulpit dedicated to an orthodox god. L. E. HALL.

CHAMBERLAIN, D. T., Sept. 14, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is with deep regret that I hav delayed paying for your paper. I hav been hard pushed to raise money, even so little. But I cannot afford to do without THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I cannot afford to read it without paying for it. Inclosed find $2 to pay up to January, and I will before that time renew for another year.

I would congratulate you if you needed it. The truth seekers hav done it manfully. I am over seventy years old, but hope to liv two or three more to see Christianity reeling under your heavy blows.

Yours truly, CALVIN GRISWOLD.

CLINTON ILL., Sept. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5—three of which is to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year, $1.50 for the fourth volume of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and fifty cents to help pay the postage on the same, and I hope many Liberals will do likewise.

Allow me to congratulate you on your safe return to home and friends. I am of the opinion that Christianity has received a telling blow and Liberalism has been much advanced by your trip around the world. And so may it ever be, is the prayer of,

Yours respectfully, G. W. CROWDEN.

WESTVALE, MASS., Sept. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, to be credited to me on THE TRUTH SEEKER account, and please excuse me for withholding what is your just due, and I will try and be more prompt in the future, as I intend to take the paper as long as I liv if I hav to go without one meal a day, for I feel that I owe that much to you for what you hav done for the liberation of bondaged slaves. I am happy for your safe return to wife and friends. I do hope to see you once more and take you by the hand, and my husband hopes to some day hav the honor of looking on your face. We wish you many years of health and happiness. Yours respectfully, A. P. JOYCE.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept. 18, 1882.

FRIEND BENNETT: Your notice of my delinquency in not paying my subscription came duly to hand, and inclosed you will please find the amount due you. I am truly sorry that I should cause you the trouble and expense to notify me, and I shall try hereafter to be promptly on time, as I think all the patrons of your paper and lovers of truth should faithfully sustain it and its noble editor and champion of Freethought. And now, in conclusion, I congratlate you on your safe return home. I hav followed you every step on your journey with a great deal of interest and pleasure. I hav loaned your letters to a good many persons, who were highly pleased with them; and one person told me your splendid lecture, delivered in Ceylon, had made a convert of him. May you liv many happy years and make many converts to the religion of humanity! Yours truly,

S. H. BROWN.

WEST BELLVILLE, ILL., Sept. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: My subscription has expired. Find inclosed $3.00 for another year. The good reading it contains is worth more than the subscription price. It is a cheap paper, a fearless defender of human liberties, an heroic advocate of truth, a brave soldier in the great army of justice, a gun in the fort of Freethought, a terror to the opponents of reason, truth, liberty, and the right to think and expression of honest thought. It is a chief, a champion, a leader on the broad field of human rights. While the murderer of Bruno and Servetus, the haters of light and liberty, the admirers of Moses and Isaiah, the builders of the Inquisition, the leaders of religious wars, the slanderers of Paine, Bennett, and Ingersoll, the men who would hav Bibles in our schools, their unknown, unknowable God in our Constitution to control our affairs, while they are forgotten, their deeds abhorred, THE TRUTH SEEKER will liv and flourish. Yours for the whole world's liberty,

WM. T. BECK.

ATALISSA, IOWA, Sept. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I received your kind notice stating my financial standing, which I will settle without delay, and think it is high time on my part to square up the account, which is $3 up to the end of this year. It is negligence on my part, not paying sooner than this, and I will try to remember that you would like to hav pay-day come as well as the rest of us. Inclosed please find the amount due you for the present year, with no ill feeling toward you or your paper, for I must confess that it was THE TRUTH SEEKER tnat made me a Liberal to-day, though from my boyhood up I hated the idea of hell, but did not know exactly how to handle the subject. I once came pretty near being a Methodist; when I happened to get hold of one of your papers, then it was that my eyes were opened. I began to see the dawn of reason come to me, and now I am converted, not as my friends wished me to be, but according to my own humble judgment and what little reasoning powers I hav, and with the aid of THE TRUTH SEEKER I became satisfied that no one need be afraid of hell, god, or devil, or of Methodist preachers.

Yours truly, JACOB VAUBLE.

GIRARD COLLEGE.—HAS IT BEEN STOLEN BY THE ORTHODOX CHURCH?

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Sept. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am pleased to notice that the Investigator has taken this matter up for consideration. At the Watkins Freethinkers' Convention a committee of legal gentlemen should hav been appointed to investigate the subject. I hope such a committee will be appointed at the National Liberal League Congress, soon to be held in St. Louis. And, Mr. Editor, if you will allow me I will now nominate that committee, viz., Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Washington; Hon. Thaddeus B. Wakemann, New York, and Judge C. B. Waite, of Chicago. These gentlemen are all able lawyers, honest men, and distinguished Freethinkers. Let them be requested to fully examin the subject and then make their report. And if Mr. Girard's will is not being carried out in good faith, let steps be taken to correct the injustice.

Yours truly, H. L. GREEN.

LONGMONT, COL., Sept. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been behind in my subscription since commencement of year, for which I am ashamed. Will make amends by paying for two years now, also for the fourth volume of your travels. Therefore please find money order for $7.50; 6 00 on subscription, and $1.50 on said fourth volume.

In case you decide to make the tour of our country, which we hope you will, you may count on my advance cash for said volume.

We hav received the two first volumes of your travels, and value it more than any books of travels we hav ever seen; but I must say I do not like the style of "Chronicles" from the land of "Yahweh." I prefer straight, common-sense English in mine; but we cannot all be suited in these matters. If I can find some one to take these books, we will send for those leather bound.

With kindest regards to yourself, Mrs. Bennett, and Mr. Macdonald, I remain your friend,

M. H. COFFIN.

JACKSONVILLE, FLA., Sept. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to ask, through your valuable paper, W. M. Whitehead what advantage it is to any one in believing in the Christian religion? Does he prefer prayer for work, war instead of reasoning, stupidity for knowledge? If he does, he is a Christian and not an Infidel.

Had it not been for Infidelity there would hav been little accomplished. The man that follows the pursuit of electricity, or any other occupation, instead of Christian religion, finds more pleasure worth living for.

Religion means slavery, obedience to priest and king. Liberalism sets man free and self-ruling and shows him by being his own master how much better it is.

Let me ask what Christianity has done for the world. Why, it tells man to pray instead of to work in order to gain knowledge, wealth, and health, and this is all it ever did. Why should we Infidels place any confidence in it?

Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Respectfully, AUGUST BUESING.

GREENE, MICH., Sept. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: If all Liberals would do by you as I do, you might be spared the trouble of making mistakes and the embarrassment arising from the wrongs of others. I regret very much that you hav occasion to dun anyone. It does seem to me that people ought to realize how hard you hav worked to make the best Liberal paper in this country, and how well you hav succeeded. And my opinion is that every Liberal who does not pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER in advance should feel ashamed of himself, and should at once pay up and also buy books enough of you to giv you one dollar net profit. I always pay for my papers in advance, and if the time comes when I can't, I shall say, Stop till I can pay. And I am forced to think that some others would do well to go and do likewise.

In view of your many trials and vexations I want to make a suggestion to each and every one who signed the petition for your pardon when you were in prison, to buy of you, in the course of the year 283. books to such amount that you realize one dollar net profit, and thus provide themselvs with good reading, and giv you the means to insure yourself against financial difficulties.

I was sorry when you started on your long journey around the world, for I thought you might not be able to swing around the circle, but now that you hav performed the task I am glad you went. You hav learned a great deal that you never could hav acquired at home. Yours truly, A. HUNT.

GARDEN GROVE, CAL., Sept. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I read in your paper that you contemplate an excursion over the United States. I hav long wished you would travel in our own country, and giv us the scenes and customs of different localities. I am anxious to see this Chinese question ventilated properly. No greater curse ever fell upon any enterprising people than this Chinese one. The white laborer is practically driven out, and the small farmers are gradually leaving their homes in this part of the state. Large farmers employ Chinese, and at low wages, and poor white men with families cannot pay interest (in many case) to say nothing of principal, on the small farms they hav purchased for a home. I hav been here seven years, and I hav had short time to admire the beauties of this southern California, yet I would not exchange locations with anyone east of the Rocky Mountains, even if I had to work out by the day at Chinese wages.

You may rely on my subscription to your books of travel in the United States, whatever they are. This is the third year of your paper in my house, and it is appreciated by all who read it. J. S. DEMING.

CROSSWICKS, N. J., Sept. 8, 1882.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Since thee came home it has been our intention to drop thee a line and to offer thee our most earnest and hearty congratulations on thy safe arrival home to thy family, friends, and country after the long and perilous journey round the world. No doubt but that thee most thoroughly enjoyed it with all the attendants of fatigue and annoyance that accompany inevitably such a long journey. We hope thy health is so established and renewed that many years are added to thy life. May thee liv to see a hundred years if thee continue in health to enjoy this life and this beautiful and bountiful world, and continue thy efforts in the future in the cause of Liberalism and breaking and clearing the ruins and superstitions that continue to exist at the present time!

The four sets of books of thy travels round the world are all distributed to appreciativ friends, who are greatly pleased and gratified with them.

Inclosed please find $1,50 for thy fourth book of travels. Thine for reformation,

CAROLINE S. ELLIS.

NEW ALBANY, PA., Sept. 11, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for my paper for this year. Please pardon me for not paying sooner. I intended to pay you at the Watkins Convention, but I did not see you except when the convention was in session. I must say I hav attended a great many camp-meetings and other meetings, but I never enjoyed myself as well at any as I did at Watkins.

I would like to say a few words in regard to my experience in prayers. I hav been a praying man some thirty-five years of my life, and am satisfied that all the answer I received was from my own thoughts, and my opinion is that every hour spent in prayer is so much time lost. My folks are good church-members, and are very much alarmed about me. I tell them I am getting too old to waste my time with such nonsense. I hav wasted too much time that might hav been better employed at something better than going to church on Sunday and hearing something on hell. I take my pail and pick a pailful of berries, and my family can eat them just the same, and they don't make them sick.

Freethought is very low in this place. There are four or five Germans here, all Freethinkers, and as for me, I am going to fight it through on this line if it takes the balance of my life. A. HEVERLY.

WEATHERFORD, TEXAS, Sept. 5, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50 to pay for your paper. I hav been a trial subscriber for the last three months, and hav come to the conclusion that I can't get along without it, for with its help I am able to knock some of the superstitions higher than a kite; for out here in this portion of Texas, ignorance and superstition abound on every side, although in the last few months they hav been losing ground. There is in this portion of the country about twenty of us Liberals, and I hope we are gaining ground. We are assailed on every side by the orthodox Christians, for we hav a variety in Texas of all kinds and creeds, and we hav some clergymen that hav the audacity to contend with us that D. M. Bennett has not been on a tour around the world—that he has been in New York all the time writing those letters for THE TRUTH SEEKER to gull in the Liberals and get their money for subscriptions to his paper. I am sorry to say that some of the Christian clergy are ignorant enough to believe what they say. With all the evidence they hav, and enough it is, to prove the fact to any thinking person beyond a doubt, they can disbelieve that Mr. D. M. Bennett has been on a tour around the world. But just think what they can believe! They can believe the creation and snake stories, and the flood and Holy Ghost and Joshua stories, and drink them down and say they know it is all so, when they hav not a word of proof of its truth. All the Liberals of this portion of the country shouted for joy at Mr. D. M. Bennett's return to his home and friends; may he liv long, and still search deeper and deeper after truth is the wish of all. We are only a handful here, but we make the clergy think we are a big handful when they tackle us on Liberalism. As this is my first, and being a new beginner, I will say nothing more.

Yours for truth and justice, D. O. SULLIVAN.

ZANESVILLE, O., Sept. 18, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just received a notice in regard to my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would say that my subscription has been paid up, ending Jan. 1, 1883. I hav never let the paper go in arrears from the commencement clear back when you published a two-page paper. I deem it but just to say that it has become my weekly mental food, taking a full Sunday to digest its contents. Your TRUTH SEEKER is one of the best papers published, and the hard knocks you giv in demolishing the structure of supernaturalism are immense. We are surrounded on every side here in Zanesville with orthodoxy; in fact, we hav it east, west, north, and south; surrounding my residence; got it so close that even when I shut doors and windows the blasted thing comes down the chimneys until I exclaim, "No rest for the wicked!" I believe in a population of twenty thousand people there is only myself who speaks out boldly for the cause of Liberalism, and I shall henceforth, as I hav in the past, fight error wherever found.

There is no use talking, I cannot do without your paper. I hav received the first and second volumes of "The Truth Seeker Abroad," and I am well pleased with it. You may set my name down for the fourth volume, and I will send the money for it this week. I remain Yours for the cause, J. BURGESS.

BISHOP CREEK, CAL., Sept. 11, 282.

FRIEND BENNETT: There are several letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 2d inst. that I wish to notice—one from Thomas Winter, of Cincinnati, Ohio, on the necessity of Liberals combining together for more effectiv work in the future. Let me suggest as a preliminary to this end that we send in our names with twenty-five cents each and hav them printed with each one's address in little pocket pamphlets for reference, and that all such shall be considered as open to be addressed by any and all such subscribers. Then we could discuss subjects of interest in a more private manner than we might care to in THE TRUTH SEEKER or you hav space to print. Some "badge" to wear, especially when traveling, would be highly beneficial among strangers. I hav felt this to be a need of the times.

Also that from Mr. M. J. Rountree, of Springfield, Mo., in alluding to "Elmina's" Atheism. I hav long wanted to say something of the same to her, but as I believe in the broadest liberty of thought and individuality, I did not wish to say to a thinking mind like hers, "Come up higher" when she was doing such effectiv work in her present position. I hav thought that some people, like birds, are made to sing better by having light excluded; they seem to see more deeply into the real condition of things by disbelieving in a life beyond this. But I fail to see wherein anyone could enthuse in dying for their country or in sacrificing life in any way, when it is the only heritage we hav, and nothing to gain above the coral insect that livs and dies to build continents it is never to inhabit. No; this may be a well of truth, but its waters when we drink thereof make us thirst again, while that of immortality is a spring forever welling up within us, and we thirst no more, especially when faith is lost in sight and knowledge.

What Mr. J. Hacker, of Berlin, N. J., says of "land being free to each tiller of the soil" is of vital importance to the happiness and prosperity of the world. The monopoly of land will, if not checked, result in the slavery and degradation of the laboring population, and our boasted "equal rights for all" will ultimate in a condition of serfdom and aristocrats. But I hav faith in humanity, and the eternal priciples of justice, which, though slow in growth and evolution, will yet unfold mankind to ripeness, from bitter to sweetness, from war to peace.

OSCEOLA, IA., Sept. 14, 1882.

BENNETT, THE TRAVELER AND TRUTH SEEKER: Absolute truth is unattainable by man; but the search for it is his noblest occupation. Truth can be found in a palace or in a prison—these diverse buildings are seldom far apart—but the prison is apt to hold the greater measure of truth. Bennett trod the path of rectitude, and it led through a corrupt law court to a prison. In the latter he learned the truth that many who are in a Christian bastile ought to be outside of it, and many outsiders ought to be in. His late experience has told him truth smothered by ex parte doings of a Christian court can shine through prison bars. "Truths refined as ever Athens taught" lie scattered on the highways of modern nations, and Bennett's mission to pick them up and present them to his readers has been well performed. Among other reasons, he learned baptism by immersion is a dangerous experiment even when sanctified by the waters of Jordan. Bennett as a missionary abroad has done more good in a few months than any Christian bishop and all his satellites can do (or undo) in as many years. His footprints in India especially will long remain. What a contrast for the educated Hindoo to witness—the benevolent missionary Bennett on one side and the vindictiv Joe Cook on the other. Christianity is at cross purposes with itself. She shuts Bennett in prison for a year, hoping to kill him, and that very act sends him around the world and givs him new life. She dispatches Joe Cook as a missionary to India, and the contrast between him and Bennett drives all proselytes into Bennett's fold. Christianity plays her cards badly, and reminds one of the game of whist when a spectator inquired of a player how he got along in the game. "Pretty well," said he, "considering I hav three opponents." Cook played his game in India so badly that Bennett won all the honors, and unsought he had all the benefit of Cook's tricks, too.

Bennett's travels tends to confirm the growing opinion that morality and happiness among mankind are independent of creed.

I congratulate Mr. Bennett on his successful trip and safe return. F. J. EMARY.

DETROIT, MICH., Sept. 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I found my last article on "Materialism of Mind" in the last TRUTH SEEKER all right, and I wish to thank you for your kindness. It is so different from the treatment we generally receive from the advocates of Christianity, who would not only shut you out of their papers, but would shut your wind off if they could for daring to say or even think contrary to the received dogmas of their church and creed. It is refreshing to come across a man, especially the publisher of a paper like yours, crowded as it is with matter, who will grant a hearing to one diametrically opposed to his own views on a subject of discussion. I take an interest in your welfare; hav since you were imprisoned for conscience's sake. I admire the fortitude you hav shown in your afflictions, and wonder at the wonderful amount of writing you hav done—"Behind the Bars," "The Gods and Religions," besides other letters almost innumerable while in prison, and working prison hours. It seems impossible that a man could hav done so much in the time; and your letters while on your journey around the world fill volumes. Can't possibly see how you could write so much besides traveling around to see it all first.

I would buy your books of travels, but, it is true, I hav read only the first volume of "The Gods and Religions" yet. I hav not had time to devote to it, and the first volume would not hav been read yet probably if I had not had a cancer on one of my hands and improved the time that I was disabled from work to read it. I don't get my ideas from reading, but by thinking for myself, and it is nature and not books that furnishes subjects for thought.

I expect that before long you will make a tour of the United States. Tell the people what you hav seen among the idolatrous nations you hav visited, and what you think of their prospects for "kingdom come," as you hav done in your letters. A great many might hear you that do not read your letters, and you could make sale of books and get subscribers to your paper, and enjoy your victory over Anthony, Benedict, Crosby, Colgate & Co. It is grand now, and that would be better still. JAMES HALE.

LOCKPORT, ILL., Sept. 4, 1882.

DEAR MR. BENNETT: Your friends are legion, all of which greet your return with heartfelt joy. We are in unison with them in this regard. I should hav met you in Chicago could I hav learned in season the exact date of your call there. When I did learn, a prior engagement for that date prevented me, which fact was a source of genuin regret to wife and myself. Now that you are back, and hav received the most satisfactory assurance that your life and labors are highly appreciated, we do hope you will stay at home for a reasonable season before you again take wing for any extended or extensiv flight. Your trip took much less time than I anticipated, and, were it measured by the work you accomplished, it would honestly cover three years at the least. As regards quantity and quality of matter, we are perfectly satisfied, and the "V" subscribers, as well as all able to get the work, will find the investment wise and profitable. We hope that it will, in all respects, be a paying investment to you and yours.

When I read of your narrow escape from drowning in the River Jordan I could but feel how very near Comstock and the saints were to the greatest victory of their lives. Your physical resistance and persistence of purpose not to slip out by the way of this divine stream had the effect of nipping in the bud a desire they prayed for, doubtless, during your whole journey. There is no disguising the fact that you are as intensely hated by many church leaders as ever Paine or Voltaire was, to say nothing of the class of illiberal Liberalists whose petty ambition cannot brook you well-earned and truly-deserved popularity. 'Tis hard to tell which of the two elements most heartily desires your utter destruction and ruin. It is, however, easy to understand which are animated by the most detestable spirit. I rather like the priests and Comstock for their opposition; it is refreshing and consistent; for them, their role is an honest one; they can do so and be true to their theological notions and cultured or natural instincts. With the other fellows it is different; their conduct belies their intellectual conviction, and their infamous baseness is an evidence how low human nature can descend when influenced by that selfishness that seeks to ruin where it cannot rule. There are several matters I wish to treat upon that I will defer till embodied in an article. So much of THE TRUTH SEEKER was occupied with your well-written letters and other important matters that my last was put in a back corner or the waste-basket. I will wait till a more opportune time and room present themselvs before I make another attempt. GEO. LYNN.

The Pilgrim.

BY ALHAZA.

He wandered forth, a pilgrim from our shores,
No wealth, but scollop-shell and sandal shoon,
He came where Socrates leaned down to die,
Near the white columns of the Parthenon.

He sought no triumph, but, like morning light,
It showered from minaret and golden fane,
And learned priests forgot their mystic lore,
To press a hero to their hearts again.

Hymettus's bees composed his fleeting thoughts,
And Helicon ran clearer 'neath his gaze;
Quaint Eastern birds some inspiration caught,
Cheering his labors with their harmless praise.

The pyramids forget their silent ways,
And breathed of eld, a quaint and dreamy tale;
Arabia's balm dropped clearer on his sight,
Weeping with love in many a fragrant vale.

The snow-capped mountain and the silent stone
Told him how nature wrought beneath the skies,
And Java's covert wild of tropic gloom,
Recalled Silurian heat and throbs and sighs.

No pearly tower, no dragon's dark abode,
Where human hearts are sold on foreign shore,
Can tempt him longer from his waiting friends;
Henceforth he leaves his nativ land no more.

Rhyme and Reason.

BY GRACE LEE MALLONEE.

There's a tumult and commotion
In the thelogic air;
In the sanctums of devotion
Lurk a pit-fall and a snare;
Inasmuch as men of science,
Mighty Atheistic giants,
Bid defiance
To the tenets of theology,
Say that an enlightened view
Shows that pagan, Christian, Jew,
All are chips of the same block;
All spring from that savage stock
Which bowed down before the sun
As the great and holy one
When religion first begun;
That the only good apology
For the Bible,
With its tribal
Contradictious, incongrnities,
Is that it sets forth (though few it is Yet that know
This is so)
A perfect system of astronomy,
That it givs an expose,
In an allegoric way,
Of sidereal economy.

Won't results, beyond a doubt,
Be highly comical,
If the Bible should turn out
Astronomical?
Let us trace
A curious feature
Of the case:
Every preacher
On his elevated perch
In each consecrated church
Will be left
In a most appalling lurch;
For his sentences rhetorical—
Now bereft
Of all biblical-historical Solid ground—
Will be found
As extremely metaphorical
As their basis allegorical!
Woe to all poor mortals plastic
Chained to rocks ecclesiastic
In that day when light scholastic
Breaks the unenthusiastic,
Cold, effete, and sunless gloom
Of their spiritual tomb,
If no strength to break away
Energizes their dull clay!

Honestly, 'twixt you and me,
Where will all the churchmen flee?
In that fearful dies irae—
Day of retribution fiery—
When unable
To prove stable
That old fable
Which they hold no sort of key to,
What new scheme will they agree to?
Will they rally in that crisis
Round the standard of grim Isis,
With her taurine, weird devices?
Will they kneel and ask Aquarius
To forgiv their acts nefarious?
When they lose faith in the flood
Will they go and worship Buddh,
Or avow, in words delirious,
The supremacy of Sirius?
Or will these religionists
Fight old Satan with their fists?
Let us hope that there will be
Some obliging deity,
Who will bless—if they obey—
And, if they transgress, will slay
In the same old Christian way
Their Lord practices to-day.

Wouldn't an old deacon frown
Were he told the harp and crown
Which he holds before his eyes—
His reward in paradise—
Are this moment shining down
From the high
Vaulted sky
On the vilest man in town
As on him of church-renown?
Won't all men of saintly pattern
Be surprised to learn that Saturn,
Venus and the Pleiades,
Bright Orion, glowing Mars,
And a host of minor stars,
Hav as much to do with them
As their promised diadem?
That while they, upon their knees,
Pray for crowns and harps of gold,
Those same tokens, centuries old,
Mock with pure, celestial fires
Their auriferous desires.

What a universal leaven
Is this great belief in heaven—
Is this humble, modest hope (Of surprisingly wide scope,
By the bye)
That enables man to fly
From temptation and to buy
Shares in heaven and deny
His own wishes and rely
On pursuing
Through the measure of his days
(Simply for his master's praise)
All the calm and peaceful ways
Of well-doing!
We, poor sinners, who, less wise,
Practicing self-sacrifice
For the good that therein lies,
Find our heaven in the eyes
Of our grateful fellow-men,
Feel constrained to wonder when Christians tell us God will bless
Nothing pure and good unless Intermixed with selfishness,
Outgrowth of that noxious weed
Orthodoxy terms a creed.

How our orthodoxal brother
Would his holiest scruples mother
And go in
For his little share of sin
If he knew rewards post-mortem
(Though he did his level best to extort 'em)
Were but as an idle jest
Quite unrecognizable
By any power manifest!
How that orthodox would rave
On discovering death gave
Nothing but a yawning grave!
It is not advisable,
Upon the whole
To take away
From such poor clay
Faith in the immortality
Of its small soul,
Lest its individuality
Merge into condensed rascality.

My moral, brethren, must be clear:
Do right and find your heaven here.

What Dr. Siemens Expects from the Gas Engin.

From the New York Sun,

In his recent inaugural address as president of the British Association, Dr. Siemens suggested that the time might not be far distant when the gas engin would displace on board our ships "the somewhat complicated and dangerous steam boiler" now in use. The advent of such an engin and of the dynamo-machine, he declared, must mark a new era of material progress at least equal to that produced by the introduction of steam power in the early part of the century.

The great advantage of the gas engin is believed to be its saving of fuel. According to Dr. Siemens, the best steam engin yet constructed does not yield in mechanical effect more than one-seventh part of the heat energy residing in the fuel consumed, whereas the factor of efficiency of the gas engin is one-quarter. If, therefore, it shall be adapted to vessels, the gas engin, being of half the weight of the present steam engin and boilers, and working with only about half the present expenditure of fuel, will admit of an addition of thirty per cent to the cargo of "an Atlantic propeller vessel, no longer to be called a steamer." That improvement accomplished, the balance of advantages in favor of such vessels would be sufficient, as he says, to restrict the use of sailing craft chiefly to the regattas of sportsmen.

As it is now, steam is rapidly driving sails from the ocean, just as iron and steel are superseding wood for ship construction. Out of the 780 vessels building, or preparing to be built, in the United Kingdom, on the 30th of June last, only 130 were sailing craft, while 650 were steamships; and of this whole number only 49 sailing vessels and 6 steam vessels were of wood, while steel or homogeneous iron, which is destined to become the great material for ship building, was used for 89 steam and 11 sailing vessels.

The great advances hitherto made in steam vessels hav been in the direction of saving fuel, in lighter machinery, in the substitution of the screw for side wheels, and in the use of iron and steel instead of wood for their construction. A wooden ship could not be built to perform like the Alaska or the Arizona. Whereas in the days of the old Collins line the steam was expanded only twice, and the pressure carried was only 18 pounds. The expansion now is ten or twelve times, and the pressure is 90 to a 100 pounds. The old Cunarders, the Asia, Africa, and Canada, carried a pressure of 10 pounds merely.

The consequence has been the enormous increase in the size of the ocean steamers and the great advance in their speed. In April, 1838, the Sirius first crossed the Atlantic in seventeen days from Liverpool and fifteen days from Queenstown. She was of 700 tons and 320 horse-power. The Servia, built in 1881, has an extreme length of 530 feet, and a displacement of 13,000 tons. The City of Rome, built in the same year, is 600 feet long, and has a displacement of 13,500 tons. The Alaska, which is 500 feet long, and of 12,000 tons displacement, has done the distance between Queenstown and New York in 7 days, 4 hours, and 32 minutes, and the return voyage in 6 days and 22 hours, a mean ocean speed of about 17 knots an hour, or more than double that of the first steam vessels which crossed the Atlantic.

Undoubtedly if the gas engin shall be able to do what Dr. Siemens anticipates, it will giv ocean navigation another and a strong impulse. Its far greater lightness as compared with the steam engin and boilers, and its lesser consumption of coal to produce the same effect, will admit of a much larger cargo, and greater speed may be obtained without too much sacrifice of the cargo capacity of the vessel.

A Modern Sermon.

SHOWING HOW MUCH MAY BE MADE OF A SIMPLE TEXT BY AN INGENIOUS PREACHER.

Brethren, the words of my text are:

Old Mother Hubbard, she went to the cupboard
To get her poor dog a bone;
But when she got there the cupboard was bare,
And so the poor dog had none.

I propose this evening to analyze their meaning, and to attempt to apply it, lofty as it may be, to our every-day life.

Old Mother Hubbard, she went to the cupboard
To get her poor dog a bone.

Mother Hubbard, you see, was old; there being no mention of others, we may presume she was alone; a widow—a friendless, old solitary widow.

Yet did she despair? Did she sit down and weep, or read a novel, or wring her hands? No! "She went to the cupboard." And here observe that she went to the cupboard. She did not hop, or skip, or run, or jump, or use any other peripatetic artifice; she solely and merely went to the cupboard.

We hav seen that she was old and lonely, and we now further see that she was poor. For, mark, the words are "the cupboard."

Not "one of the cupboards," or "the right-hand cupboard," or "the left-hand cupboard," or the one above, or the one below, or the one under the stair, but just the cupboard. The one little humble cupboard the poor widow possessed. And why did she go to the cupboard? Was it to bring forth golden goblets, or glittering precious stones, or costly apparel, or feasts, or any other attributes of wealth? It was to get her poor dog a bone! Not only was the widow poor, but her dog, the sole prop of her age, was poor too.

We can imagin the scene. The poor dog crouching in the corner, looking wistfully at the solitary cupboard and the widow going to that cupboard—in hope, in expectation maybe—to open it, although we are not distinctly told that it was not half open or ajar—to open it for that poor dog.

But when she got there the cupboard was bare,
And so the poor dog had none.

"When she got there!" You see, dear brethren, what perseverance is.

You see the beauty of persistence in doing right. She got there.

There are no turnings and twistings, no slippings and slidings, no leaning to the right or falterings to the left.

With glorious simplicity we are told she got there.

And how was her noble effort rewarded?

"The cupboard was bare!" It was bare! There were to be found neither oranges, nor cheesecakes, nor penny buns, nor gingerbread, crackers, nor nuts, nor lucifer matches.

The cupboard was bare!

There was but one, only one, solitary cupboard in the whole of that cottage, and that one, the sole hope of the widow and the glorious loadstar of the poor dog, was bare! Had there been a leg of mutton, a loin of lamb, a fillet of veal, even an ice from Gunter's, the case would hav been different, the incident would hav been otherwise.

Many of you will probably say, with all the pride of worldly sophistry: "The widow no doubt went out and bought a dog biscuit."

Ah, no! Far removed from these earthly ideas, these mundane desires, poor Mother Hubbard, the widow, whom many thoughtless worldlings would despise in that she only owned one cupboard, perceived—or I might even say saw—at once the relentless logic of the situation, and yielded to it with all the heroism of that nature which had enabled her without deviation to reach the barren cupboard.

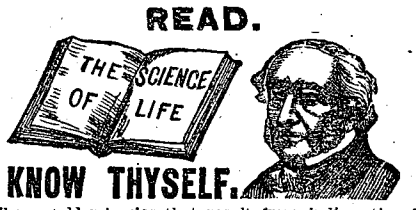
She did not attempt, like the stiff-necked scoffers of this generation, to war against the inevitable; she did not try, like the so-called men of science, to explain what she did not understand.

She did nothing. "The poor dog had none!" And then at this point our information ceases.

But do we not know sufficient? Are we not cognizant of enough?

Who would dare to pierce the veil that shrouds the ulterior fate of old Mother Hubbard, the poor dog, the cupboard, or the bone that was not there?

Must we imagin her still standing at the open cupboard door—depict to ourselvs the dog still drooping his disappointed tail upon the floor—the sought-for bone still remaining somewhere else?



Ah! no, my dear brethren, we are not so permitted to attempt to read the future. Suffice for us to glean from this beautiful story its many blessings; suffice it for us to apply them, to study them as far as in us lies.

National Convention of Spiritualists

At Detroit, Mich., in Royal Templar's Hall, corner of Woodward and Grand River avenues. on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, Oct. 27, 28, and 29, 1882. This convention is for the purpose of discussing the feasibility of organization among Spiritualists upon a rational, scientific, philosophical, and moral basis. Many hundreds hav indorsed this call, and it is hoped each devoted true Spiritualist will either be present or send communications, or at least their name and address, as in sympathy with this movement. Among a few of the many who hav signified their intention of being present if possible, are Maria W. King, A. J. King, Dr. J. M. Peebles, Capt. H. H. Brown, J. P. Whiting, Giles B. Stebbins, Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, Chas. A. Andrus, A. B. French, J. H. Palmer, etc.

MRS. NETTIE PEASE FOX,

Mediumistic author of "The Golden Key, or Mysteries Beyond the Veil;" "A Search for the Temple of Happiness;" "The Unattained Attainable," etc.

Bound in cloth, $1. Sent, post-paid, to any part of the world.

This is one of the most deeply interesting Spiritualistic works ever published. Given in narrativ form by a lady whose earth life was one of strange vicissitudes, startling events, and wonderful mediumistic experiences. After many years in spirit life she returns to earth, and, through the fully entranced organism and powers of another, give her earth history, followed by revelations from spirit life, interesting and instructiv to those who would know of the condition, opportunities, and employments of those who hav crossed the "narrow stream meandering these two worlds between." A better understanding of this remarkable book may be obtained by consulting the following table of a few of the many subjects upon which we hav revelations from the spirit world.

Death Foretold; Death-bed Visions and Revelations; Is There Another Life? Angel Ministration; Spirit Prophecy Fulfilled; Saved from a Horrible Fate by Spirit Warning; A Father's False Representations Corrected by the Spirit Mother; Life Saved by Spirit Power; My Death Foretold; My Sudden Departure from Earth Life; First Awakening in Spirit Life; Mansions in Spirit Land; Return to Earth Life; Some Spirits Still Worship a Personal God; Spirits Attend a Marriage Ceremony of Earth; Marriage in Spirit Life; Temple of Science; Library; Modes of Traveling; Visiting Another Planet; Meeting of Husband and Wife, whose earthly marriage had been unfortunate, and many important revelations are given of life and its employments in the spirit world; deeply interesting.

The Offering will be conducted independently, impartially. Nothing looking to man's welfare will be deemed alien to its pages. Offensiv personalities and indelicacy of language will be wholly excluded. In its editorial conduct the truth, beauty, and utility of Spiritualism will be advanced. It will not, in any particular, be a sectarian journal, but broad, progressiv, Liberal—will giv fair and equal expression to all forms of thought. Above all things, it aims to be Liberal, to be devoted to Spiritualism in its broadest, highest, most extensiv application.

Among its contributors will be found our oldest and ablest writers. In it will be found lectures, essays upon scientific, philosophical, and Spiritual subjects, spirit communications and messages.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Vol. I. or II. mailed on receipt of $2.

DEITY ANALYZED AND THE DEVIL'S DEFENSE.

By Col. John R. Kelso, A.M.

Not since Hudibras has there been such damaging blows given to these old myths and fables. The singular audacity with which he attack. the foundations of Christianity shows the earnestness of his own convictions in regard to its fabulous origin.—L Hutchison.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhea and Impotency, as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, cured thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of these were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Failing Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and torpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Notices from the Press.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Daily Times.]

We cordially indorse Dr. R. P. Fellows as an able and learned physician, who has been so highly successful that his name is blessed by thousands of these who found no relief in the old medication, but were cured by the scientific method originated by Dr. Fellows.

[From the Star Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.]

TO INVALIDS AND OTHERS: The Banner seldom indorses any doctor or medicin, but it is free to say to all interested that Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., is not only a skilful and reputable practitioner, but one of the most successful physicians in the United States.

Gems of Thought.

BECAUSE we cannot explain the whys and wherefores of all we see around us, is no reason that we should adopt the theories of other men or bodies of men, who think they know all about it. If I cannot tell the origin and end this is no proof that I am wrong in disbelieving the opinions of those who profess to make these things as "clear as mud."—Elmina D Slenker.

THOUGH woman needs the protection of one man against his whole sex, in pioneer life, in threading her way through a lonely forest, on the highway, or in the streets of the metropolis in a dark night, she sometimes needs, too, the protection of all men against this one? But even if she could be sure, as she is not, of the ever-present, all-protecting power of one strong arm, that would be weak indeed compared with the subtil, all-pervading influence of just and equal laws for all women. Hence woman's need of the ballot, that she may hold in her own right hand the weapon of self-protection and self-defense.—History of Woman Suffrage.

MAN is dear to man; the poorest poor
Long for some moments in a weary life
When they can know and feel that they hav been Themselvs the fathers and the dealers out
Of some small blessings; hav been kind to such
As needed kindness, for the single cause,
That we hav all of us one human heart.
—Wordsworth.

UNLESS the authenticity of the historical books of the New Testament can be certainly established, we hav no eye-witnesses of the Christian miracles at all; and, the absence of such testimony, the adverse arguments derived from the uniformity of nature and from mythological analogy, which traces the belief in miracles to the universal propensities of uncritical ages, rush in with overwhelming force. In fact, in almost any book written by a learned man who feels himself at liberty to say what he really thinks you will soon find the miracles abandoned, though it may be with evident reluctance.—Goldwin Smith.

THERE is probably no great religion in the world the establishment of which has been altogether dissociated from miracles. They form the most striking, most indisputable, most intelligible proof of the divine will. Not indeed that there is any close logical connection between the performance of a wonder and the truth of the wonder-worker's doctrines; but popular imagination jumps readily to the conclusion that a man whom rumor or tradition has invested with supernatural powers must also be in possession of correct opinions, or even of superhuman knowledge, on the mysterious questions with which religion deals. Hence ecclesiastical historians, of all ages and countries, hav sought to show that those from whom they deduced the systems in which they wished their readers to believe were either themselvs gifted with thaumaturgic faculties, or were the subjects of special marvels worked upon them. Such miracles hav always served as their credentials, indicating their high character, and entitling them to demand the obedience of mankind to the commands they brought.—Amberley's Analysis of Religion.

MANY, who only wish for some excuse for an immoral life, will, it is possible, jump at this [i. e., the idea that morality has religion as its sole foundation], which is so persistently offered them. And there may also be some loss of moral tone in men who are not evilly disposed, during the time when, the old sanctions having lost their force, the new hav not yet come into place and power. The South Sea Islander, who, having been converted to Christianity, ate his superfluous wife in order that he might receive Christian baptism, was not a singular being. The essential quality of his act is always seen where men adopt a creed which differs widely from the creed they hav been hitherto holding. The new creed does not at once assert its moral force. A process of progressiv adaptation must go on for a considerable time before the new sanctions will be as efficient as the old.—J. W. Chadwick.

ORTHOYY defined: I do not think that Mr. Graves can possibly be right in calling me "an orthodox clergyman." I suppose that orthodoxy means to believe in the Trinity, the deity of Christ, his atoning sacrifice, the verbal and plenary inspiration of the Bible, total depravity of man, irresistible conversion, and the everlasting punishment of the wicked. I do not believe, never hav believed, and am never likely to believe any of these doctrins I hav been opposing them all my life.—Dr. J. F. Clarke.

ORTHODOX! orthodox,
Wha believe in John Knox,
Let me sound an alarm to your conscience—
There's a heretic blast
Has been blawn in the Wast,
That which is not sense must be nonsense.
Doctor Mac, Doctor Mac,
You should stretch on a rack,
To strike evil-doers wi' terror;
To join faith and sense
Upon any pretense
Is heretic, damnable error. —Burns.

IN Great Britain, where a few gentlemen consider it their province to make religion, politics, and morality for the people, it is counted ridiculous presumption that common persons should attempt to form opinions upon these subjects for themselvs. I know the danger to progress brought about by those whom Col. Ingersoll happily calls its "fool-friends." Nevertheless, to me this humble and venturous activity of thought at Chautauqua was a welcome sight. Eccentricity is better than the deadness of mind, but of the crude form of an idea the perfect idea comes at last.—G. J. Holyoake.

IT is only by the exercise of reason that man can discover God. Take away that reason and he would be incapable of understanding anything, and in this case it would be just as consistent to read even the book called the Bible to a ham as to a man. How, then, is it that these people pretend to reject reason?—Paine's Age of Reason.

Odds and Ends.

SAYS a cynical young lady: "Very handsome mothers are often proud of their ugly babies. I wonder if butterflies are proud of their caterpillars"

"CAN you tell me," asked a Sunday-school teacher of a little girl, "why the Israelites made a golden calf?" "Because they hadn't gold enough to make a cow," was the reply.

WHILE boring an artesian well in Boston recently, the workmen struck a baked bean six hundred feet under the ground. It is supposed to hav been placed there before the flood.

"BRIDGET, I told you to hav my hot water ready the first thing in the morning." "Sure, sir," replied Bridget, "didn't I bring it up and lave it at the door last night so as to hav it in time?"

IF you are roasting so hard that your collar is almost melted, and you want to get cooled off, don't go and giv fifteen cents for a glass of lemonade. Just attempt to light a cigar with your last match. Then a breeze will start up.—Puck.

AN esthetic invitation to dinner concluded with these words, "I hav asked four minds to meet you." "Thanks," replied the uncultured one, "I'm awfully sorry not to come, but hav accepted an invitation to meet four stomachs the same night.

PROPOSING a remedy for musketoes, the Hammonton Hornet says: "Place a small piece of raw meat on a plate in your sleeping-room, and the 'birds' will light on it and never fly away." Our "birds" would fly away with the meat, plate and all.

PEOPLE living in the interior of Alaska are said to know little of gratitude and to hav no expression for "I thank you." Don't be offended because the lady to whom you surrender your seat in a street car makes no acknowledgment of the civility. Perhaps she was raised in Alaska.

A YOUNG Austin lawyer was appointed to defend a negro who was too poor to hire counsel of his own. After the jury was in the box the young lawyer challenged several jurymen whom his client said had a prejudice against him.

"Are there any more jurymen who hav a prejudice against you?" whispered the young lawyer.

"No, boss; de jury am all right, but now I wants you to challenge de jedge. I has bin convicted under him seberal times already, and maybe he is beginnin' to hab prejudice agin me."

TACKLING THE KHEDIVE.

"Well, what did you hear about the keydive?" said a last-chance man yesterday in front of the post-office.

"He's having quite a picnic as near as I can get at it. Old Gum Arabic and the kerdive hav had a set-to, it seems, at Alexander," said a man from the Oregon short line.

"Well, now that Arabi Bey has soured on the khedive, I suppose we may look for perdition to be poppin' purty plenty," said the fat man from Council Bluffs.

"Speaking about the kerdeeva," said a young man with tight pants and a wealth of peeled nose, "what is his position relativ to the Egyptian government?"

"Why, the keddiv is the high tycoon; the big injun; the high mucky-muck of the ranch. He's the governor, and Arabi Bey has throwed off on him," said the train-despatcher of the North Park branch.

"Well, what did he want to throw off on the kerdeeve for?" interrogated the cow gentleman, just in from the trail.

Just then, however, the man was called away, so that he never got at the true inwardness of the Egyptian trouble, and is a little mixed also in the pronunciation of the khedive's name.—Laramie Boomerang.

"Is this the Rev. Mr. Mulkittle?" said a kind-of-out-of-reason man, entering the library of a well-known Little Rock minister.

"Yes, sir: hav a seat."

"I hav called to transact a piece of business which to the world may seem ridiculous, but which, viewed from a spiritual eminence, is of importance."

"What is it?"

"I want you to love me."

"Love you," gasped the good man, regarding the petitioner and inwardly vowing that he had never before met a more repulsiv-looking man.

"Yes, sir, I want you to love me," and he sat down and closed his eyes as though he intended to await the announcement of the decision. "The command is to love one another. I confess that I love you, and opening his eyes he leered at the preacher.

"Well, sir," said the minister, "your demand after all is simple. I suppose that you hav been lost for many years, and hav just tasted grace, and that you especially want the love of ministers. Yes, I love you."

"Thank you. Now, when we love anyone we are willing to help him. Gimme a dollar, sir, gimme a dollar. Out of the love you bear me, gimme the dollar."

The minister arose, took down a box and handed the visitor a dollar. "Good-bye; I hope you will always love me," and the lover was gone.

"How did you make it?" said a rough-looking man when they reached a street corner not far away.

"Fine. Never met but one preacher that got away with me, and he was an old Baptist that insisted upon ducking me into the river before he could love me. Preachers like something odd. The old style of striking 'm is repealed."

"Let me see the money."

'Here she is; a new dollar. Let's go take something."

"I guess not. The thing is counterfeit." It was a vile imitation, and the two thieves looked at each other in silence. The minister poked his head over the fence and laughed. The dollar had come to him in a contribution box.

THE

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogatives of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what is itself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly advocated.

The strong commendations of the secular press show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

HISTORY
OF THE
CHRISTIAN RELIGION
TO A. D. 200.

By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

Verdict of European Scholars.

The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religio Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupferschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology, I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."

One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR,

The oldest reform journal in the United States,

Is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.,

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue with us any longer 3m38

Notes and Clippings.

DEACON WM. RICHARDSON, of Hanson Place Baptist Church, Brooklyn, has been expelled for immoral conduct.

CHIEF JUSTICE COLERIDGE, of England, says that four fifths of the crime that comes into court results from drink, for which Britishers pay over $500,000,000 a year.

BROTHER BARNES, of Kentucky, is called the "Mountain Evangelist," yet the pious people of the towns that he attacks pray that "this mountain be removed and cast into the depths of the sea."

MOODY and Sankey are in Paris. They giv only two Sundays to that city, as they are not at all handy in their use of the French language. After that they return to their work where English is spoken.

BARNES, the Kentucky Evangelist, says that he has constant bad luck since he left the "dark and bloody ground and made a pilgrimage North." The preachers of Columbus, Dayton, and Indianapolis discountenanced him, and the people would not listen to him. He is now in Cincinnati, where he thinks the outlook is better.

GEN. OGLETHORPE, the founder of Georgia, used to tell of a missionary who, flattering himself that he had thoroughly imbued an American Indian with the right spirit in which to take the Lord's Supper, said: "Do you not feel a mental comfort, an inward refreshment from that holy cup?" "It is very good," said his promising proselyte, "but," with a smile, "rum is better."

DEACON IRA CAMPBELL, of the M. E. church of North Volney, turned two boys out of church for wearing sunflowers, and gave notice at the same time that no one should be admitted into church bearing those showy flowers. Parson Brown has joined the deacon in this pious crusade against this symbol of estheticism, and the world is left to infer that the sunflower is a sinful plant belonging to the realm of the devil.

THE Hudson River Baptist Association, North, at a recent meeting, resolved to withhold fellowship from the Baptist church at Greenbush. A Baptist council recently recommended that the pastor of that church, the Rev. G. B. Simons, be removed for writing love letters to a young lady of his church. The pastor is married. His church refused to remove him, hence the withdrawal of fellowship by the Baptist Association.

A FULL and humorous account is given in Texas Siftings of a bitter quarrel now raging in Weatherford, of that state, between the Rev. Mr. Penn, Baptist, and the Rev. Mr. Price, Methodist. They speak of each other in the hardest terms, and the epithets, "liar," "slanderer," etc., hav been passed freely between them. What love, indeed, they must bear to each other! The editor says when they get to heaven he wishes to be there and see the rest of the fun.

ALTHOUGH the Rev. Mr. Eddy, who has just been buried in Philadelphia, had been known as such a notorious miser, a hard-fisted and ungenerous man, and a voluntary dweller in filth and squalor, two of the brethren who exhorted at his funeral spoke of him in a manner not only polite, but highly eulogistic. One of these called him a reformer. This was in allusion to his habits of saving, in contrast with those of the other colored people of the neighborhood where he lived, who always spend every cent they earn, and then run in debt to anybody who will trust them. The Eddy funeral was attended by enough colored people to pack the Bethel church. It was a dismal occasion, although there was nobody to mourn the death of the wretched old miser. His relations are now fighting over the $150,000 he left. Nobody loved the old man.

THE Rev. Mr. Greenwood, of the First Identity church in Brooklyn, is pegging away at his hobby, which is to establish the proposition that the Anglo-Saxons are identical with the ten lost trices of Israel. He believes that if this is once established in the mind of the Christian public "there will not be room on this earth for Infidelity to squeeze in one of its dark, foreboding thoughts." There is, as far as heard from, no "Second Identity" church.

A CHINESE teacher in Hong Kong has completed a present which he intended for the British princess. It consists of a stanza of poetry, composed by the teacher himself, and contains thirty-three distinct and well-formed Chinese characters, written out without any contractions, on one grain of unhulled rice. The grain of paddy is inclosed, under a magnifying glass, in a silver locket. Another Chinaman has inscribed sixty Chinese characters on a single sesamum seed.

THE Methodist Conference at Portage, Wis., has kindly acquitted the Rev. Mr. Atwater for sitting on a log in the woods close to a pretty school-marm up in Dunn county, holding her on the log, and keeping his arms around her a good long while, and talking the very sweetest kind of talk; he is also reinstated in his position, and is once more entitled to feed the lambs of the flock with such crumbs as he is able to break off from the big loaf of the bread of life. It is evident the conference look upon the log exercise as proper for preachers, and that they feel most kindly disposed toward such cases, knowing just how it is themselvs.

IT is now announced that the gross receipts of the post-office department for the last fiscal year were more than five millions greater than those of the previous year. Auditor Ela believes that when the returns of expenditures hav been ascertained there will be found a net revenue for that year of a million dollars. It is well known that the post-office receipts still continue to increase very fast, so that it is fair to presume not only that no appropriation at all will be required from Congress next winter, but that the end of next June will see a surplus of several millions, which the department will not know what to do with. Shall this be left to excite the cupidity of the Star route and other thieves, or shall letter postage be reduced to two cents?—Sun.

THE following dispatch was sent to the daily Press: "The National Liberal League, in session in St. Louis, adopted a resolution favoring political action. Resolutions were also adopted condemnatory of the action of an attorney of Boston (Alex. Stephens) in suppressing the works of Walt Whitman; also of the censorship exercised over mail matter by the post-office authorities and private societies as contrary to the principles of the republic, and a restriction of the liberty of the press; condemning the introduction of Bible reading and psalm singing in Girard College as a violation of the stipulations of Stephen Girard's will, and recommending that the executiv committee of the National Liberal League be empowered to take such action in the matter as may be necessary. The order of business for to-morrow (Oct. 1st) will be the changing of the calendar from the commencement of the Christian era to some other date."

A LAZY British clergyman can now buy lithographed sermons at the rate of about sixpence a week. The sermon trade is on the increase, and is managed either by publishing concerns or by clergymen who want to eke out a slender support. A clergymen who has been conducting this business on the sly informs his patrons that he will receive only a limited number of subscribers, and that the lithographs will be prepared in his own house, and mailed only by his hands. He will so arrange affairs connected with the issue of these sermons that no two neighbors will be likely to receive the same sermon. The clergyman who is to receive a sermon gets it on Friday. This givs him all the time he needs to become acquainted with it by Sunday. At first a man has a mean feeling as he turns over the pages of a purchased sermon on the pulpit desk, making his people believe as he reads it that he wrote it during the week. After a few months of this sort of deceit he becomes hardened to it, and can deliver the lithograph almost as naturally as if it were his own.—Sun.

CONGRESSMAN W. E. ROBINSON, of Brooklyn, has written a letter to the Sun advocating penny postage on letters, reducing the postage on all letters weighing not over half an ounce to one cent each. The arguments he uses are effectiv. He shows that all previous reductions of postage hav resulted in an increase of revenue. He shows that while books are carried in the mails at eight cents per pound, weekly newspapers at two cents per pound, and members of Congress send not less than two thousand pounds each per year for nothing, letters are charged ninety-six cents per pound. He believes if newspapers can be carried for two cents per pound that letters can be carried for thirty-two cents. He says: "If we hav an honest administration of the service such reforms can be worked as greatly to lighten the expenses. The cost of railway service can be reduced, Star route expenses can be diminished, salaries can be cut down, and with the application of business principles to the postal service the people can hav a uniform penny postage at very little increase of cost to the government."

ELLWOOD COOPER, of Santa Barbara, the leading oliv grower of California, says that he has trees eight years old that hav produced two thousand gallons of olivs to the acre. This would be equivalent to 250 gallons of oil to the acre, and the oil finds a ready market at $5 a gallon. The yield of one acre would thus be $1,250, which for a hundred-acre ranch would be a pretty fair income. But these figures are not represented to apply to any except the very choicest trees and an uncommonly good year. But even computing the profits of oliv culture at as low a figure as one-tenth, a twenty-acre ranch would support a family very comfortably after six or seven years of waiting. One of the great advantages of oliv culture is the fact that irrigation is not needed. In a climate where there is often such a scarcity of rain as in California, this is a matter of much importance. The oliv-tree also grows very old. There are oliv-trees in Asia Minor that are known to be over 1,200 years old, and are still in full bearing. In considering the profits of fruit culture, however, the danger of insect pests, disease, and over-production must be kept in mind; and these are usually passed by without mention in the glowing descriptions of southern California.

THE telegraph has within the last few days brought about the usual number of clerical peccadillos. The following are some of them: St. John, N. B., Sept. 27th.—A constable from Thomaston, Me., has been here for some days looking for Edwin H. Ellis, a Baptist clergyman of that place, who is alleged to hav fled with the wife of a member of his congregation. The parties were found to day, and an application was made to a magistrate for a warrant, but it was refused, the magistrate not having jurisdiction. Cincinnati, Sept. 27th.—The Rev. Mr. McCleniheim, pastor of the United Presbyterian church of Avondale, Coshocton County, Ohio, was to-day assaulted and beaten with a club by Robert Hood, one of the elders of the church, on account of ill-feeling growing out of a church trial. Jackson, Miss., Sept. 27th.—At Charleston, this morning, Alacon Leigh was shot dead while standing by the side of his wife, in front of his residence, by Vernon White, the son of a Presbyterian minister. The assassin fled, and a mob threatens to hang his father. The Rev. J. C. Sullivan was the elderly and respected pastor of the Methodist church at Salem, O., but he had to resign when it came out that he wrote to young Mrs. Halwie, one of his converts: "I hunger to press your pouting, pretty, and persimmon-like lips to to mine." Writing letters is sometimes dangerous business.

NEW YORK seems liable to lose the statue of Liberty which is to be presented by France to the United States. The committee are much disgusted with the inaction of New Yorkers with regard to the matter, and are inclined to giv the statue to Boston if arrangements can be made.

REMARKABLY high tides prevailed in the rivers surrounding New York last week. It raised the ferryboats so high that they were temporarily inaccessible to loaded teams, and caused the ship Undaunted to knock off her topgallant mast by coming in contact with the roadway of the East River Bridge.

MR. GLADSTONE, of England, has recommended that the Archbishop of York set apart a day for special thanksgiving and prayer for the success of British arms in Egypt. While they are about it, it might not be out of place for all patriotic Britons to thank God for Tug Wilson's getting the best of Sullivan, which was likewise a famous victory.

THE Rev. Edwin H. Ellis, a Baptist minister, came to St. Johns, N. B, to break bread to the bluenoses; but the effectivness of his efforts was somewhat lessened by the discovery of the fact that the woman accompanying him was not his wife, and that he had neglected to pay his board bill in the town where he had previously ministered. He was furnished with board and lodging in one of those institutions the peculiarity of which is that the underpinning reaches to the eaves.

Monday, May 15th.—The terrible storm continues through to-day; the water several times found its way freely into our room; there is great complaint from various parts of the ship. Many are sea-sick, and the dining-table is largely deserted. The poor Chinamen, huddled together in their close quarters under the deck, are objects of pity; many of them are much troubled with sea-sickness, and they have doubtless come to the conclusion that going to America is not wholly pleasureable.

The Oceanic belongs to English owners, and is chartered by the Occidental and Oriental line, as are its companion steamers in the same line. The principle officers are English, while the purser, steward, etc., are Americans. There appears to be a slight defect in the construction of this steamer, so far as my room is concerned, for the water should not come in this way into any well-built vessel. But this storm is unusual, and the steward complains bitterly of the water making most unwelcome ingress to many parts of the vessel. The company of this line are doubtless doing a very good business, as the amount of passengers and freight passing over the route is increasing. The governing interest, however, is the Pacific Railroad Company between San Francisco and Omaha, which company is running this line of steamers. The Pacific Mail Steamship Company formerly had the business principally in their own hands, but from some mismanagement the value of their stock and business has declined and the Occidental and Oriental are in the ascendant, though, as I understand, the two companies are now somewhat in connection.

Tuesday, May 16th.—The North wind continues very strong and cold, though attended with less rain than on the past two days. Heavy rolling is still the great cause of complaint, and not more than half of the passengers go to the table. We have on board some six American missionaries who are returning home, some on a furlough of a year, and some permanently. The Rev. Mr. Chandler, of Michigan, is of the latter class, and seems to be troubled with a bronchial difficulty. He has for eight years been located in China, and speaks in very high terms of the character of the Chinese. He informs me that during his residence there he has not seen an intoxicated person. He corroborates the reports I have before received that the people of that country are industrious, frugal, and usually well-disposed.

Two of the returning missionaries are lady physicians, the practice of medicine and Christian propagandism having been their occupation for several years in China. I have conversed with one of them and received the same general account from her of the good incentives of the Chinese people. Parents make it a rule to teach respectful and moral conduct to their children. She related an incident when on one occasion some children on the street shouted out to her and a companion, calling them Christians and speaking some ill-mannerly words. She halted and mildly rebuked them for their conduct. The mother of one of the children came out when she learned that insulting language had been used to the ladies, and chided the children in an impressive manner, when they knelt and asked pardon of the ladies. Other instances were given of the native kindness and good behavior of the people.

So far as the schools are concerned which the missionaries established in their fields of labor, there can be very little question that they do good. The modicum of Western civilization they are able to infuse into the juvenile mind of the Chinese is perhaps of benefit, but whether the theological dogmas and the claims of supernaturalism which they seek to impress upon the people of that country are very much better than their own superstitions is another question. Of course the Christian party believe their religion to be superior to all other religions, and that the present and future happiness of the pagan world depends upon this religion being accepted. This, as a matter of course, to me seems an error. If the best civilization and the proper education in the laws and principles of nature, can be given them, together with the natural duty of man to man, the claims of supernaturalism and duty to the gods may well be omitted.

The number of converts made to Christianity among the Chinese is very small, and perhaps it is just as well so. The morals of Confucius and Buddha, if given to the people as dispensed by those great teachers, being equal to any the world has known, will meet all the necessities of life; and the missionaries who pass years among them in the name of Christianity can receive their salaries all the same and have a genial climate and country for a residence. As a paying investment, however, foreign missions are decidedly not a success. But to those who hold that the value of a single soul is more than the whole earth; that those who embrace Christianity are saved, while all who fail to do so are eternally lost, a single brand, here and there plucked from the burning, makes full amends for all their efforts and sacrifice, and they regard the profits secured as ample remuneration. It is this belief, and the zeal which it engenders, that prompt the effort that is made to spread the gospel of Christianity over the entire pagan world. Those of my way of thinking, however, regard this as all a mistake. If the great lessons of nature and humanity are duly understood and lived up to, it makes little difference which gods and devils are believed in; and if none at all it is still better.

The greatest of respect is due to Confucius and Buddha. They were unquestionably as great teachers as the world has produced. To me their doctrines and lives had special value from the fact that they taught little of gods or devils; little of supernaturalism of any kind. The moral maxims of Confucius referred mostly to this life and our duties here and to one another. Buddha was probably a greater thinker, more of a philosopher, and more a metaphysician; but he recognized no creator—no personal deity—no head center devil or personal evil. To this extent both these great teachers stood on higher and truer ground than the founders of any other system of religion known to the world. The great thing to be regretted is that their followers have taken on the superstitions of gods and devils, and that the higher and truer education of nature and its laws has not been sufficiently regarded.

One of the female missionary physicians is evidently returning home to die, for consumption has already marked her for a victim. She wears a sad countenance, from which I read that the pleasures of good health in this life are more desirable than the fancied joys of a paradise above the clouds. But when consumption once lays its withering hand upon a person, though comparatively young in years, an adieu to the pleasures of life must soon be taken and the mysteries of the "beyond" investigated. I am firm in the belief that in that investigation the claims of theology and supernaturalism will not be found true.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

I was in hope—before I understood the course which the San Francisco steamers take from Yokohama—that our passage would lead that way, and that I would be able to make a visit to those lovely islands, but I learn that they lie some two thousand miles south of the line we take. I am somewhat surprised to learn that while San Francisco is almost due east of Yokohama, in making the passage we go ten degrees, or nearly seven hundred miles, north of a straight east and west line, and that by doing this the distance between the two points is lessened some three hundred miles. This appears paradoxical at first, but by taking an orange or apple, and marking two points between its equator and its stem, and the same nearly one-third the circumference apart, it will be seen that by curving up toward the stem the distance is shorter than a direct line roundwise. It may be easily demonstrated by measuring with a bit of thread. Thus it will be seen that the curvature of the earth is greater and requires more travel than when diverging a few hundred miles northward of an eastward line. Owing to the severe north wind we have encountered we have not gone quite so far northward as usual, but far enough to reach the frigid polar winds, in strong contrast with the warm, balmy air of the tropical regions left behind.

Thus it will be seen that a visit to the Sandwich Islands is entirely out of the question; and though I would gladly have explored some of its charming country and scenery, I will have to be content with imagining that its tropical riches are not unlike what I have seen in Southern Asia. In connection, however, with the Sandwich Islands, and also the cause of the missionaries, which I have several times alluded to, I will dwell a short time upon the nature and effects of missionary work in the Sandwich Islands. I have very reliable information from a valued friend upon this subject, and will freely use the notes with which he has kindly furnished me. From his truthful representations it will be clearly seen that the lovely Sandwich Islands, as well as the other charming islands of the South Pacific, which, from nature, received advantages fully equal to any other portion of the earth's surface, entitling them to be regarded as veritable heavens, have been, by the blasting effects of Christianity, converted almost into absolute hells. Christian missions in those islands have indeed proved anything else than a blessing. But let me give you my learned friend's notes upon the subject:

"The islands of the Pacific Ocean have been for generations the favorite stamping-grounds for the proselytism of orthodox Christianity, the ability of which to turn Edens into hells has nowhere been, in modern times, so fully exemplified as in regard to the unfortunate inhabitants of these natural paradises. Prior to Christian intercourse no people on earth were or are as happy as these people; at present none are more miserable than are such of the inhabitants of these islands as are controlled by Christians—especially missionaries or their descendants.

"These are strong assertions, but they are fully borne out by concurrent testimony ranging over a period of fifty years.

"The first to which attention is invited is that of Herman Melville in his books entitled 'Omoo' and 'Typee,' published in 'the forties.' In the first edition of one of these he fully exposed the villainous pride of the missionaries, whose wives rode in carriages drawn by natives, who were pricked or whipped by their drivers as horses would have been. These and similar incidents were, however, carefully weeded out in subsequent editions by those pious Methodistic frauds, the Harper Bros., in accordance with their usual conscienceless tactics.

"When in the southern part of California, a few years ago, I fell in with some very intelligent gentlemen who sojourned for long periods in the South Sea Islands some thirty or forty years ago. Their testimony was that the introduction of white customs as to religion and government had been uniformly pernicious to the islanders in every respect. American forms were introduced for the political benefit of favored officials at great cost to the people, increasing the expenses of living, taxes, etc., out of all proportion to the increase of wages; while the natives were compelled to lose their independence and become wage-laborers, as their lands were gradually gobbled up under the new regime of pious grabbing, sustained and engineered by missionary organizations. It must be considered that in such climates very little labor is required, and what in cool climates would be no more than moderate is there excessive, exhausting, and repulsive. Thus the free people of these islands are being gradually transformed into serfs of Christian grabbers.

"But as these latter cannot as yet obtain by this process a sufficient supply for their infernal greed, slaves from Australia and the Sandwich Islands are in the practice—worked at by all the Christian governments—of making descents upon such of the islands as have hitherto remained partially free from missionary contamination. These people are then cajoled or compelled to sign 'contracts' for labor for a term of years, and their rights even under these contracts totally ignored whenever conflicting with the views of their 'owners.' Venereal diseases, unknown previous to the advent of whites, are also rapidly extirpating the native population.

"The natives, however, are too few to satisfy the rapacious demands of 'missionary' and other slave-drivers, speculators, and monopolists. Hence China, the Azores, Sweden, and Norway have been recently visited for the purpose of securing laborers for the Sandwich Island sugar plantations. These last operations are mainly based on a 'Reciprocity Treaty,' concluded by the United States with the Sandwich Islands in 1875, by which sugar is admitted therefrom to the United States free of duty. This treaty gave just such a stimulus to slavery in the Sandwich Islands as the invention of the cotton-gin did to slavery in the United States.

"The nature and extent of their nefarious operation in connection with the sugar plantations were kept very quiet until in June last C. Chlausen—one of a cargo of three hundred and fifty-three Swedes, induced by gross misrepresentations to embark and sign a 'labor' contract—succeeded in escaping to San Francisco and telling his story. The Sandwich Islands consist of one large and a great number of small islands; the difficulties of inter-communication and the native administration of their laws are such that it is quite easy to enforce without resistance the vigor and the cruelties attributed to slavery in the United States before the war. Indeed, according to the statements of negroes who have experienced both, that of the Sandwich Islands is the more atrocious.

"Chlausen's statements, however, were doubted until another victim reached San Francisco who had shipped as one of a cargo of men from the Azores to the Sandwich Islands. His statements more than confirmed those of the Swedish fugitive. The Azorean was nearly starved to death, and only granted the passports (which are indispensable to permit any one to leave the islands) because he could not long have survived had he remained. The slaveocratic agents in San Francisco, however, saw fit to deny his statements somewhat explicitly; and these people are so powerful in that city as to silence four out of the five principal daily papers. But immediately after these denials several letters from responsible persons—including a journalist, a merchant, and the chief officer of a vessel on which emigrants from the Azores had been transported—made explicit statements abundantly confirming those of the escaped Swede and Azorean, and adding instances of extreme and revolting sexual degradation forced upon the unhappy female victims. Even the Honolulu papers—bound in general to silence in the interest of slave-owners, who until very recently ruled the islands—published facts proving that the emigrants are held in a hideous servitude by force of arms, the military and police being used to compel by force not only the fulfilment of contracts made by frauds, but the performance of more labor than that for which the contracts provided, and securing their enforcement only so far as the slave-owner was benefited.

"A. Nielsen, mate of the barkentine Ella, previously overseer and interpreter on a Sandwich Island plantation, related in February last numerous instances in proof of the revolting slavery to which the Norwegians there were subjected. In the Drammens (Norway) Times of April 17th, is a letter from H. Lange, commisioner for Norwegian immigrants, based on direct testimony and his own observation. He states that one Norwegian girl was sold for seventy-five dollars to a Finlander, another to a negro, and a third to a missionary. (The word missionary as used in the islands means not only what we understand by it, but their descendants also.) Mr. Lange's statements are vouched for by the signatures of forty Norwegians. On Feb. 1, 1882, thirty-nine Norwegians working on the Papaikon plantation signed a letter published in the Chicago Scandinavian, detailing the slavery to which they were subjected, and the total denial of justice by the authorities of the islands, who appear to be owned by the planters.

"We now have even clerical testimony to the same effect. In the Budstiken, of Faribault, Minn., recently appeared a letter from Rev. Erik L. Petersen, recounting a conversation with Rev. Mr. Whipple, a brother of the well-known Episcopal bishop of Minnesota. Mr. Whipple resided on the islands for several years; he says that the Norwegian laborers are certainly slaves, under the sole authority of arrogant and unfeeling planters; that they are held as such for an indefinite period, that in general can terminate only with their lives, and are worse off than the negro slaves of the South before emancipation. Mr Petersen expects that Dr. Willis, Episcopal bishop of the Sandwich Islands, will report a similar state of facts to the Norwegian government.

"The limits of this article will not permit even an outline of the atrocities perpetrated under missionary rule in the Sandwich Islands. Bear in mind that until a very recent election these people had complete control there both of church and state, and are fully responsible for all these outrages, as are their backers in Great Britain and the United States, including the 'Congregational Club' of San Francisco ministers, who, after a full exposure had been made, volunteered to the defense of the perpetrators.

"We will now briefly specify two of their cunning outrages in the South Seas.

"In June, 1881, lying side by side at a Honolulu wharf, were two vessels—one the missionary brigantine Morning Star, flying the American flag; the other was the slaver Storm Bird. On the former there were daily prayers and hymns; 'everything was in order, and the fare and surroundings were luxurious enough for princes of the church. On the slaver there was an ominous silence. Chains, firearms, and a small howitzer were her ornaments.' On June 21st the Storm Bird sailed on her body-slaving expedition. On the 23d the other sailed for her soul-slaving destination, both in the South Seas. 'The very men who sang hymns on the missionary craft—the elite of Honolulu—were the very men who had furnished the chains, the shot-guns, and the Howitzer for the slaver. . . . The Storm Bird is owned by the Hawaiian government; the Morning Star was paid for, I believe, with ten-cent subscriptions from the Protestant school-children of the United States.'

"The witness to the above also details the horrible oppression to which the defenseless South Sea Islanders in the Sandwich Islands are subjected at the hands of their pious owners. In one case a new arrival (a newly-born child) was allowed to die on board the vessel to avoid breaking the Sabbath.

"At Taputeonea, one of the Line Islands, a branch of the London Missionary Society was started under Kabu, a native of the Sandwich Islands, who succeeded in converting the entire community, and securing their arms. Afterward one section of them became dissatisfied with his exertions, on which Kabu preached a crusade against them and massacred not less than one thousand men, women, and children; after which the wounded were collected together, piled in a heap and burnt, the Christian Kabu himself firing the combustibles.

"This intelligence was brought by the schooner Elizabeth to the Fiji Islands, and published in the Fiji Times, April 30, 1881. Of course this was afterward denied, but in the December following the schooner Pannomé returned to San Francisco from a trip to the Line Islands, and from its officers a full confirmation of the massacre was obtained. Kabu came to the Sandwich Islands in the slaver Storm Bird above mentioned, and was privately 'investigated.' He returned by the same conveyance to the Line Islands, 'invested with the office of a bishop. He still resides on the island carrying on trade and converting the heathen.' Now, then, pass around the box for more missionary contributions, and let us have a few hundred more Kabus to convert the natives or dispatch them to the other side of Jordan."

This is, indeed, a picture as mournful as true; the conduct portrayed is as abhorrent as it is wicked, and presents to the reader a faithful exhibit of the effects which Christianity produces upon the natives of pagan countries; and it enables one to arrive at a correct estimate of the real effects of spreading Christianity over the Edens of the Pacific Ocean, and in a similar manner over the pagan world generally. The same causes produce the same effects.

I will remark that the information here conveyed is fully verified and confirmed by other persons of the highest credibility whom I have met and who have visited the Sandwich Islands, and also the islands of the Southern Pacific. They narrate the same mournful tale, and describe in touching language the pernicious effects which Christian missionaries have produced upon those once fair and happy lands. It is well known that the introduction of Christianity into those islands was attended with an introduction, also, of venereal diseases, which, with other causes, has taken off two-thirds the original amount of population. By the knowledge of such facts as these the truth must dawn upon candid and intelligent people that Christianity is not the heavenly blessing to the world which its ardent admirers and advocates so persistently affirm, and that, sometimes at least, it is productive of great mischief and unhappiness.

STEAMING ON.

During the 17th, 18th, and 19th the heavy northern winds prevailed, attended some part of the time with rain, but as the wind changed from northeast to northwest the rain ceased, though the air remained chilly, making overcoats a decided necessity. The furious winds gradually abated, so that the ocean did not roll and toss so badly as it had in the several days past, and we made better time on our way to America's shores, which all are anxious to see. By the 20th the ocean had become comparatively calm, and we could walk the decks, move about in our rooms, or sit and converse with tolerable comfort. We all rejoice at this favorable change, and sincerely hope that the latter portion of our passage will be more pleasant than the first. For several days, however, the northwest wind was brisk enough to make the ocean rough, with white-caps in sight on all sides. But it is so much an improvement over the first three days that cheerfulness pervades all minds.

A DAY GAINED.

It is well known that in traveling west the days are lengthened out in proportion to the distance traveled; while in journeying east the reverse is the case, each day being shortened in the same proportion. In steaming east the day is shortened from thirty to forty minutes, according to the distance from the equator. At the equater the circumference of the earth east and west is twenty-four thousand miles, while at the poles it is nothing, or next to nothing. At the intermediate latitudes the circumference ranges from that of the equator to that at the poles, so that midway betwen the equator and pole it takes but about half the travel to make the circuit as at the equator.

It follows that in going round the world in an easterly direction a day is gained in number, though no more hours are seen, each day being a little shorter than the regular length; while in going round in the opposite direction one day is lost by each day being longer than a day at any one point. Some place, then, must be pitched upon where the day begins and ends, and that point is the one hundred and eightieth meridian of longitude from Greenwich (near London), which is precisely on the opposite side of the globe; thus, when it is noon at London it is midnight at the one hundred and eightieth degree of longitude, and by the usage of mariners the day begins at the latter point; and in traveling east when reaching that degree of longitude two days have to be counted of the same date. Thus, as we arrived at that meridian on Sunday, the 21st of May, we had two of Sunday, May the 21st, otherwise when we reach San Francisco we would be one day ahead of the reckoning. Accordingly we had virtually "two Sundays come together," but which was the holiest of the two the clergymen and missionaries on board have not decided in my hearing. There was also very little worshiping done on either Sunday. I thought perhaps Bro. Clark would be invited to hold forth in the way of a sermon, in which case I would somewhat transcend my regular rule of total abstinence from intoxicating or irritating sermons, and would have gone and heard him; but no such invitation was extended, and Bro. Clark did not preach. We conversed and debated all the same, and were undoubtedly just as happy as though one had preached and the other listened.

Of the passengers making up our number we are a somewhat mixed class—some Americans, several English tourists, some Scotchmen, a few Germans, several Japanese on their way to America on business or to acquire education, a few Frenchmen, and some of other nationalities. The Americans and English predominate. The latter are largely "globe trotters," as those are familiarly called who make the tour of the world. Two of the young men aboard are those I traveled with from Calcutta to the Himalaya Mountains, and afterwards met in Ceylon. We occasionally compare notes of travel, and talk of the remarkable things we have seen. They propose to spend two or three months in the United States. Several of the Englishmen with us are decidedly intelligent men, of whom much can be learned. Upon the whole, we have an agreeable company. Some of the young returning Americans spend their time in playing cards, but there is far less gaming on this steamer than is usually seen on the fashionable Atlantic lines. Though we are as a whole a most respectable class of people, we have one lively, jolly female returning home to America, and who has no companion. She seems, however, to be on very good terms with the purser, with an occasional smile for the captain. If she can obtain a passage with a few smiles it is cheaper than to fork over two hundred and fifty dollars. The captain is a young man, and quite affable at the table and elsewhere. The physician of the steamer is a well-informed, social gentleman, quite interesting in conversation. The first steward visits our room nearly every day, and being very fond of telling stories, we have heard enough of them to make a good sized volume were they written out in full. He is quite Liberal in his religious views, and I notice he seems more in sympathy with my heterodoxy than with Bro. Clark's orthodoxy. So we while away the tedious hours and days wishing the passage to end and the piers of the Golden Gate to heave in sight.

Friday, May 27th.—For four or five days the wind has been southerly, sometimes southeast, and sometimes southwest, with much cloudiness and some rain. The air has also been cold, though the wind has been from a warm direction. We have such an abundance of wind that the Pacific is in fact quite unpacific. The waves run tolerably high, and the rolling of the vessel hardly finds a cessation. When, however, it is reasonably smooth I put in my time pretty steadily at writing. Some days I have written nearly fifty pages of two hundred words each. I sometimes think it is well that I have writing to do, for the passage is so monotonous that there is little or no variety. It is probably one of the most untraveled routes on any of the oceans. We steam along day after day and never see a steamer, a sailing ship, or craft of any kind. There is also not an island or bit of land to be seen beteen Yokohama and San Francisco. In fact there is nothing to be seen save the almost endless waste of water, the white-caps upon its surface, the leaden, gloomy sky, with a dozen or so of black sea birds, probably "Mother Carey's chickens," which keep near the steamer day after day. If a ship should be wrecked in these lonely waters it would probably be weeks and months before any friendly ship would happen along to give a helping hand. There is o little traffic being carried on in the vicinity of the North Pole that ships here are few and far between. A more lonely portion of the earth can scarcely be found unless by going five hundred miles still further north. There a ship is never seen unless it is some poor adventurer in search of the North Pole, or looking for some one who has himself been in search of the same mythical pole.

I have had occasion to think while passing over these thousands of miles of watery waste: What an amount of room unoccupied! Here are five thousand miles of water without any land whatever. Here is room enough for a large continent, and still leave five hundred or a thousand miles of water on each side. Here is space for landed territory enough for homes for hundreds of millions of people, and now it is wholly unoccupied, save by the fishes. We occasionally see some of these, particularly porpoises in schools, rolling and tumbling along as though intent on some important enterprise. I heard the captain say a whale or two had been seen some little distance from the steamer, but I was not fortunate enough to bring my vision to bear upon his whaleship.

Saturday, May 28th.—We have had some sun to day, this being about the first we have seen of his majesty since we left Japan. We have almost begun to conclude that the god of the solar system does not reign up in this northern country. Indeed, it has been so long since we have seen the sun that even the most devout Christian feels an inclination to offer a few oblations to his bright countenance.

The engine stopped for half an hour to-day, and the passengers were suddenly thrown into a troublous panic. The worst apprehensions were indulged in by some, fearing that an accident had happened which might keep us back a few days longer from San Francisco, which we now feel is almost in sight. The damage, however, was very slight; a nut had got off, or something of the kind, and a journal somewhat heated. These difficulties were soon adjusted, and we were again steaming on our way, bearing in a southeast direction toward the port of destination. As we are now making south we are leaving the frigidity of the northern latitudes and are finding a more genial air—a change agreeable to all. We are at last so nearly approaching the haven of rest that we are anxiously counting the hours to the time when the Golden Gate will meet our gladdened gaze. The record of the days' runs in miles we have made since leaving Yokohama is as follows, taken at noon each day: 230, 299, 202, 253, 298, 305, 273, 270, 262, 268, 275, 276, 276, 298, 273, 273, 248, 276. The latter figures bring us up to 12 o'clock to-day, leaving at that hour one hundred and sixty miles yet to be traveled to reach San Francisco, making a total of 4,815 miles, that distance occupying eighteen and a half days; for we will undoubtedly be inside of the Golden Gate before daylight to-morrow morning. The severe storm we encountered in the fore part of the passage detained us fully a day and added not a little to our discomfort. The steamers of this line do not make as good time as some of those running on the Atlantic between New York and Liverpool. There is no competition, and the saving of coal is a very important item. The passage from Yokohama to San Francisco has been made in fifteen and a half days, but that is unusual, eighteen days being the more common time. The passage from Yokohama to San Francisco is usually two or three days shorter than the return trip, in which case, on account of winds or something else, no divergence is made to the north as in the eastward-bound passage.

LAND, HO!

Tuesday, May 30th.—The expectation of reaching the Golden Gate (the entrance to the harbor of San Francisco) in the latter part of the night caused my sleep to be hardly as sound as usual, and I was up betimes, for I was anxious to get an early view of the outer portals of the gate. It was not yet four o'clock when I was on the upper deck, and, sure enough, here directly before us loomed up the two portals of the Golden Gate, as welcome bits of rocky terra-firma as have ever met my gaze. I was truly glad once more to set my eyes upon rock or land that belongs to America. It is just ten months this morning since the Ethiopia sailed out of New York and bore me away out of sight of the Eastern shores of America, and the period of that length has set a keen edge upon my appetite to look upon the Western confines of the same grand continent.

I was among the earliest of the passengers who put in an appearance on deck to welcome the first appearance of land, but I found on watch one of the missionary doctresses, who, having been absent many years, I could easily understand she must be anxious to look again upon the American continent. I found her conversational, and we passed an hour or more in descanting upon the welcome sight of the Golden Gate as we slowly steamed into the entrance of the grand harbor, the appearance of the rocks on either side, as well as some reminiscences of China, where for seven years has been her home. The morning air was cool, but, being otherwise pleasant, overcoats and wraps protected us sufficiently from the morning chill.

I need not tell you that we welcomed the Golden Gate most cordially, and, aside from its being the avenue to our homes, three thousand miles further east, we thought it grand and picturesque. Golden Gate consists of a wall of rock five miles in length, on each side of a channel a mile in width, though the outer entrance is not so wide. The rocks vary in hight, but the highest portions are only a few hundred feet above the ocean. The sun had not yet risen, but we had light enough to enable us to obtain a tolerably good outline of the rocky passage. We could hardly determine how much soil there is upon the rocks, whether there is much vegetation, or whether there are residents on these bleak outposts. It is unlikely, however, that many would choose to make their homes here. As we entered the harbor we saw here and there, at a distance, buildings in elevated positions.

At the ebbing and flowing of the tides the current in this harbor entrance is necessarily pretty strong; but as there is at all times a depth of thirty-two feet, the largest ships and steamers have not the slightest difficulty in making ingress or egress. The harbor of San Francisco includes a portion of the bay, which is some fifty miles in length, with a width of about nine miles. It is decidedly the best harbor on the Pacific coast, and behind but few in the world. All the ships on the globe could find a safe retreat here, with room to spare. A large tonnage enters and departs through the Golden Gate every year; and for a hundred years to come, and more, must largely increase. San Francisco must for all time be the principal commercial port of the whole Pacific coast, thousands of miles in extent. When the United States obtained possession of California it was a great acquisition indeed. It forms the western boundary of one of the greatest countries on the globe, where dwells a people gathered from nearly all countries and possessing an aggregate of greater advantages than can be found in any other land.

With the dawn of day all hands were on deck gladly seeing what they could of the grand harbor, and after we had cast anchor within the entrance some hours were passed principally gazing upon what could be seen of American shores. Some government posts and forts are to be seen, but I did not learn enough of these to give much information with reference to them.

We soon learned that we could not steam up directly to the dock, as Atlantic steamers usually do when they arrive from Europe after a brief visit from the quarantine officers; but along in the morning, after we had been lying at anchor two hours or more, the government physician visited us with his little steamer to see whether we were in a sufficiently healthy condition to be permitted to approach the dock, go ashore, and mix with the good people in the city. Our having eleven hundred Chinamen as live freight came near proving a serious disadvantage to us. The prejudice against this immigration is so active that steamers bearing the Celestials to these shores are scarcely welcome, and are sometimes detained several days in quarantine. We soon learned that two steamers which had come into the harbor several days ago were still detained, though the anxiety of officers and passengers to go on shore is of the most active character.

Here was a trouble staring us in the face which we had hardly anticipated. We had fancied that when within the Golden Gate it would be but a short time before we would be alongside the dock, and after an examination of the custom-house officers would be permitted to swell the population of the city, and to seek friends wherever we could find them. But here a vexatious trouble rose before us. After stemming the storm and tempest, the wind and waves, for eighteen days and a half, eager to again tread upon American soil, here arose before us the unwelcome prospect that we might be held one, two, five, or more days in quarantine before we would be allowed to set a foot upon land. This was intensely uncheering, and made the faces of the passengers of the Oceanic elongate very perceptibly. "Oh, this is too bad," said everybody; "after being out on the stormy and lonely ocean as long as we have, and now after getting so near the safe haven of our hopes, to be detained for a week, or even a day, is too bad, quite too bad; in fact, perfectly awful."

For two or three hours we were in this state of painful suspense, oscillating between hope and fear, wholly ignorant as to what our fate would be. And the officers of the ship were unable to relieve our anxiety. They were in hopes we would be allowed to pass on in a few hours, but they did not know but we would be detained a week; such power has the quarantine officials over a poor, hapless, storm-tossed bark of the ocean. The anxiety of the officers of the Oceanic was by no means less than our own. Some of them have homes and families in San Francisco, which of course they were most anxious to visit; and as the steamer has but a limited number of days in which to discharge her cargo and take in another, and start on her return trip, they were naturally extremely averse to lying at anchor out in the harbor for an uncertain length of time. But who can tell what men with a little brief authority may decide to do? As we have a great body of Chinamen as a part of our cargo, and public prejudice is so strong against them, this slight excuse, as remarked, will perhaps be sufficient to prevent their being landed, and the passengers, as a matter of course, will have to abide the same fate. Our anxiety and uncertainty for a few hours can be easily understood.

We were, however, in a clean, healthy condition, and that was very much in our favor. There had not been a case of disease or dangerous sickness, even among the Chinamen, during the entire passage. One of the celestials had accidentally met with a fall and broken his arm, and that was the most serious thing that had taken place. Our cleanliness and healthiness were very much to our advantage. We learned that one of the steamers held in quarantine has some seventy-five cases of small-pox on board, and it is not strange that that steamer should not be suffered to touch the shore. But our condition was so unlike that that our fate seemed more merciful. The physicians from the quarantine station, on a prominent island a mile or two away, after making a thorough inspection, and finding everything in such a clean and healthy condition, and the ship's doctor having such an excellent record to present of the healthiness of the ship's passengers, graciously ordered that after a thorough fumigation among the Chinese portion of the live freight, we might in the afternoon steam up beside the wharf and disembark. This was welcome news. We concluded we could endure a few hours more of detention, if by two or three o'clock we could make our entrance into the city. A more cheerful cast of countenance was worn by all the passengers. Hope again remained with us.

GREETING FROM FRIENDS.

The agent of this line of steamers, who early visited our steamer after we had cast anchor, brought a letter for me, which, though unexpected, was more than welcome. I perused it even with avidity, and was made happy by the knowledge that dear friends in the city are standing with outstretched hands to receive me. It was more than I had looked for. The letter was from my good friend Byron Adonis, and had evidently been written several days, it not, of course, being known when I might arrive. It had been left with the parties who early visit the steamer, with instructions that it be delivered at once upon arrival. As flattering as the letter is, let me lay it before you:

SAN FRANCISCO, May 25, 282 (Bruno Calendar).

ILLUSTRIOUS AND HONORED CHIEF: Hundreds of thousands of faithful friends and noble Freethinkers greet you, and with beating hearts await your coming. We have lighted the fires for you, and they are burning brightly all along the line from the Pacific to the Atlantic. We are pushing the priestly enemy to the wall.

Arrangements are being made for you at the Baldwin Hotel—the palace erected by the famous "Lucky Baldwin," who is, I am informed, a front pew-holder in the Temple of Nature. Friends will be at the wharf to meet you when the steamer touches. This note is forwarded by special favor of Capt. Hoyt, of the Merchants' Exchange Service, who intercepts the steamer. Hail and welcome is the greeting that awaits you.

Fraternally, BYRON ADONIS.

Of course such a letter could not do otherwise than make me happy. Accompanying the letter was a printed circular, designed for sending over the country; and though it may have the appearance of vanity on my part, I will venture to give you the following portions of it:

ALL FOR THE NOBLE CAUSE.

To the Liberals of the Pacific Coast, collectively and individually.

Dear Sir: The undersigned, an Executive Committee, appointed by Auxiliary Liberal League 190, of the National Liberal League, to make preparations to tender an ovation to Mr. D. M. Bennett, respectfully address you on this matter of vital importance to our noble cause.

You are aware that the bigots and fanatics have tracked Mr. Bennett with a merciless persecution; and they finally, by decoy letter, through their vile tool, Anthony Comstock, had him arrested, tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary. You are aware that the notorious and infamous trinity of Benedict, Colgate, and Comstock reveled in this triumph of their Christian ingenuity and deadly hate. They thought that the penitentiary would be Mr. Bennett's grave, and that, entombed with him in that grave, would lie the fearless TRUTH SEEKER, and the great publishing house he had built up for the destruction of Superstition.

You are aware that Mr. Bennett survived his tortures and torturers; that he was received, upon his release, with the greatest honors in a great public demonstration in New York. This demonstration, and the largest petition ever sent to Washington praying for his release, while yet a prisoner at Albany, are evidences of his innocence, of the justness and nobleness of the cause for which he suffered, and the deep public appreciation of the man. You are aware that the Liberals of the United States sent him to Europe; that he returned, and again the Liberals sent him on his around-the-world tour. He is coming back to us, and will at an early day arrive in this city from China and Japan.

Never in human history has there been a more noble display of friendship and fidelity than the Liberals of America, Canada, and England manifested toward Mr. Bennett during his persecutions, trial, and imprisonment, and never did man more worthily deserve this friendship and fidelity. He has stood up boldly and bravely for the sacred cause of mental liberty and for civil and religious liberty, and he has bravely and boldly hurled defiance at the bigots and fanatics who sought not only the destruction of his property, but even of his life, by swearing it away, and incarcerating him in the bastile at Albany. With what fortitude and heroism did this venerable sage endure this merciless imprisonment! With what devotion and unselfishness did the Liberals of America stand by him to the bitter end, never failing, never flinching in their touching, beautiful, and heroic devotion. Glorious triumph of the man and the men who could thus do and dare for Truth and Liberty.

You remember the plaudits of true and loyal souls that greeted Mr. Bennett as he departed by the Atlantic! Let true and loyal souls greet him as he returns by the Pacific! Let us unite as one man to give him a hearty and hospital welcome. Let us open our hearts and purses to give him a Pacific Coast welcome that will ring along and across the continent, that will be glad music to his ears as he journeys, after his long and perilous travels, to the sanctum made sacred to us by his sufferings and sorrows.

All true lovers of civil and religious liberty, whether Freethinkers, Jews, Christians, or others, must unite solidly to prevent any and all encroachments of the church upon the state, must unite to oppose and defeat all special legislation like that carried through by Comstock's Society for the (alleged) Suppression of Vice, but really for the extermination of Freethought publications; or such special legislation as now attempts to enforce a Christian Sabbath upon the people of California. Dangers threaten the republic. The arrest and imprisonment of D. M. Bennett was a blow at the rights of every citizen who dares to express his honest convictions as becomes an American and a freeman, who has too much pride and manhood to bow to bigots, or believe in organized superstition, based upon immaculate frauds. We must be united, we must carry on the conflict against superstition with unflinching courage; we must triumph, for in that triumph is the perpetuity, peace, and prosperity of the republic, and the final happiness of the human family. Keep the sacred fires of Liberty burning all along the line.

BYRON ADONIS, DR. J. D. MCLENNAN,
A. BERENZ, SR., DR. G. C. HOADLEY,
DR. J. L. YORK, JOHN R. KELSO,
PHILIP COWEN.

These documents bore unmistakable evidence to me that I was being looked for, and that my friends were disposed to extend to me a hearty welcome. This assurance caused my heart to swell with gratitude. No appreciative man could fail to be happy with the possession of such friends.

I should state that while the quarantine physician was making his examination a small harbor steamer approached, bearing my friend A. Berenz, Sr., who had come out several miles with the steamer to take me on shore. I felt highly honored by this mark of kind appreciation, and would gladly have accompanied him to the city; but upon application to the quarantine physician for permission, he decided that the Oceanic would be permitted to go to the wharf and that all the passengers must remain on board; so the little steamer returned without me.

In a few hours the process of fumigation, or smoking by the use of disinfectants the hold, the steerage apartments, and the state-rooms, was completed, and after partaking of one more dinner on the Oceanic, the steam was again applied, and at two o'clock we were alongside the wharf—our long journey over the Pacific—which with us had not been pacific—being ended.

Numerous persons who were expecting friends by the Oceanic had received intelligence of her arrival, and assembled to the number of some hundreds in all, to meet the long-expected. Mine were among the number. I soon spied the committee who were in waiting for me, Mr. Berenz who had called upon me out in the harbor being one of them. The others were Byron Adonis, Dr. J. L. York, and H. W. Walker. As the steamer was rounding the corner of the wharf to come alongside and enter the slip, I reached down from where I was standing and took them by the hand and had a hearty shake, glad indeed to receive such a greeting from such true and steadfast friends.

In a few minutes I was down with them, and though all was hurry and bustle in the landing of passengers and their baggage, it was not long before the custom-house officials were looking through the trunks, packages, and parcels to see if silks, jewelry, opium, cigars, or other contraband goods were to be found. I am pleased to say I had nothing that detained them long, or that they deemed liable to duty. The box containing my stereopticon and views was sent to the custom warehouse for future examination, and I was able early to accompany my friends to the Baldwin, where most excellent accommodations had been prepared for me. I must admit I was very glad to reach the fine and flourishing city of San Francisco, and to meet such a cordial reception from dear and true friends.

And now, kind readers, as you have seen me safely across the Pacific, and as I propose to pass some two weeks in the Golden State, this seems a fitting place to close this letter. Sincerely yours, D. M. B.

Twenty Days in California.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 6, 1882.

DEAR FRIENDS: Since arriving here I find very little opportunity for writing, so many friends call to see me, and I have so many places to visit, that my time is wholly occupied; but I must give you some account of what I am doing here, as I propose to make a pretty full report to you from the time I left home until I reach it again. Let me say, then, that from the steamer we proceeded directly to the Baldwin House, where a suite of rooms were awaiting my occupancy. I soon made a visit to Mr. Adonis, where I found nearly a hundred letters and TRUTH SEEKERS awaiting me—letters from friends in all parts of the country. I am so often reminded of the partiality of my numerous friends that I can not forget it. My gratitude has unceasing cause for exercise, and I love to remember the many kindnesses so freely poured upon me. I received more invitations to visit towns in various parts of the Western states than I can possibly accept. Gladly would I go to every town where patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER reside, and take my many friends by the hand and make their personal acquaintance, but as it is laid down on my programme to be home in a year from the time I left it, I will be compelled to visit but a small portion of those who have bid me come.

So many are anxious to see me and call at my rooms that I cannot find time to even read all the letters and papers I received this day, though I prolong my inspection to the small hours of the night. During the evening quite a number of ladies and gentlemen called at my rooms, and I was only too glad to see them, and cheerfully passed several hours in conversation.

Wednesday was spent in answering the most urgent letters I had received, in overhauling the books which had been sent me from home, and in receiving calls from friends.

Thursday, the first of June, was faithfully occupied in putting up the flower seeds which I had brought with me from the "Holy Land" and other places, and mailing them to the hundred parties who had kindly written me to Yokohama. As six kinds of seeds were for each person, and had to be put up separately, marked and stamped, it may be easily understood it was no small job to accomplish, and that day had to be prolonged into the night to finish it up.

Friday, June 2d.—On this day I made a trip out to Petaluma. I took a steamer for San Quentin, then the cars twelve miles to San Rafael, and then changed to another train for Petaluma, the whole distance being about forty miles. This route abounds in the most picturesque scenery; the ride up the bay is lovely, and the hills about San Rafael are very beautiful. The great drawback in connection with the hills of California is their losing their verdure so early in the season. Here at the first of June, when everything should look green, the hills are sere and yellow. In the spring the wild oats which universally abound upon the hills have a very green appearance, but with the discontinuance of the rainy season and the short life of the oats, they early become yellow and dead. There appears to be very little native grass grown in California. The pasturage is mostly of the wild oats alluded to, and the hay for stock of all kinds is wheat and oats, cut a little before they are ripe, and cured in the same way as hay in the East. The farmers are just now busily engaged in cutting this hay. The crop is abundant, and the shocks are numerous in many a field I pass. I judge a good yield here is about three tons to the acre. Cattle and horses eat it well and thrive upon it. Clover and timothy seem to be unknown; a good deal of the alfalfa is grown, and is well adapted to this climate. If rains are not too deficient three crops are cut during the season, yielding in the aggregate five or six tons to the acre. This is a very good substitute for clover, and is readily eaten by horses and cattle.

There is a deficiency of trees upon the hills and mountain ranges, which if they were clothed in green would much improve the appearance of the landscape Though the hills and pasture lands are sere and yellow as described, the wild oats though dead afford excellent feed for stock, which thrive well through the summer.

Arriving at Petaluma I found my friend Philip Cowen awaiting me. I stopped a few hours at his store; several friends called to see me, with whom I was glad to become acquainted. After taking dinner with Mr. Cowen and his family, he took me in a carriage several miles across the valley among the farms to an old missionary house of former times, built of adobe dried in blocks and used somewhat like bricks. Not a little soil in the valley is of this adobe; it is fertile in a high degree, and produces excellent crops. It has to be worked soon after rain, being very stiff and intractable at other times. I passed many fine residences and pleasant homes. This is the noted Sonoma Valley, and is one of the many fertile valleys of California. Crops of wheat and oats are abundant, but little Indian corn is raised here. The fences are mostly of wire, and are kept in very good order.

After returning to Petaluma I called with Mr. Cowen upon the two editors of the town, and had some pleasant conversation, touching various countries of the world. After this Mr. Cowen took me some six miles in another direction to the residence of Mr. W. H. Pepper, an intelligent patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and here I stopped over night. Mr. Pepper has a beautiful place and a very fine residence. His business is growing fruit and fruit-trees. He has a fine nursery, with a fair proportion of ornamental trees and shrubbery. He has some forty acres in fruits, principally cherries, apricots, peaches, and pears. The cherries are just in their prime, and the pickling and packing of them and sending them to market makes very busy times. His cherry crop is very large, and, if I remember correctly, will amount to some hundreds of bushels. California is certainly one of the very finest fruit countries in the world. I have seen nowhere a better display of fruit than the San Francisco markets present. Apricots are far more abundant than I have ever seen them anywhere. They are lovely, both in appearance and flavor.

Mr. Pepper has offered his beautiful farm and home for an educational institution and home for orphan and friendless children, where they can learn agriculture, horticulture, and other practical branches of business, and all to be entirely free from sectarian education and dogmatical instruction. His purpose is at the next session of the legislature of the state to offer to them this beautiful property for the purposes indicated, with the guarantee from them that his stipulations shall be adhered to, and that they shall take the management of the institution under their supervision. If he fails to effect a satisfactory arrangement with the legislature he intends to present the property to the Liberals of the state, and for the same purpose, if they will carry out his instructions and conduct the institution upon the general plan which he wishes to see executed. His object is a grand one, and his generous purposes praiseworthy in the highest degree. Every state should have an institution of the character Mr. Pepper contemplates, where the orphans and the friendless can be taught useful and practical branches of industry, and where their education shall be entirely free from ecclesiasticism, supernaturalism, and sectarianism. I would be glad to see the enterprise carried into successful operation. I can but admire Mr. Pepper's unusual generosity and commendable public spirit. There is much yet to be done in a similar direction in various other parts of the country. Education for the young, and homes for such of them as are helpless and unfortunate, where they may not be forced to imbibe theological dogmas, are necessities which will always exist. It does not appear that a "kind Providence" takes sufficient care of the fatherless and homeless, and this most needful work is left for man to attend to.

I had a very pleasant visit with Mr. and Mrs. Pepper. The latter is a woman of fine intelligence, and one of the neatest of housekeepers. The Investigator and TRUTH SEEKER are taken and read here with great interest, and no people stand higher among those who best know them. A pleasanter home is not found among ten thousand. Mr. Pepper showed me over the entire place of two hundred and fifty acres, and then took me in a carriage back to Petaluma. Several days could have been very agreeably passed in such a quiet and pleasant retreat; and I was urged to remain longer, but could not take the time to carry out the kind invitation.

After having pleasant interviews with several friends and Liberals of the locality, Mr. Cowen accompanied me on my return to San Francisco. Mr. Cowen is an earnest, devoted Liberal, and has made not a few sacrifices in sustaining what he believes to be the truth. He is a Hebrew by birth, but is wholly emancipated from the theology and superstition inherited from his people. He is a consistent and intelligent worker in the Liberal cause, and has done much to aid THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal publications in the struggle for existence, which seems to be their fate.

The next day, Sunday, was largely passed in my rooms in entertaining friends who called upon me, and a few hours were pleasantly spent with Mr. Cowen in looking over the more aristocratic portions of the city, particularly "Nob Hill," where the wealthy ones reside who have made vast fortunes in mining stocks, railroad stocks, banking, etc. Here are homes which cost a million or two of dollars, and possess all that could be desired in the way of grandeur and convenience. I notice most of the dwellings are constructed of wood, though many of them are large, showy, and expensive, four and five stories high, with bay windows in abundance and exterior decorations elaborate in character. The finer buildings are painted of a light color to represent stone, and are sanded over, so that to a casual observer they easily pass for stone edifices. I think the wood is largely used for dwellings in consequence of the general apprehension of earthquakes, the shocks of which are more frequent on the Pacific slope than on the eastern side of the continent. Wood and frame buildings of course stand up much better under the trying ordeal of earthquake shakings than houses of stone and brick. Houses of wood, also, are not so much affected by the dampness of the sea air and fogs which greatly prevail here. The larger hotels and business houses are of stone or brick, but of the 35,000 buildings in the city over 20,000 are constructed of wood.

The knobs or hills on the southern side of the city are more abrupt and steep than would be just desirable, making the climbing up and down the steeps rather laborious for a city, but many of the richest residences are on the summits of these hills, two or three hundred feet above the city level.

I see here a feature in street railroads which I have not met with before, and that is the cable roads. The cars are run by stationary engines, which operate a wire cable, perhaps an inch and a half in size, running in an excavation below the track. Roads from two to four miles in length have a double cable the entire distance, operating on pullies and rollers, and this is kept in constant motion. The cars clasp and let go of this cable by means of a clamp or grip, which seizes the cable in an instant and goes along with it until a passenger wishes to get off or on, and this is accomplished much quicker than cars, drawn by horses, can stop and start, and the speed made is better, and this the same up and down these steep hills, at the rate of perhaps five miles an hour. It is easier for these roads to run in straight lines, but they nevertheless turn corners and curve considerably without difficulty. The expense of building roads of this kind is obviously several times greater than ordinary roads, but they have many advantages over horse roads, and when travel is extensive perhaps in the end are not more expensive. Three lines of these roads in the city, I learn, have been in successful operation for several years and are regarded a success. Two or more cars go together, accomodating three times as many passengers as a horse car, with the same conductor, the manipulator of the grip or clamp taking the place of the driver. Probably also less help is required to run the engine which furnishes the power for the entire line of cars than would be required to care for the horses, were they depended upon to do the same work. In riding up these steep hills the steam power is certainly preferable, and the passenger does not have to expend the same amount of sympathy and pity for the steam-engine two miles away, and wholly unseen, which he would be compelled to bestow upon the poor horses were they forced to struggle up these laborious hills and pull up ten or fifteen people behind. I almost wonder why New York and other eastern cities have not adopted these cable roads. Fire and water connected with the engine can certainly perform the labor easier than horses.

SAN FRANCISCO

Is certainly a wonderful city when its age is taken into consideration, which is really but about thirty-five years. Something over one hundred years ago some Spanish Franciscan friars established a post here for the conversion of the Indians to Christianity, and the same was maintained till 1835. In the following year a town was laid out, called Yerba Bueno, the first house in it being built by an American. The present name was given it in 1847, when it had less than five hundred inhabitants. In the following year it lost the greater share of its male inhabitants, who rushed to the "gold-diggings," which had just been discovered; and in the next year, 1849, it became one of the most famous places in the world, and was suddenly numbered among the noted commercial ports of the earth. Its harbor, however, was filled with shipping, deserted by their crews, who rushed to the mines to make their fortunes far more rapidly than by following the sea. Thousands from the Eastern states flocked over the plains, and the general scramble for gold exceeded anything ever before known. A large portion of the people of the young town lived in tents, and the prices of the necessaries and comforts of life reached enormous figures.

The city grew up like a mushroom; but in 1850 it was devastated by five great fires, which swept away every building in the business quarter, and destroyed property to the amount of $16,000 000. But every fire was followed at once by a better class of buildings; and for years the merchants, for prudential reasons, kept the most valuable portion of their wares stored in ships and other vessels far out in the harbor beyond the reach of fire.

For five years the "diggings" turned out gold most bountifully, amounting to not less than $10,000,000 per year, and San Francisco grew as never city grew before. But in 1854 the gold yield began to decline, wages fell, importations decreased, and many business houses and dwellings were without tenants. But after another five years the agricultural resources of this remarkable country began to be developed, which contributed to the healthy growth of the city.

Soon after this the discovery of the Comstock Lode in Nevada, and other circumstances, brought great prosperity to San Francisco, and upon the flood tide of this wonderful good fortune the city steadily rose till 1869, when another reaction took place, arising from over-speculation and inflation in land and the anticipated benefits to be derived from the trans-continenal railroad, bringing the Pacific coast in direct communication with the East. But temporary depression could not long keep San Francisco down; general business became active, and wages remained high.

In 1851 to 1856 vigilance committees took control of the city to counteract the demoralizing effects of the lawless scoundrels who flocked here in large numbers. Summary proceedings were resorted to in many instances, and the city was largely freed from their presence. In 1850 the population was 34,000; in 1860, 56,000; in 1870, 150,000. At the present time it is not far from 250,000, some 25,000 of whom are Chinese.

The assessed value of the land is $150,000,000; the buildings, $50,000,000; the personal property, $75,000,000. These estimates are probably low, as the entire wealth of the city is estimated at $500,000,000, besides the $250,000,000 in other places owned by the wealthy men of the city, making the entire wealth of the city $750,000,000—a wonderful result in thirty five years. There are twenty-five commercial banks, with a banking capital of $50,000,000, besides fifteen savings banks, with 75,000 depositors and $75,000,000 in deposits in all. The dividends of incorporated companies amount to about $30,000,000 annually, nearly half of which is from mining interests, and the balance from banks, gas and water companies, railroads, etc. Monopoly is supreme here, and rules with its usual heavy hand. Fully two-thirds of the dividends named are from property outside of the city, and is held by persons who own not one-twentieth of the property of the city.

In 1875 the sales of real estate in the city amounted to $35,000,000, and of the mining stocks at the stock boards to $260,000,000. Though the city cannot equal London, Paris, and New York in the magnitude of its stock operations, it is not, considering its age, very far behind. Extensive stock-gambling operations have been conducted here for years. When the silver lodes of Nevada were discovered, San Francisco capitalists were required to furnish the money to open the mines and build the mills, but they also drew the immense profits which were realized in those bonanzas, and they thereby were able to keep in their hands the stocks and proceeds of the same.

This was indeed a wonderful piece of good luck for a city almost in its infancy to be able to control such vast wealth as the Comstock mines turned out. This ownership, however, had two sides to it, for while one set of mines had paid out $70,000,000 in dividends, another set had called for $40,000,000 in assessments before the end of 1875. Three companies had collected each more than $2,000 000 in assessments, five others each more than $1,500,000, three others more than $1,000,000 each, and ten others more than $500,000 each. The greater part of these levies were made to open and work mines, which have never paid a dividend, and never succeeded even in finding any considerable amount of mineral.

The annual tax paid in San Francisco for state and municipal purposes is $6,000,000, in addition to a greater sum for federal purposes. $8,000,000 per year is paid in duties on imported goods. The internal revenue is $1,500,000 per year. The total taxes of the city are not less than $25,000,000. Is there another city in the world thirty-five years old that is able to make and pay out one-half of that sum?

The enterprise that has been shown in making solid real estate where the bay once covered is wonderful in itself. Where hotels and business houses now stand, more than half a mile from the water of the bay, ships and schooners once rode and lay at anchor. Fully three hundred acres of the business portion of the city have thus been taken from Neptune and devoted to the service of Mammon. Where the tide once rose and fell, where large vessels floated and fishes swam, is now solid land, covered with towering warehouses and stores. $30,000 000 was used in this way, and the level area of the city thereby greatly increased.

The business portion of the town is about a mile square, while retail stores, residences, etc., extend for miles south and west. The streets are wide and regular, the most of them running at right angles. A considerable portion of the buildings are stately and rich, far exceeding in magnificence and architectural beauty those of many cities I have seen, more than a thousand years old.

THE HOTELS OF SAN FRANCISCO

Would be an honor to the finest city in the world. In fact, the city can boast of the largest hotel on the globe. Let me speak of the Baldwin House, in which I have very pleasant rooms. It was completed in 1876; it is located in the very center of the city; it occupies an entire square, fronting on Market, Eddy, and Powell streets. It is six stories in hight, and has 480 rooms, with accommodations for 600 guests. The interior is magnificently frescoed; its dining-room being a marvel of elegance; its billiard-room is replete with every modern convenience; its reading-room is stocked with all the publications of the day and the necessary concomitants of ease and quiet; its office is adorned with a splendid counter of Mexican onyx and marble—something not often met with. Within the same building is the now famous Baldwin Theater, rarely excelled in elegance and beauty. This hotel is one of the most complete structures of its kind in the United States; neither expense nor labor has been spared in its construction. Its internal arrangements are most perfect, while the beauty of its adornment are all that could be desired. As a place of residence for families or single people it combines the seclusion of home, desirableness of situation, easy access to stores and hacks, and every other mode of conveyance in the city.

I was taken through the basement story of this large structure, and was highly interested to witness the perfect order and system pervading the different departments. The cooking is done by the most extensive and improved modes, in a room far cleaner than the kitchens of most hotels. The bake-room is also large, well-fitted up with all the necessary conveniences, and here bread, cake, and pastries, etc., are turned out in large quantities. The store-room is nearly seventy-five feet square, and fully supplied with all the articles necessary in the hotel; a storekeeper is here at all times to fill the orders of those wanting supplies, and every person is charged with whatever he gets. There are large refrigerators for meats, others for butter, and cool cellars for vege tables of all kinds. Another large department is the laundry. Here are several washing machines in constant operation, propelled by the steam engine, ironing machines as well, and everything as neat as the most tidy housewife could wish. The wine room is almost a marvel to behold. Mr. Baldwin has extensive vineyards in the vicinity of Los Angeles, and manufactures his own wine, of which he has hundreds of casks on hand. I was shown a sample of brandy of his own manufacture; I thought it equal to any I had ever tasted; of this he has an immense quantity, larger than I dare to state.

The patent apparatus for the elevator is on this floor, and is so constructed that an accident can hardly occur. The whole of this immense floor is thoroughly ventilated, clean and sweet; no bad smells can be perceived. The establishment manufactures its own gas, and is independent of gas companies, and I think also of the water works. It is supplied with water from a deep well, which is pumped to the top of the hotel, from which reservoir the entire building is supplied. Every room is furnished with hot and cold water. The parlors are beyond my ability to describe; their lace, silk, and damask curtains are finer than I have ever seen. The furniture is of the richest description. I can hardly speak in too high praise of this well-conducted hotel, and cheerfully recommend it to all my friends who may have occasion to stop a few days in San Francisco.

THE PALACE HOTEL

Must also have a passing notice, for it is the largest and most imposing hotel in the world. It occupies an entire block of land on the southwest corner of New Montgomery and Market streets, rearing its huge fronts a hundred and twenty feet, and being three hundred and fifty feet by two hundred and seventy-five. It is seven stories high, and has in all seven hundred and fifty five rooms for guests alone, all of which are richly furnished throughout. Twelve hundred guests can be accommodated. No less than two and a quarter acres underlie this magnificent pile. The general style of architecture, both within and without, is almost severely simple. Amplitude, solidity, strength, and permanence reign in every part of this imposing structure, with almost myriads of bay windows diversifying its four immense fronts from top to bottom, and partially relieving the oppressive massiveness which would otherwise characterize its literally stupendous proportions, and its absolute immensity. Every outer room has its bay window, while every parlor and guest chamber has its own private toilet, ample closets, and fire-grate. The site cost $1,000,000, the building $1,750,000 more, and the furniture $500,000, making a total investment of $3,250,000. In the center of this edifice is a court one hundred and forty-four by eighty-four feet, which affords ample light to all the inside rooms. The breakfast room is one hundred and ten feet by fifty-five; the dining-room one hundred and fifty by fifty-five; the music and ball room, sixty-five by fifty-five; the reading-room forty by forty, with waiting-rooms, billiard-rooms, barber shops, etc., of capacious size.

The building is duplex—a huge self-supporting frame of iron of enormous strength, within massive walls of firm-set brick and solid stone. The outer and visible walls are proof against fire, the inner and invisible frames secure against earthquakes. The lower story is twenty-seven feet in hight, and the upper sixteen. A roof of glass covers the entire court.

THE LICK HOUSE

Must also not be neglected, for it was built by that earnest Freethinker, James Lick, who made such generous donations for various educational purposes, among which was one of nearly a million dollars for the construction and erection of the largest observatory in the world, on Mount Hamilton, in the vicinity of San Jose. This hotel was built in 1861; it consists of three elevated stories, and is capable of accommodating nearly four hundred guests. It is essentially a family hotel, conducted upon the European plan. The dining-room, eighty-six by sixty-eight feet and about forty feet in hight, is a marvel of beauty, and is admitted to be the handsomest room on the Pacific coast. It is embellished by ten large, magnificent oil paintings by Denny, Hill, and Marple, illustrating among other things incidents in the history of California. The frames are extremely rich, and are said to have been made by Mr. Lick himself, who, it will be remembered, was an excellent cabinetmaker and piano manufacturer. The whole hotel was thoroughly renovated a year and a half ago, and its marble floors and rich appointments are equal to most hotels of the country. The room was pointed out to me where Mr. Lick breathed his last.

Among the other popular hotels of the city are the the "Grand," the "Occidental," the "International," the "American Exchange," and others, but I presume you have had enough upon the subject of hotels.

Snakes.

According to the Bible, God made man, and he made snakes. But whether he made man for the snake, or the snake for man, depends upon which one comes out ahead in the fight. Sometimes the man gets the snake, and sometimes the snake gets the man, and at other times it seems to be about a draw game.

But at the outset evidently God was not governed by the law of supply and demand, for he made a great many more snakes than men. It is said that there are over five hundred different kinds of snakes, so that God must hav made at least one thousand snakes whilst he made but one man and one woman. But of what use are snakes anyhow? When we reflect that in India it is estimated that annually ten thousand persons die of snake-bites, it would seem as a matter of business, that if God, in his great wisdom, had come to the conclusion that man and the world could manage to get along without snakes, that the snake manufacturing business might hav been dispensed with. But it would seem that after some fifteen hundred years, at the time he drowned the world, God considered that snakes were a success, so he had them all taken into the ark and preserved for future use. If Noah had been like some men, when he saw a thousand snakes crawling up the gangplank, he would hav suggested to the Lord that as he had a few lady passengers on board who might get a little nervous, it might be well for him to furnish a few barrels of snake-bite medicin, to be used for medicinal purposes only. It is possible, however, that Noah, the same as did Moses, made a brass snake and hung it upon a pole, so that in case of being bit, all they had to do was to take a look at the brazen serpent and liv. A brass snake as a snake-bite cure was even better than whisky. Moses says, "And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole, and it came to pass that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass he lived" (Num. xxi, 9). But in these times whisky is more popular than brass snakes as a snake-bite medicin. To giv the snakes a fair chance, as I suppose, Noah let them loose on the top of a mountain, which was so high up as to be above the line of perpetual frost. But they seemed to hav done well, and managed to get into a warmer climate in course of time.

Moses could make a snake out of a stick, and so did the Egyptians, but Moses's snake swallowed all of the other snake, and then Moses turned his snake back into a stick again. But it is a mystery as to what became of the snakes that had been swallowed.

Now I will tell a story about one of the smartest of all snakes. He was not only a good talker, but he could beat God, his maker, in discussing the fruit question; and after Mrs. Adam had listened to his remarks she decided that for an off-hand speech, made without notes, that it was ahead of anything that she had ever listened to. This little speech raised the very devil with the human family, and the devil has been to pay ever since. When we think of all of the misery that has been caused by snakes in the boots and other snakes, I think that God could hav spent his time better than working so long at the snake-making business.

Prohibition.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 9, 1882, an article signed "Walter Simonds," and entitled "Prohibition Run Mad," critising an article signed "Liberta," published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 29, 1882. Now, in "Prohibition Run Mad," I find nothing but a criticism of what the writer regards as the extravagant assertions of "Liberta." The article is throughout an evasion of the real question at issue between the writer and "Liberta." The question at issue is, "Is it within the just province of free goverments to prohibit the liquor traffic?" "Liberta" affirming and Simonds denying.

I find in "Prohibition Run Mad" not a syllable that tends to evince the injustice of prohibitory legislation, besides the implication that prohibition is one with persecution, except the insupportable assertion that the legitimate result of prohibition is an invasion of the inalienable rights of man.

To promulgate this doctrin is to say that man is answerable to no tribunal but his own conscience; that he need consult no statute book but his own inclination; and to admit this is to wipe all forms of government from the face of the earth, to annihilate the science of jurisprudence, and undo all that the statesman, the patriot, and the jurist hav done for the world since man was man. If this doctrin is unpopular I am glad that the majority for once is right, for purely the conception of such a thought is a disgrace to the intellect of civilized man. The origin of liberty is foreign to this question. It occurs to me that as man emerges from savagery one of his first ideas of government is that each idividual must surrender a portion of his liberties for the good of the whole society; and the truth of this doctrin becomes so apparent that the first denial of it givs truth to prohibitory legislation and penal statutes. Prohibition held within just bounds is not oppressiv. It is the abuse of the prohibitory power that is an invasion of individual rights. So also an abuse of individual liberty is anarchy. Prohibition and liberty must mutually restrain each other. It is monstrous and absurd to contend that any class of men hav an inalienable right to do wrong or to engage in a business that is detrimental to society.

Mr. Simonds concedes the right of the state to enforce penal statutes against wrong-doers. This virtually surrenders all that is contended for by "Liberta."

Mr. Simonds contends that the prohibitory provisions against murder, larceny, etc., cited by "Liberta," and the justice of which he admits, are not parallel to the prohibition legislation asked against rum-sellers. Now I insist they are paralleled in every particular, especially so when Mr. Simonds virtually admits the justice of enforcing penal statutes against those who become drunk and disorderly. We do not ask that the human family be exterminated that there may be no one to become intoxicated, nor that all liquors be swept from the face of the earth that there may be nothing to drink.

Now the law not only punishes the murderer, but it also punishes those who sell him deadly weapons for the purpose of committing murder. And all we ask is that the law punish not only the drunkard, but the man who sells him the means of intoxication for the purpose of intoxication. Our position is that it is competent for the state in all cases to punish him who sells the means of doing wrong for the purpose of doing wrong.

What proportion of the crime of the country is due to drunkenness I will not assume the province of determining, nor is it material to the issue.

I challenge Mr. Simonds to show me one benefit that the world has ever derived from the rum shop; while, on the other hand, he concedes that they are the cause of a great deal of poverty and wretchedness. They are therefore detrimental to society and should be restrained or abolished.

Mr. Simonds says an educated thief is a dangerous man, but must we abolish education to get rid of that class of men? On whom does he expect to impress this as paralleled to anything asked for by those who seek to abolish the liquor traffic. It is a misrepresentation of our proposition, and the bait would not suffice to catch gudgeons. Education is a source of power, and there always hav been, and perhaps always will be, men who will abuse their power; but at the same time it is a source of power from which great blessings are derived. The rumseller, on the other hand, givs no equivalent for what he takes from his customers; he confers blessings on none. All that his customers derive from their dealing with him is degradation and untimely graves for themselvs, and want and wretchedness for their families. His occupation must therefore be classed with that of the gambler and the highwayman; highway robbery being the best of the three, as it does not degrade its victims.

And when the rum-seller has taken from the husband and father that which should be given to his wife and children, and given him that which brings him in the prime of his manhood to a drunkard's grave, by what means does he seek to prove that his hands are free from blood? Why, he says: "I hav a right to sell, and he was at liberty to buy my liquor or let it alone. If his manhood could not protect him from temptation, he must suffer the consequences." This is to say with guilty Macbeth, "You cannot say I did it. Shake not those gory looks at me."

And you, Mr. Simonds, professing to be a lover of truth, degrade your intellect to poison the world's mind with the same sophistry.

Suppose, sir, that some poor, persecuted rum-seller comes to you to lease a part of your dwelling-house, and you lease it to him, for the purpose of carrying on his trade, and he keeps in your home a den resorted to for the purpose of drinking and carousing, as you contend he has the inalienable right to do, and you permit this till your beardless sons are made drunkards and blackguards; can you deny that you prove recreant to your trust? Will you then hav the hardihood to say, "If their manhood cannot protect them let them suffer the consequences?" And when the bright boy of whom you were once so fond sleeps in a drunkard's grave, will you dare to say that you are innocent of his blood? And if it is incumbent on a father to protect his home from these evils, who shall tell us that a great nation must giv up the fairest portion of the earth to drunkenness and debauchery because, forsooth, it is the rum-seller's inalienable right to carry on his debasing traffic!

How long, oh, how long! will men of intelligence bow down before the rum-seller and lick the dust from his feet? How long, oh, how long! will they prostitute their genius to justify the infamous conduct of those who deal out destruction to the world, and then defraud justice by perjury and subornation to perjury?

Book Notice.

HISTORY OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE. Illustrated with steel engravings. Edited by Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, and Matilda Joslyn Gage. Complete in three vols. Vol. II., 952 pp., 8vo; 13 portraits. Price, cloth, $5.00; sheep, $6.50 per vol. Fowler & Wells, Publishers, 753 Broadway, New York.

The second volume of this elaborate work has just been placed upon our table. It is a magnificent volume, appears equal to Volume I., and does full credit alike to authors and publishers. To do the volume adequate justice requires more time and study than we will be able now to giv it; but to all persons interested in the struggle which woman has made in our country for the recognition and exercise of the rights to which by nature and reason she is justly entitled, it cannot than otherwise be highly appreciated.

The first volume of this great work appeared some fourteen months ago, and in about the same time the third and completing will follow. Ample proof is here presented of the labor and ability required in the preparation of a work of this magnitude, and also the wide interest taken in the question of woman's rights—her rights of labor, of education, in the house, over her children, over her property, and in the affairs of law and government. The work will and does constitute a library within itself of the earnest struggles that hav been made by the heroins who hav given their lives and strength to this righteous cause.

The first volume comprises fifteen chapters, besides a voluminous appendix. The present volume contains eleven longer chapters and a full appendix. No mere sketch can do the work the justice it merits. It is an important and grand addition to the history of our country and of needed reform. The work is neatly printed, and contains fine steel engravings of Anna Dickinson, Clara Burton Clemence, Sophia Lozier, M.D., Olympia Brown, Jane Graham Jones, Virginia L. Minor, Isabella Beecher Hooker, Belva A. Lockwood, Ella Clark Sargent, Myra Bradwell, Lucy Stone, Julia Ward Howe, and Mary A. Livermore.

The subjects of the eleven chapters of the present volume are: Woman's Patriotism in the War: Congressional Action; National Conventions in 1866–67; The Kansas Campaign, 1867; The New York Constitutional Convention; Reconstruction; National Conventions, 1869; New Departure Under the Fourteenth Amendment; National Conventions, 1873, '74, '75; Trials and Decisions; American Woman Suffrage Association.

The first chapter possesses decided interest, presenting many interesting incidents, delineating woman's patriotism and devotion in that great struggle.

In subsequent chapters speeches are given from such eminent persons as George William Curtis, O. B. Frothingham, Henry Ward Beecher, Antoine Brown Blackwell, Ernestine L. Rose, Theodore Tilton, Wendell Phillips, Olympia Brown, Isabella Beecher Hooker, Moses Colt Tyler, Hon. G. F. Hoar, etc. The volume presents abundant food for thought, and is well calculated to stimulate renewed consideration of many vital questions. It is a work in the great interest of reform, and should be in the library of every lover of reform.

To Freethought Lecturers.

I will publish free in the "Freethinkers' Directory" the name and post-office address of every Freethought lecturer who will furnish the same to me before Nov. 1st.

H. L. GREEN.

Mr. Green's Projected Book.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I heartily indorse the movement of Mr. H. L. Green, the secretary of the Freethinkers' Association, in procuring and publishing in pamphlet form, with the "articles of association," etc., the names of all those in the United States and Canada who are willing to unite with the association and be known as Freethinkers. I earnestly urge every Liberal to send in his or her name and order one or more of the pamphlets. For the good of the Liberal cause we should circulate such a pamphlet.

NOTWITHSTANDING the dignity of our courts of justice, the customary methods of tendering oaths are far from impressiv, and to people possessed of great veneration are somewhat shocking. The person who administers them is not usually eminent for piety. To obtain the position of clerk, he must rather hav evinced political shrewdness and profound sagacity. He is far better acquainted with the voters of the Ninety-ninth ward than with the Psalms of David or the holy gospels. He hardly seems to be the proper person to invoke the Supreme Being to aid a faltering witness, or to denounce the wrath of heaven upon the one who givs false testimony. Upon the opening of a term af court, one of the first duties of the clerk is to swear the grand jury. Directing the one who has been selected as foreman to stand up, he hurries through with the prescribed form in a manner scarcely intelligible to those even who are familiar with it. The rest of the grand jury are then sworn in squads and platoons, without having the oath repeated to them, and at the close the man of cleanliness and refinement is compelled to bow down and kiss the same ancient and greasy volume which for years has been used for similar purposes, with his next neighbor whose mouth has never known a toothbrush, whose lips are dripping with tobacco-juice, and whose breath is redolent of whisky and onions. Is it remarkable that some should prefer to be sworn with the uplifted hand? Then as each witness takes the stand, the Supreme Being is again called in by the clerk to assist in the judicial proceedings and to brace up the witness to do his duty. Jeremy Bentham, in 1817, wrote of oaths in his strange style: "On the supposition that, by man over the Almighty, power should to this, or any other purpose, be exercised or exercisable, an absurdity than which nothing can be greater, cannot be denied to be involved; man the legislator and judge, God the shiriff and executioner; man the despot, God his slave. . . God is a negligent servant indeed, but still a servant; he disobeys the orders nine times out of ten, but he pays obedience to them on the tenth."—Judge E. A. Thomas: Oaths in Legal Proceedings. N. A. Review.

Further Replies to Mr. Whitehead.

Our friend objects to the term fable as applied to Genesis, but any story that tells of a garden spot where four rivers hav their source, about knowledge and long life growing upon trees, about men being made of clay. and woman, with her nerves, tissues, flesh, and blood, being drawn out from a small rib bone, about a snake, which has no organs of speech, conversing in human language, about water descending upon the earth for forty days at the rate of seven hundred and fifty feet per day, about all forms of animal life, amounting to millions, being got together and kept in a big box for thirteen months, is only worthy the term of fable. It cannot be true. It is absurd to call it "history." And, what is cheering, the lessons of geology, of astronomy, and other sciences are being more and more accepted by the thinking among men; and the silly stories about the creation, about the formation of man and woman, about the talented snake ruining them and defeating his maker at the same time, about that impossible flood, are being less and less believed. It certainly seems that Mr. Whitehead has intelligence enough not to longer giv in his adherence to such groundless, unsupported, and senseless stories. He would do well to read Col. Ingersoll's "Some Mistakes of Moses," Prof. Westbrook's "The Bible, Whence and What," or Bronson Keeler's "Short History of the Bible." He should not revere falsehood because it has antiquity, and should not believe as true that of which there is not the slightest proof.

As Mr. Whitehead objects to being made to "gulp down" the statement that, according to the Bible, the creation of the earth and of man took place less than six thousand years ago, we also decidedly object to "gulping down" the absurd claim that the writings of wholly unknown persons, written in an unknown period, and afterward massed into one volume, as both reliable history and the word of God, when neither is so much as claimed by the writers themselvs. It seems very easy for our friend to "gulp down" the latter, whether the former will "gulp" or not. The ease with which our Christian friends accept the claim that these unknown writers wrote by the help of God, and that they know what took place hundreds and thousands of years before they were born, shows the remarkable facilities possessed for "gulping down." If the Christians do not "gulp" fable for truth, no people ever did.

The following facts with reference to the older part of the Bible may be stated. It is equally unknown when and by whom they were written. It is not even known when and by whom they were compiled and made into a book or canon. It has been thought it was done by Ezra after he had led a portion of the Jews back to Palestine from Babylon. It is far more probable that he and his scribes wrote them than that they were written by the persons whose names they bear. The canon was probably fixed up long after he was dead. But all is uncertainty and doubt. It was not at first thought that the books were written or inspired by God; that was wholly an afterthought. It was a claim set up by priests long after the writers were dead.

We hav not the books now in the form in which they were written; parts were left out and parts added, according to the whim of the compilers. Nothing prevented their making such changes as they pleased. The crudeness and carelessness with which they performed the work is exemplified in the facts that the last two verses of 2 Chronicles and the first of Ezra are the same; that nearly half the books attributed to Isaiah were not written by Isaiah at all, but by an unknown person in Babylon, and some two hundred and fifty years after the time of Isaiah; still later pieces were also added to the collection attributed to Isaiah; that the book of Daniel, which has been looked upon as a wonderful mass of prophecy, was not written by Daniel at all, and not till the Maccabean period, about 165 B C.—four hundred years after Daniel was dead, and long after the events had taken place referred to by the pretended prophecy. To this forgery ascribed to Daniel were added the Prayer of Azarias, the Song of the Three Children, the History of Susannah, and Bel and the Dragon, and these are to-day by half the Christian world—the Catholics—regarded as divine as the other portions of the Bible. All these things show how easily the "gulping" process is performed by those who are compelled to "gulp down" fables and unknown writings as "history" as divinely inspired. The credulous believers, like our friend, are ready to "gulp" whatever is stated in that collection of unknown authors; such accounts as the waters of Noah's flood reaching five miles high; of the forms of animal life existing together in a close vessel over a year; of the river Nile being turned to blood, and other equally impossible plagues of Egypt; of the Red Sea parting its waters and walling up on each side, making a dry roadway through it, for one set of human beings to be saved and another set drowned; of two or three million of people with all their cattle living in an arid desert for forty years, all their food for that period being sent from heaven in the form of manna; of stones being thrown down from heaven to kill human beings, and, upon their giving out, of Joshua's stopping the sun and moon that he might hav daylight for committing more slaughter; of Samson killing a lion with his hands; of his catching three hundred foxes and tying their tales together, and setting corn fields on fire; of his slaying a thousand men with the jaw-bone of an ass; of his carrying off the heavy gates of Gaza and overthrowing the pillars of a temple with his hands and killing three thousand people; of three young men being cast into a highly-heated furnace without the slightest injury; about Daniel being cast into a den of lions; about Jonah being swallowed by a fish, retained three days under water without air, and then vomited safely on dry land, and much more of a similar character needless to mention. Our friend has to accept all these as "history" and the inspired word of God. We are compelled to regard it as fable, and of not the slightest reliability or truth.

In treating the subject of the authenticity of Bible books, no less a Bible scholar than Prof Samuel Davidson admits the truth of much set forth in the foregoing. In speaking of the changes and modifications which hav been made by collectors and compilers of the unknown writers, he says:

> Men of prophetic gifts wrote in the name of distinguished prophets, and put their productions with those of the latter, or adapted and wrote them over after their own fashion. The fiftieth and fifty-first chapters of Jeremiah show such overwriting. To Zechariah's authentic oracles were attached chapters ix and xiv, themselvs made up of two parts (ix–xi; xii–xiv) belonging to different times and authors prior to the destruction of the Jewish state by the Babylonians.
> The soferim, as the successors of the prophets, must hav corrected and revised the sacred books to some extent. We need not hesitate to allow that they sometimes arranged parts and even added matter of their own. In the time of the canon's entire preparation they and the other priests, with writers and scholars generally, redacted the national literature, excluding or sanctioning such portions of it as they saw fit.
> From Ezra's treatment of the oldest law books we infer that he did not look upon them as inviolate. Venerable they were, and so far sacred; but neither perfect nor complete for all time. . . . The redaction to which he submitted them shows no superstitious reverence. With him canonical and holy were not identical. Nor does the idea of an immediate divine authority appear to hav dominated the mind of Nehemiah and his scholars in the selection of books.
> The scribes who followed Ezra, "Seeing what he did, would naturally follow his example and would not scruple, if it seemed best to revise the text in substance as well as form. They aid not refrain from changing what had been written, or inserting fresh matter."
> The differences between them (the Palestinian and Alexandrian versions of the prophets and the Hagiographa), often remarkable, prove that those who had most to do with the books did not guard them as they would hav done had they thought them infallibly inspired.

Thus, as this ablest of Bible scholars admits that the various books composing the Bible were freely changed by those who took upon themselvs their compilation and consolidation; as he confesses they subtracted and added according to their own desires; as it is unknown who were the authors of the Pentateuch, of Joshua, Judges, Ruth, the two books of Samuel, the two books of Kings, the two books of Chronicles, of Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, the Song of Solomon, and others; as these books were not for a long time thought to be the product of the divine mind, it is somewhat amusing to see how readily the whole—the claims of divinity, infallibility, and all—is "gulped down" without a question by those who hold that believing without proof is a virtue. As gulpers, the world can show no superiors. With such credulous people, if the claim were set up by the fathers of the church that the moon is composed of green cheese, or that the sun is but little larger than a cartwheel, it is highly probable they would easily accept it.

The two vague quotations given by our friend from the poetry of the Bible amount to little more than as though he had quoted from Shakspere or Milton. They show no knowledge of the early state of matter, nor of the composition of the world. That they do not absolutely contradict the teachings of science amounts to very little. He may think Moses and the other supposed Bible writers are "about right," but we think the proof is that they are about wrong. Those who accept them as "the infallible word of God" do so on the most slender proof in the world. The stories are fable more than history.

As to the eternality of matter, so long as it is impossible to increase matter in the slighest degree, or decrease it in the slightest degree; so long as it cannot be created nor destroyed; so long as it is impossible to comprehend how something can come from nothing, it is more reasonable to look upon matter as eternal than to think it an evolution of nothing. It is surely a no greater stretch of the imagination than to imagin a creator and that he is eternal. While our friend insists that he does not know that matter is eternal, it may be as truthfully insisted that he does not know that it is not eternal. When he can show how it is possible for matter to come from nothing it will be time enough to believe it had a beginning. His analogy of butting against the pyramids of Egypt, and then concluding they are eternal, seems not to possess special force. The matter of which the pyramids are composed is, of course, eternal, but the form in which they now are had a beginning. The forms and combination of matter are always changing, more or less rapidly, but matter itself never comes into existence and never goes out.

Our friend brings no new fact to light when he asserts that matter is not a simple element, but comprises over sixty distinct elements, including oxygen, hydrogen, nitrogen, chlorine, carbon, sulphur, potassium, sodium, iron, gold, silver, copper, etc. No person will dispute this. But when he asks which of these is eternal, and whence the others come, the rational answer is, they are all eternal; one can neither be converted into another, nor can one of them come from nothing. They are capable of combining endlessly with each other in new combinations and organizations, but none of them comes into existence—none goes out. The fact of the ever-varying combinations that may be formed of these elements is the only rational explanation of the origin of the world. There is clearly a possibility for the elements to unite in the form they now are, and the conditions must hav been favorable to the result or it would not hav taken place. There was a natural cause for every result that has taken place. Causes, forces, and material may be regarded as eternal, but results, combinations, and conditions come and pass away.

The "inertia of matter" is another mistake. Strictly speaking, matter is not inert, but is eternally charged with life, or the possibility of entering into new combinations, producing new forms, and developing new life. There is inorganic life as well as organic, and without the one the other would not be possible. The inherent powers of matter are equal to all the results which hav been produced by the myriads of combinations that hav taken place. If matter is really inert no form of life could be possible. Where inorganic forms of matter end, and organic forms begin, is a deep and intricate subject, and not yet fully understood; but it is not difficult to comprehend that the gradation of the coarser forms of matter to the higher forms of life is a regular and natural one. Matter in the inorganic domain exists in numerous degrees, and it is the same in the organic world—almost endless forms are found to exist. The connecting link between the inorganic and the organic is as natural and simple as the rest if as well understood. It is known that certain combinations and qualities of inorganic matter are essential to organic life, that the subtle forces of nature (the concomitants of matter) hav an important office in the premises, and that the lower forms of organic life are but a slight remove above protoplasmic, or properly combined organic matter. Without these conditions organic life would not be possible; but every step from the lowest form of inorganic matter to the highest form of organic life is perfectly natural, for nothing strictly unnatural ever took place. Let it be reiterated, all causes are natural causes, all laws are natural laws, all processes are natural processes, and all results are natural results. Nature does everything and super-nature nothing. Nature is the highest; nature is the lowest; nature is all.

Now for the dream part of Christianity. If our friend will notice what we said he will see that we did not say that "the New Testament is founded on a dream," as he has it in his last, but that Christianity is founded upon a dream. This proposition is certainly easy of confirmation. The fundamental claim of Christianity is that Jesus was miraculously begotten by God, that he is absolutely and to all intents and purposes the son of God, that he had not a natural father, that he was sent into the world to die as a propitiation or atonement for the sins of the world, and that all who believe this are to enjoy the beatitudes of heaven forever, while all who do not or can not believe must suffer the torments of hell to all eternity. If, then, Jesus was not the son of God, if he was not miraculously begotten, if his mother was not a virgin even after her conception and bringing forth, then the foundation of Christianity is taken away, and all the dodging, sophistry, and special pleading in the world cannot prevent it.

It is but simply stating the truth that all the grounds there are in the world that such an unnatural thing ever took place is the dream which a pretender falsely wrote that Matthew narrated over fifty years after the dream was dreamed. If Mr. Whitehead can show any other authority on which to base the divinity of Jesus, or his heavenly parentage, he is requested to produce it. In the story accorded to Luke he mentions a vision that Mary had of a call from the angel Gabriel, on which occasion the angel is said to hav told the young girl of a visit his master, or the Holy Ghost would make her, when a little overshadowing would be performed; but all this was in the future, and the story does not say that the visit and the overshadowing ever took place. All the authority the Christian church has, then, that Jesus is the begotten son of God is that dream narrated by the pseudo-Matthew, nearly two hundred years after the dreamer ceased to exist. If, then, we are not justified in saying that Christianity rests upon a fable and a dream, let it be clearly shown. The claim that "the vision was given to quiet the jealous fears of the old man Joseph respecting the condition of the girl to whom he was engaged" is begging the question. That is all the proof there is that Jesus was begotten by a ghost or spirit, and had the story not been told to incite the faith of the Christian world in the divinity of Jesus, it might better hav not been told. If the dream satisfied Joseph, and that was all the object to be produced, there was no necessity for repeating the dream. Joseph was already pacified, and that was all that was necessary. The dream-gossiper had better held his peace.

Our friend fain would make it appear that the four gospels in the New Testament were known to Barnabas, Clemens Romanus, Ignatius, Polycarp, Papais, etc. Although he quotes Wheeler to boost up the claim, it positivly cannot stand. Not one of these persons knew of the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, neither did Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Hegesippus, Basilides, Valentinus, Marcion, Tatian, Dionysius of Corinth, Melito of Sardis, Claudius Apollonaris, Athenagoras, Ptolemus, Heracleon, nor any others of the early fathers and authorities up to the time of Irenæus after the year 180. This latter, as before observed, was the first to mention the four gospels, in the New Testament. It is most clear that up to his time they were unknown, and the reasons that Irenæus givs why there were four gospels, and could be no more and no less, are of the most frivolous character—because there are four quarters of the world, because there are four general winds, and because cherubims hav four faces. More sophistical reasons and props to sustain four unauthentic gospels could not be devised; and it must be insisted upon that a person, whether bishop or not, capable of advancing such arguments in favor of unsupported pretensions is unworthy of credit.

It is not strange after an examination into the character of the fourth gospel that the learned author of "Supernatural Religion" should use such language as this: "We hav seen that whilst there is not one particle of evidence during a century and a half after the events recorded in the fourth gospel that it was composed by the son of Zebedee, there is, on the contrary, the strongest reason for believing that he did not write it." It is not strange that when speaking of the authenticity of the gospels and of the period when the claim for them was set up Dr. Westcott should call it "the dark age of Christian literature." There is most undeniably a great want of proof of the authenticity of the gospels, and the whole story of Jesus, and of the immaculate conception, of the miracles performed by Jesus, of his rising from the dead, and of his physical ascension up into the ethereal regions. These things were clearly untaught and unknown in the first century, and were not taught by the apostles nor their immediate disciples in the first century. They were wholly the inventions of the more unscrupulous fathers and writers of the second century when a necessity, in order to satisfy the prevalent love of the supernatural and wonderful, was thought to exist.

In his able work, the "History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200," Judge Charles B. Waite, A.M., after years spent in examination of all the early authorities upon the Christian religion lays down these propositions which cannot be successfully disputed:

1. No one of the four gospels is mentioned in any other part of the New Testament. [This assuredly would not hav been the case had they been the oldest, and the foundation upon which the whole was built.]

2. No work of art of any kind has ever been discovered, no painting or engraving, no sculpture or other relic of antiquity which may be looked upon as furnishing additional evidence of the existence of those gospels, and which was executed earlier than the latter part of the second century. Even the explorations of the Christian catacombs failed to bring to light any evidence of that character.

3. The four gospels were written in Greek, and there was no translation of them into other languages earlier than the third century.

4. No manuscript of the gospels are in existence dating farther back than the fourth century. Of that century, or the next, there are three or four, and some twenty or thirty, more than a thousand years old.

5. No autograph manuscript of any of the gospels has ever been known, so far as there is any authentic record, nor has any credible witness ever claimed to hav seen such a manuscript. No one has ever claimed to hav seen such a manuscript of either of the four gospels in the hand-writing of Luke, Mark, Matthew, or John. If the autograph manuscripts had ever existed they would hav been preserved among the most sacred relics of the church.

6. During the first two centuries tradition was esteemed of more value, and better evidence of the gospel history, than any written books or manuscripts.

7. The dialect in which the New Testament books were written, a sort of Hebraistic Greek, has been considered evidence of their antiquity. But this dialect prevailed three centuries after Christ, and was in full use during the second century. The same or similar Hebraisms abound in the apochryphal gospels of that age.

8. The canonical gospels were selected by the bishops from a large number then in circulation.

In the conclusion of his exhaustiv and careful work of 450 pages this author says:

In taking a generel review of the first hundred and seventy years of the Christian religion the first thing that strikes the mind is the dearth of material from which to construct a reliable history. It is seen at once how much must rest upon probability in its different degrees—how much must be relegated to the province of speculation. The works of the only church historian who wrote during that period, lost or destroyed, the few fragments that are left being of comparativly no value—the writings of Porphyry and others who wrote against Christianity, and those of the heretic Christians, all destroyed—there remain only the works of some of the orthodox fathers, and the text of those in a mutilated and corrupted condition.

Such is the material at the hands of the historian. Of course he cannot rely implicitly upon the unsupported assertion of any such writer for the truth of any historical fact whatever. In every instance he is obliged to scrutinize carefully, and endeavor to ascertain whether any ulterior motivs may hav prompted whatever statement may be under consideration. If he can find none, and the fact stands uncontradicted by other writers, it is cautiously accepted. Under such circumstances progress is slow and uncertain. The most that any writer can hope to accomplish is to place in proper shape what is already known, and to establish here and there a landmark for the benefit of subsequent historians.

In conclusion, as the result of this investigation, it may be repeated that no evidence is found of the existence in the first century of either of the following doctrins: the immaculate conception—the miracles of Christ—his material resurrection. No one of these gospels is to be found in the epistles of the New Testament, nor hav we been able to find them in other writings of the first century.

As to the four gospels, in coming to the conclusion that they were not written in the first century, we hav but recorded the conv ction of the most advanced scholars of the present day, irrespectiv of their religious views in other respects; with whom the question as now presented is "How early in the second century were they composed?"

Discarding as inventions of the second century, having no historical foundation, the three doctrins above named, and much else which must necessarily stand or fall with them, what remains of the Christian religion?

Mr. Whitehead speaks of quotations that were made from what were called gospels, by some of the fathers of the second century. Right enough; that is quite possible. The first few centuries of the church were full of "gospels" and "epistles" some of which have been preserved to the present time and many of which have been lost. We have what is called the Apochryphal New Testament in which are the gospel of the Birth of Mary, the Protevangelion, the First Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus Christ, Thomas's Gospel of the Infancy of Jesus Christ, the Gospel of Nicodemus or the Acts of Pontius Pilate, the same followed by numerous epistles of an apocryphal character. Among the lost gospels are the Gospel of Paul, the Gospel of the Hebrews, the Gospel of the Egyptians, the Gospel of Perfection, the Gospel of Philip, the Gospel of Andrew, the Syriac Gospel, the Gospel of Matthias, Gospel of Judas Iscariot, Gospel of Apelles, Gospel of Barnabas, Gospel of Basilides, the Clementine Gospel, Gospel of Bartholomew, Gospel of Eve, Gospel of Cerinthus, Gospel of Encratites, the Eternal Gospel, Gospel of the Gnostics, Gospels of Hesychius, Gospel of Justin, Gospel of James the Less, Gospel of Jude, Gospel of the Lord, Gospel of Lucius, Gospels of Lucianus, Gospel of Life, Gospel of Longinus, Gospel of Manes, Gospel of Marcion, Gospel of Merinthus, Gospel of Scythianus, Gospel of Simonides, Gospel of Thaddeus, Gospel of Tatian, Gospel of Truth, and almost as many more as may be desired. It is claimed that within the first three centuries of the Christian era, there were two or three hundred gospels and epistles named after some apostle, disciple, father, or bishop. It is not claimed they were written by the men whose names they bore, nor that they were written by inspiration, but there seems to have been a mania for writing gospels. Many of the young priests and zealous believers conceived it their privilege to write a gospel and give it the name of such distinguished disciple, saint or teacher as they fancied. The same right was exercised to write a gospel as is now used by many in writing an account of Garfield's death, or Guiteau's execution.

Admitting the correctness of our friend's claim that Barnabas, Clemens, Ignatius, Papias, and others quoted from gospels, they must have been some of the foregoing or others, and not the four gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, which most positivly were not known to one of the persons named. The gospels which were read in the early churches previous to the year 180 were not either of our present four gospels of the New Testament and those decided to be apocryphal. In the contentious and quarrelsome councils of bishops which assembled to decide which gospels and epistles should be accepted as genuin it is well known that in some councils books were discarded which are now considered genuin, and some were accepted which hav been since discarded. The whole affair seems to hav been a medley of confusion and uncertainty. There is nothing to show that the finally accepted books are any more genuin than those discarded. But let it be remembered by Mr. Whitehead and every person seeking after the truth that the four gospels were not mentioned until Bishop Irenæus called a tention to them when he gave his absurd reason for just those and none others. The gospels that had been alluded to before and quoted from were the other gospels since discarded as not being truthful nor inspired.

There is great probability that there was more or less similarity between many of the gospels—some borrowing from others and all borrowing from the legends and traditions in existence. That many of them are strictly unreliable is clear to be seen; that one of them was penned by divine aid there is not the first particle of proof. There is claimed to hav been a gospel of Matthew, and that it had also been called the gospel of the Hebrews, but it clearly was not the gospel which we call the gospel of Matthew. That was written in Hebrew, while this never was in Hebrew, and was written in Greek.

Our friend gets the gospels somewhat confused when he intimates that Celsus wrote against the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. There is considerable diversity of opinion as to the time when Celsus lived; and it is said there were two persons by that name. It is claimed by some that the Celsus against whom Origen wrote flourished about the year 160, while others insist that he was a contemporary of Origen, who lived in the fore part of the third century. Whatever time Celsus lived, however, very little is known of what he wrote, for his Christian adversaries took very good care to destroy his writings, as they did the writings of Porphyry and others who were opposed to them. All that is known of what he wrote is what Origen was rather compelled to hand down to us in the paragraphs which he quoted to refute. One thing is certain, that Celsus did not so much write against any particular gospels out of the two hundred which existed as against the general claims of Christianity, according to the legends that had been preached for a hundred years or more. It must be seen that Celsus is a weak prop to hold up the four canonical gospels.

The same may be said of Marcion. He, though a heretic, had a gospel of his own, from which it is believed that the gospel of Luke was partially composed, but he assuredly had nothing to say, pro or con, of the four gospels, now declared to be the inspired word, but which were unknown till after his time.

When Mr. Whitehead makes the assertion that the gospels are as "well authenticated as any other books in existence" he certainly makes a very extravagant statement, and one that is not at all borne out by the facts. If he means all of the two hundred gospels alluded to it is only necessary to say that all but four of them hav been discarded by the various councils that hav been held to act upon them, and by the common consent of the church, while the four that hav been retained are shown to hav been unknown till after the year 180, and consequently spurious forgeries or frauds, not written by the pretended authors of them. If this most damaging character means "well authenticated," it must be that language has obtained new meaning. If there are any books in the world less authenticated we would like to know which they are.

The fact adduced that Christians were persecuted, and from that the argument urged that their doctrins are true, will hardly work, or, what is equally unfortunate, it proves too much. If being persecuted proves a belief to be true, then as Christians hav persecuted others a thousand times more than they hav been persecuted themselvs they hav proved the belief of their victims a thousand times truer than their own.

As to the fathers being designing and ignorant, a few words may be said. The charge of "ignorant" may be qualified to this extent, that while they were so ignorant as not to be acquainted with many of the simplest facts and laws of nature, they were not so ignorant as not to know their right hands from their left or to go in the house when it rained. We propose, however, to let a few excellent witnesses bear testimony as to their ignorance and superstitions, as well as to the correctness and moral qualities of some of them. First let Prof. Davidson say a few words:

The infancy of the canon was cradled in an uncritical age, and rocked with traditional ease. Conscientious care was not directed from the first to the well-authenticated testimony of eye-witnesses. Of the three fathers who centributed most to its early growth, Irenæus was credulous and blundering; Turtullian passionate and one-sided; and Clement, of Alexandria, imbued with the treasures of Greek wisdom, was mainly occupied with ecclesiastical ethics.

Irenæus agrees that the gospels should be four in number, neither more or less, because there are four universal winds and four quarters of the world. The Word or Architect of all things gave the gospel in a four-fold shape. Accerding to this father the apostles were fully informed concerning all things, and had a perfect knowledge after their Lord's ascension.

He says, "Matthew wrote his gospels while Peter and Paul were preaching in Rome, and founding the church." Such assertions show both ignorance and exaggeration.

Tertullian affirms that the tradition of the apostolic churches guarantees the four gospels, and refers his readers to the churches of Corinth, Philippi, Ephesus, etc., for the authentic epistles of Paul. What is this but the rhetoric of an enthusiast?

Clement Contradicts himself in making Peter authorize Mark's gospel to be read in the churches, while in another place he says the apostle "neither forbade nor encouraged it."

The Case of Ireland.

To Patrick Ford, Esq., Editor of the Irish World: I am a constant reader of the Irish World. I greatly admire your editorial ability, your zeal and self-sacrifice in the cause of Ireland. I hav no prejudice against the Irish race. Ethnologically I place them above the Englishman in some of the best attributes of the human character. I hav no words sufficiently strong to express my detestation of the British government for its long-continued, mean, and merciless treatment of your nativ country. Next to the Jews, the Irish hav been trodden under the heel of power for a longer time and more ruthlessly than any other race; and, as a consequence, although the island is a natural paradise in climate and fertility of soil, no people are so poverty-stricken, so ignorant, so squalid, and such beggars.

It may seem strange, at first blush, that Ireland, in her centuries of struggle against her English oppressors, has never had the activ sympathy of any other nation. Her degradation is so complete that all other peoples stand aloof and despise her. Hence she has had to depend on herself alone for counsel, and upon her banished children everywhere for material aid in her abortiv attempts to regain her ancient autonomy. In our struggle against the British government, which began in 1776, we had the help of France, Poland, and Prussia. But even without their aid we could and would hav secured our independence; for, although a handful, we were a people that could not be enslaved. Now, instead of five millions of the Irish race occupying Ireland, suppose, for a moment, it were five million of Yankees. With only half so good a case as Ireland has, so far from waiting five centuries, they would do one of two things in five years—either overthrow the English power by all the means known to an oppressed people, or make Ireland a desolation where neither men nor animals nor grass would grow. No body of Americans would submit to such oppression as the Irish hav endured an hour longer than was necessary either to throw it off or to die in the attempt. Why is it, then, that the nations of Europe, with all their just jealousy of and hatred to England, regard the Irish struggle with indifference? Why is it that, even in the United States, where the people know what liberty is, and value it above all price, we can get up no efficient sympathy for Ireland beyond a curse, now and then, from some public man against her oppressor?

There is a reason for this. The conviction is universal and deep, outside of Ireland and the Irish, that if the Irish were permitted to secede from the British empire, and set up a government for themselvs, it would be a priestly government, modeled after the late "states of the church" in which the pope, cardinals, and bishops of Rome were the supreme authority. The world knows that, during the temporal reign of the popes in Italy, priests and beggars swarmed; that the popular ignorance was so dense, vice and crime so rampant, and the despotism so absolute that the population, although Catholic, rejoiced when the papal power was compelled to succumb to Victor Emanuel.

But it would not be so in Ireland. The people are so blind and so degraded in their attachment to the church that they would esteem it an honor to be converted into donkeys, provided the blessed priests of God would ride them, instead of the landlords and the British government. Even Davitt, I fear, would yield to the popular clamor, and be willing to make Ireland politically tributary to the pope, as she has been for ages spiritually. Even you, Mr. Ford, when Bishop Gilmour, of Cleveland, played the tyrant and insulted and threatened the women of his diocese with excommunication if they did not relinquish their public efforts in behalf of the Land League, knuckled to his authority, and advised the women to submit. If an American Catholic in the eighty-second year of the nineteenth century shakes like an aspen leaf before a bishop of the church, what would not an Irish Catholic do in the way of submission in a country where the people still liv in the gloom and bondage of the Dark Ages? A people who sincerely and devoutly believe that they can eat their God on Sunday, in the shape of a wafer of bread, and evacuate him from their bowels on Monday, cannot be free. Their intellects and their consciences are enslaved to an iron superstition, and their bodies are only fit for servitude and chains. And this is the misfortune and suicidal crime of Ireland. She has allowed the vampire of the church to fasten itself upon her bosom, where for ages it has been sucking away her life's blood, till, pale and weak, she has not strength enough to drive it away.

In saying this, I am not denouncing the Catholic religion as a religion. I am only, as a statesman and a philosopher, examining into the causes of things, and commenting on religion as a factor in the civilization and progress of the human race. If I were going to become a professing Christian I would join the Catholic church, for the doctrin of the mass is a New Testament doctrin. Jesus, the incarnate God, says plainly, in John vi, 53: "Verily, verily I say unto you, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye hav no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood [as we do his body, blood, and divinity in the mass], hath eternal life; for my flesh is meat indeed, and my blood is drink indeed. He that eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, dwelleth in me and I in him."

This language justifies me in saying that by the process called faith, which believes anything on mere authority, the incarnate God, Jesus, may become an article of food to a devout Christian, and that after serving the purposes of the soul, may, like other food, be cast out into the draught. No, I am not as a sectarian, putting reproach upon the fundamental doctrin of your creed. I am only trying to show why a people so strong in numbers, so homogeneous in blood, in opinion, in feeling, in interest, and who hav so good a cause, should hav lain for long centuries at the proud foot of the conqueror, and should be so helpless and hopeless now. Their religion is their bane. It is a far greater enemy to their political freedom and welfare than the British government. From center to circumference Ireland is permeated by a superstition that paralyzes her intellect, confuses her perceptions, and cuts the hamstrings of wise and successful endeavors. With ever so powerful a lever there is no fulcrum by which she could be raised up from her prone condition even enough to let air under her, much less elevate her to a plane where she could make a fight for her liberty. She reminds me of a stalwart negro I once met in slavery times on a wharf-boat at Maysville, Ky., and who, when I urged him to get his freedom by running off into Ohio, where he would find friends, replied, "I is afraid, massa! I is afraid de Abolitionists eat me." Nothing could be done for that negro.

The pope, and most of the Irish bishops, are only half-hearted in the cause of Irish emancipation. They know full well, from what they hav seen in Italy and France, that the love of liberty and the freedom of thought, which are indispensable to their success in breaking away from their political bondage, would, in the end, lead them to shake off the chains of their spiritual bondage. How could the Catholic hierarchy be more than luke-warm when in the very epistle of Paul, inspired of God, and addressed to the church at Rome, a doctrin is laid down which, had it been believed in and submitted to, would hav made every government on earth today an irresponsible despotism, and all the people uncomplaining slaves? Listen, Mr. Ford, while I quote the inspired language, which is as obligatory now as it was eighteen hundred years ago (Romans xiii, 1): "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God: the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive unto themselvs damnation."

This is the doctrin of Christianity in regard to the relations which men and Christians sustain to political government. But the Americans, in 1776, openly rejected this "divine" teaching, and startled the whole world by proclaiming in their immortal Declaration the very reverse of it, viz., that all men are created equal; that by virtue of being men, and not things, they are endowed by their creator with the inalienable right to life, to liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness; that simply to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; and that when a government fails to secure these blessings of liberty the people hav the right, and it is their duty, to revolutionize and reform that government, and make it do what it was ordained to do. The Americans, as a nation, in this respect became infidel to the New Testament and its religion; and when the war for these Infidel principles ended victoriously they proceeded to form a Constitution of government which ignores all gods and all religions entirely, and hence the wonderful prosperity of the republic. Our fathers, when only three millions strong, took the British bull by the horns, and after a struggle of seven years threw him, and then marched off conquerors. The Irish patriots, six millions strong, take hold of the same bull, not, however, by the horns where they could control him, but by the tail, and are slung contemptuously and mercilessly into the slough of despond. How dare you, and Parnell, and Davitt, as Christians, demand Irish liberty and autonomy when Almighty God, through the lips of his servant Paul, says, virtually, "Let every Irish soul be subject to the higher power of England. There is no power on earth which does not derive its strength and authority from God. The powers—king, lords, and commons—that be in England are the very ones that are ordained of God. Any Irishman, therefore, or any Irish-American who, by making speeches, giving countenance, and sending money, rouses up a spirit of resistance among the subjects of the British crown, resists the ordinance of God; and whoever thus resists shall receive damnation in hell, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched?

This doctrin of Christianity is the bludgeon that knocks the successful rebel spirit out of Ireland and makes her a mere groveling, grumbling slave to England. The Catholic religion, true and Christian as it is, has always sided with kings against the people, and, as I hav shown, has scripture for so doing. The pope and his bishops cannot consistently cheer on the Irish patriots in an attempt to break up their allegiance to England and establish their own nationality, but are bound by their religion to pronounce such an effort a rebellion that must end, even if successful, in damnation. Therefore they are only half-hearted, sympathizing as men and co-religionists with the peeled and plundered Irish, but, as theologians and churchmen, bound by a higher obligation to sustain the God-given rights of England over all her subjects. The heroic labors of Davitt and Parnell, as well as your own and those of Mr. George, in destroying landlordism, are only a daubing of the walls with untempered mortar. The cement takes no bond, and the wall cannot resist the pressure of its own weight. The Russian Nihilists, both for courage and effect, put all Ireland to shame.

I know, Mr. Ford, that you will reject my advice, although I am a true friend to Ireland. But I giv it, nevertheless, and place it upon record. It is that, first and foremost, you liberate Ireland from the paralyzing superstition imposed on her by the Catholic church. Free the souls of her children from this terrible condition, and bring them out into the glorious liberty of the sons of light, and then it will be comparativly easy to break their allegiance to the English government and establish the Irish republic. But so long as the masses of your countrymen are not only in bonds to superstition, but are contented with their bondage, and would not hav it otherwise, so long will they remain poor, helpless, and hopeless.

The Tama Meeting.

Everything seems propitious for the Tama Convention of the Iowa Liberal League and secular and Spiritualist camp-meeting, and nothing more so than the weather.

On Wednesday evening appeared the first arrivals, and by 10 A. M. of Thursday several counties were represented, and, of the speakers advertised, Mrs. Lake, Prof. Peck, Dr. Severance, Col. Billings, Nettie Pease Fox, and Col. Fox were on the ground. At this hour the Convention was called to order by Vice-President A. Clegg, of Des Moines, a veteran in the reform ranks and a gentleman of dignified manners and commanding presence. The secretary then read the minutes of the First Annual Convention, after which Prof. Peck sang the stirring words of Annie Besant's "Hold the Flag."

On motion of M. E. Billings a committee of three on resolutions was appointed, consisting of M. E. Billings, of Bremer; F. J. Emary, of Clarke; and Mrs. Eli Barnes, of Bremer. On motion of Walker a committee of three on nomination of officers and delegates to St. Louis was appointed. The chair named E. C. Walker, of Benton; W. F. Peck, of Chicago; and Nettie Pease Fox, of Wapello. Committee instructed to report at Saturday forenoon session.

Vice-President Billings now took the chair and made a short speech, explaining the purposes of the League and the objects of this meeting. He was followed by the secretary, who said that the League was for the establishment of justice, and included in its ranks men and women holding all varieties of views on religious matters, the mortality or immortality of the soul, etc. Both Materialist and Spiritualist could and, if Liberal, would work in its ranks side by side and in perfect harmony with those believing directly opposit to them on metaphysical questions.

The question of membership and qualifications of voters coming up, Walker moved that a committee of three on amendments to the constitution be appointed, with instructions to report at Friday forenoon session. The chair named as such committee E. C. Walker; A. Clegg, of Polk; and Bertha M. Lee, of Benton. A short conference, concluding with music by Prof. Peck, ended the first session.

AFTERNOON.

Music. Then followed the opening lecture of the camp-meeting, "Why are We Here?" by Dr. Juliet H. Severance. She answered the question most ably and aptly, showing that reformers need never be alarmed lest they should find themselvs without an occupation. There were plenty of evils to be removed, plenty of wrongs to be overcome, much injustice to be destroyed. Liberty was menaced with deadly dangers on every hand, by none more so than such laws as the recently-adopted prohibitory amendment, which, in the name of morality and temperance, aims at the destruction of the only source and guarantee of either. "Individual Sovereignty." This opened the floodgates of debate upon the much-mooted liquor law question; a debate continued by Col. Fox in a twenty-five-minute speech (not all devoted to this subject, however), and participated in by the secretary, Prof. Peck, Mrs. Lake, and others, and carried over into the conference hour of Friday. This second and very interesting session closed, as did all others, with music by Prof. Peck. I will say right here, to save space and avoid iteration, that Professor Peck led in the musical exercises, ably assisted in singing and playing by Mrs. E. S. Caywood and Miss Caywood, of Albion, and Mrs. Viva C. Alexander, of Carroll. Mr. H. Caywood accompanied the organ with his violin, eliciting from its strings a very fine quality of the "devil's own music."

EVENING.

We had a rare treat, indeed, this evening. Prof. Peck delivered his very thoughtful and radical lecture, "What is Truth?" It was clear, logical, terse, abounding in telling hits and raining heavy blows upon popular falsehoods. The lecturer reached the conclusion that no man could decide for another what is truth; that each person must work out his or her own salvation, no authority, ecclesiastical or civil, being competent or having the right to enter into or to seek to control the private thought or action of any individual.

Following Mr. Peck came Nettie Pease Fox in a polished discourse upon "Spiritualism: What it Is and What it Teaches." She took strong ground against some of the previous speakers touching some points, notably the temperance question.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 8TH.

The Convention was called to order by Vice-President Billings. After the transaction of some routine business the committee on amendments to the Constitution submitted its report, recommending, in short, the wiping out of all compulsory membership fees, and permitting annual members to vote in all conventions of the year. Report accepted and adopted.

Now send in your names. If you think that you can go with us to the end of the journey, say so, and I will send you a certificate as life member. But if you think that you want to take us on probation, or that we ought only to take you in that way, why, all right; I will send you an annual certificate. We hav taken down the monetary bars. We invite you to come in without money and without price. It remains with you to say whether or not you will support the Iowa Liberal League by your voluntary contributions. It takes money to hold annual conventions, print constitutions and certificates, carry on a large correspondence, etc. If you think the cause a worthy one I hav no doubt you will help support it. To think otherwise would be to admit that secularism does not furnish a sufficient motiv to good action, that it is not a logic of life to those who nominally accept its teachings.

To return to the Convention, Friday morning. The Demands of Liberalism, as adopted at Marshalltown, were now read, whereupon M. E. Billings commented upon them at length. Exceptions being taken to one clause of the eighth demand, quite a discussion arose, participated in by Mrs. Lake, Dr. Hastings, Mr. Peck, H. W. Becket, the secretary, and others.

President Farrington just now arrived and was escorted to the chair. He briefly addressed the Convention in his ever-happy manner, impressing all who heard him with the conviction that the Iowa League had as its president the right man in the right place.

Some thirty-five new members joined the League during this session. The conference hour was a most interesting season—a time of spiritual outpouring, as it were.

AFTERNOON.

The first lecture of this session was given by Dr. Severance. Subject, "The True Republic." It was in this gifted lecturer's happiest vein—keen, cutting, humorous, radical, startling the timid by its bold flight along the dizzy pathways of forbidden themes, and shocking poor Mrs. Grundy almost out of her few remaining wits. It was very gratifying to the pioneers of social progress to hear the applause elicited by Dr. Severance's burning words.

After some desultory remarks by the secretary, and the appointment, on motion, of M. E. Billings of a special committee on amendments to Constitution, the Convention adjourned until 7:30 P.M.

EVENING.

Mrs. H. S. Lake opened the exercises of this evening with her lecture, "Death and the After-Life." One never tires of listening to Mrs. Lake, however much he may differ from her in the arguments employed or the conclusions reached. And she cannot talk even for a short time upon Spiritualism without weaving in so much of good, wholesome, secular truth as to command the admiration and win the assent of the most pronounced Materialist.

Now comes Col. D. M. Fox with a forceful lecture upon Spiritualism; then some more good music, and the second day of the Convention closes with the prospects bright and everybody happy.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 9TH.—9 A.M.

Convention opened with President Farrington in the chair. Routine business, and then report of committee on resolutions as follows:

Resolved. That we again indorse the platform and principles of the National Liberal League; that we remain irrevocably pledged to continue our efforts until all are equal before the law, without regard to belief or unbelief, until the state takes the mailed hand of law from the throats of unoffending men and women who deny the authority of church and priest.

Resolved. That woman has all the rights of man, including the same right to vote and hold office; and that she is only deprived of the exercise of those rights by the power of force by man; that the Christian superstition and the Bible hav been the prime causes of degrading woman by commanding her to be silent and obey the behests of her lord and master in all things; under the ludicrous pretense that her sex is cursed into this condition of mental, physical, and sexual slavery because Eve picked an apple for Adam to eat.

Resolved, That as all wrong is the result of ignorance, and all right the offspring of education; therefore we advocate the broadest education in all domains of science until the light of knowledge shall penetrate all the dark and noisome cellars of human ignorance and superstition.

A resolution was also adopted thanking the mayor and citizens of Tama for courtesies extended.

Committee on nominations next reported.

The following are the officers for the ensuing year: President, M. Farrington, Denver. Vice-presidents, A. Clegg, Des Moines; J. L. Johnson, Ogden; M. E. Billings, Waverly; Mrs. A. C. McKinney, Decorah. Secretary and chairman of the executiv committee, E. C. Walker, Norway. Ass't secretary, Maria L. Follett, Le Claire. Treasurer, Cornelia Boecklin, Burlington.

Besides the president, secretary, and treasurer, the board of directors consists of Leroy Dutton, Grand Mound; Abner Kimball, Wyoming. Delegates to St. Louis Congress: M. Farrington, Denver; E. C. Walker, Norway; Mrs. H. S. Lake, at large; Dr. D. C. Hastings, Quasqueton; M. E. Billings, Waverly.

The secretary takes this occasion to earnestly thank Mrs. Lake, Dr. Severance, Mr. Peck, and Mr. Farrington for kind words spoken in his behalf, and the friends from all parts of the state who so promptly responded to their appeal.

AFTERNOON.

S. D. Moore, of Michigan, was the first speaker at this session. His subject was "Human Progress," and it was well handled. Mr. Moore is of imposing presence, and he likes to talk upon his favorit themes. He has no faith whatever in any of the old superstitions. The next address was by the president, M. Farrington. He told us all about "The Great Storm," in which all of the human family, save a few favorits of the impartial God, got caught. Though laboring under the disadvantage of being the second speaker of the session, he had close attention to the close of his very instructiv discourse.

EVENING.

There was but one address on the program this evening—"Is the Bible God's Word?" by M. E. Billings. In it Col. Billings presented, in his accustomed forcible way, the unanswered and unanswerable arguments of the Freethinker against the claim that the Bible is something more than a human production.

After the lecture there came music, then one of those breezy conference hours, which are the delight of every true Freethinker's heart, for then all sides are heard, and falsehoods in dogma are exposed to the gaze of all. The church does not allow such freedom of expression in her meetings; she does not, for to do so would be to commit suicide. But Freethought and science thrive upon it. Discussion is the life of the agitator and the hope of humanity.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 10TH.

We had a very severe thunderstorm in the early forenoon of Sunday, and it was feared for a time that it would continue and break up the meeting; but it partially cleared up about ten o'clock, and we all repaired to Merchant's Hall, which had been offered us free of charge.

There was a lively conference hour, in which participated M. F. Aldrich, of New York; P. C. Welch, of Pella, one of the subtlest thinkers and most fascinating speakers on the Iowa Greenback-Labor platform; Alexander Risk, of Winthrop, who hates the old Bible superstitions as he does a stingy man; H. B. Smith, of Glidden, who went straight to the heart of the heredity question in one of the neatest, most effectiv ten-minute speeches of the whole meeting; Bro. Moore, and others. Then came the address, "The Philosophy of Spiritualism," by Nettie Pease Fox. We heard this lecture very highly commended by Christians as well as by those of her own faith.

AFTERNOON.

All now returned to the Fair Grounds, and we found our audience much augmented by large arrivals from the surrounding country, which would hav been still more numerous had it not been for the morning's storm.

"Is Jesus a Historical Character?" was the first lecture of the afternoon, by Col. M. E. Billings, and his answer was a learned and exhaustiv negativ. Col. Billings's positivness holds his auditors quiet while they listen to the most "blasphemous" arguments and demonstrations, and they go from his lecture wondering whether it be indeed a fact that "Jesus" is only a name and their religion but a patch-work fable; and when doubt enters in, their faith sits upon a shaky throne.

"Evolution versus Creation" was the scientific lecture of the whole convention. In it Prof. Peck contrasted the creation and development theories in a masterly manner, showing the utter untenability of all theories of special creation of universes and organic forms, and presenting a concise summary of the arguments and facts in favor of what is commonly called the Darwinian hypothesis of man's evolution from the lower forms of life, but which has been demonstrated by Ernst Haeckel, and is no longer a mere working theory or hypothesis. One great advantage to the ordinary listener is Mr. Peck's non-technical and perfectly clear language. Scientifically and grammatically accurate as he is, yet he manages to express the most erudite truths in words so plain and simple that his facts find ready lodgment in the minds of his hearers.

EVENING.

"The Mission of Liberalism," by Mrs. Lake, was the opening lecture of Sunday evening. Grandly beautiful in its fearless exposure of the evils and frivolities of our modern life, logical and radical in the remedies proposed, and sublime in its prophecy of that grand future when liberty, equality, and fraternity shall bless mankind, this lecture of an hour and a half was listened to with closest attention by an audience of more than eleven hundred persons. Can not we claim the Tama meeting to hav been a success when that many men and women were brought out in one evening to hear the gospel of liberty, love, and justice?

Dr. Severance gave the closing lecture of the evening and of the camp-meeting. It was a late hour when the last syllable fell from the lips of the speaker, and yet her audience remained, and had she spoken for an hour longer the number of listeners would not hav been sensibly diminshed. This discourse was more largely upon Spiritualism than any of the doctor's previous lectures, though she touched stirringly upon other topics.

Now came Prof. Peck, with his "Over the Garden Wall," putting the great crowd in the best of humor; then all were brought back to a sense of the stern duties of life by Matthew Farrington's thrilling benediction, asking the blessing and presence of Liberty to be upon and with all there assembled to the end of their mortal pilgrimage. Liberty! Ah! that is the watchword of the Freethinker; it is the sign in which we conquer; it is the central fundamental principle of all dissent; it is that for which we battle and toil, in whose sacred cause we suffer, and, if need be, are willing to enter the shadowy portals of the everlasting silence.

And to Matthew Farrington, our honored president, be meed of rightful praise for life-long devotion to Liberty, for consistent and persistent warfare in behalf of human rights, from young manhood's emprize hour to this 18th of Sept., 282, when the full measure of sixty rounded years pours at his feet the fair fruits of a well-spent life.

The second Annual Convention of the Iowa Liberal League and Secular and Spiritualist Camp-Meeting hav come and gone. Be it for us to apply the lessons of usefulness so freely taught by our gifted speakers. May we liv to enjoy and hav to enjoy many more such seasons of physical, mental, and moral growth.

To the local committee of Tama Liberals I return grateful thanks for help rendered and kind favors bestowed. Especially are we to render just praise to Matthew Baker and S. D. Dye. Without their efficient assistance and hearty co-operation our meeting would not hav been the complete success that it has. And to their families we are also under deep obligations.

E. S. Beakley and E. R. Bowe hav my hearty thanks for their ready help and many courtesies. L. S. Brown, our vigilant deputy-policeman and ever-handy aid-de-camp, must not be forgotten. To all other assisting Liberals and friends of Tama and vicinity, thanks. I cannot name you all. Fifty-four new members for the League during the Convention. Let us hav more. Fraternally,

A Call for Recruits for the Army of Progress.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We gained a glorious victory at Watkins Glen for universal mental liberty and progress. No such convention was ever held before, and no Freethought gathering ever received so extensive and fair notice from the secular press. It has put new life into the Liberal movement. Liberals are everywhere enthusiastic. And now this enthusiasm must not be allowed to die out. The flame must not only be kept burning, but increased. In another column of THE TRUTH SEEKER the reader will see I am calling for recruits for the army of progress. I shall publish my pamphlet about Oct. 20th, and I want three thousand names before that time to send out as the great Liberal army. Such a pamphlet will cause as great a sensation as did the Watkins Convention.

Reader, not only send me your name, but act as a recruiting officer in your neighborhood and send me all the names you can get. The membership fee is but twenty-five cents, and the price of the pamphlet thirty cents. So soon as the pamphlet is out you will see that every name will be utilized for the good of the cause in many ways. Forward!

Yours for the truth, G. W. NAILOR.

GYPSUM, N. Y., Sept. 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hope I may always be able to take your valuable paper, which is doing so much toward enlightening mankind. Keep on in your good work, and your name will stand out as a monument on the pages of history for all time.

Yours truly, A. D. SCHUTT.

LINDSAY, ONT., Sept. 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I feel rejoiced to think that, even for our priest-cursed Canada, there is hope. Ten years ago such a word as an "Infidel" paper would indeed very seldom be heard. But how changed! They are now household words, and THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator are, I may say, common property. Yours for the exercise of reason and the overthrow of dogma, THOS. A. MIDDLETON.

CHENEY, WASH. TER., Sept. 9, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.50 for Vol. IV. of "Around the World." I am in favor of Mr. Bennett's writing up our own country as part of the series of travels, and herewith pledge $1.50 per volume for such a work. I think it would be only fitting and proper for our old friend and teacher, with Mrs. Bennett accompanying him, to visit the principal towns and cities in the United States and become acquainted with the Liberals of the country.

Yours truly, ANNIE EVEREST.

PALMYRA, NEB., Sept. 19, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed five dollars. I am sorry that I hav made you wait so long. I want the whole number of books of your travels round the world. You may appropriate the fifty cents over and above the $4 50 for paying postage on books.

I find a few of your TRUTH SEEKERS are delivered at this office and very highly appreciated. We hav a good number of Freethought people in this vicinity, but a few of them are afraid to express themselvs publicly. I think your late travels one of the grandest moves made to start people to thinking. May they liv to improve, is my prayer!

J. T. REED.

HARWICH, MASS., Sept. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.15 to be applied on subscription to your paper. I sincerely hope every subscriber will feel under obligation to square up promptly and thus insure success to our indispensable paper, without which our cause would suffer immensely. We cannot afford to clog the wheel of reformation by being tardy and delinquent; let us make the cause our own and feel our responsibility. A little self-denial on the part of each subscriber would enable them to pay promptly, and in doing so all the machinery at headquarters would be lubricated and start up afresh. Will we not do it? I trust we will. B. F. ROBBINS.

NEW YORK, Sept. 29, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The Herald, speaking of the death of a Paterson young lady, says: "Her brightness was so promising that one can hardly appreciate why providence should hav called her so soon." The young man of the Herald should remember that the "Lord's ways are not our ways." Had she lived she might hav been tempted by the devil and fallen from grace. And suppose she failed to get grace back, what then? At death she would hav been saluted with "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Perhaps the Herald can now "appreciate" why providence was in a hurry.

W. W. FOSTER.

DOWLIN, TEXAS, Sept. 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Please publish this note gratis and send two copies of that issue to me, and I promis to try to giv your useful paper a lift in Texas. Tell your subscribers that I was born in the eighteenth century, Jan. 31, 1799, and I wish everyone who reads or hears of this note to send me a postal card, giving name, place, and creed. I will simply say that I am a constant reader of the Boston Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Agnostic, This World, and some others; so you can guess who I am. I aim this note only for those who were born as long ago as I was. I shall try and answer such of the brothers and sisters as send me the postal card. The list will doubtless be short, for we all know that few attain fourscore. I intend to mail at least twenty copies of this note to different editors. J. A. RUTHERFORD.

HOWE, TEX., Sept. 24, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.50, the amount due on subscription up to Jan. 1, 1883. I am sorry that I again find myself in arrears. But I hav waited until I could find some chance to earn the money without having to ask it of my husband. For although he is not a Christian, he takes little, if any, interest in the growth and spread of Liberal ideas, and I sometimes fancy that he would prefer that I should discontinue the paper, and not be quite such an outspoken Freethinker. I hav a family of eight children, and find no time to work for others, but I am going to raise my girls and boys to swell the ranks of Liberalism. My eldest son, a boy of fifteen, says we must still hav THE TRUTH SEEKER if we hav to stop the other papers. Hoping you may experience a local flood of $1 50's. I am as ever,

Your friend, ANNA M. BROOKS.

BLOOMVILLE, O., Sept. 28, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been reading your paper for some weeks, and I find in it notices of Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass." I hav tried to get a copy, but so far hav failed. Now I send direct to you. I am a school-teacher and an open and avowed Infidel, with a big I, hence I find some difficulty in obtaining employment, for the church is so Christian in its character as to be chock full of rank prejudice and even hatred. I wish that I could find some community so Christian that common sense instead of prejudice dictated therein. I would like to go and teach the children of men, and even the men, the true doctrin of universal progress. We hav some eight or ten Infidels in Bloomville who dare talk as they please, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is making more every week.

Send me the "Leaves of Grass" if you can, and I will be obliged. [Price, $2.] If you make a tour of the United States next, stop at our place if possible.

Yours to all interests and purposes, J. N. SEE.

COOLIDGE, NEW MEX., Sept. 9, 1882.

DEAR OLD FRIEND BENNETT: I believe that a whole year and more has elapsed since I hav troubled either the editor or THE TRUTH SEEKER with a line. I followed you, however, on your trip around the world; hav read with intense interest your letters to us from every clime you visited. And now that you are again in our "land of the free and home of the brave," like Rip Van Winkle I rouse from what seems to me to be a long, troubled dream to extend my welcome home to you. I simply seem to float with the Liberal elements in doing so. Such a great bereavement or misfortune has befallen me since my last letter, over a year ago, that I hav relapsed into a silence toward those I love and once knew, having no wish to thrust my sorrow upon others, some of whom may hav heavy burdens to bear as well as myself. I hope, however, on this particular occasion I will be pardoned for thrusting myself into sight to extend my heartfelt and sincere congratulations to you for the renown you hav won and the thousands of new friends you hav made in your trip around the world, and ask to be remembered by all THE TRUTH SEEKER friends everywhere, especially Elmina, Susan, Dr. Lyon, and many others whom it has been my pleasure to know by correspondence. Yours truly, J. ALLEN EVANS.

MASON, MICH., Sept. 23, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: My Christian friends tell me that the intellect is the soul, but I say it is not. If I get so drunk that I do not know my own name I would hav no intellect; so, then, I would not hav any soul. Or if a man became a raving maniac, then he would hav no soul! Otherwise the soul cannot be the intellect.

And others of my Christian friends tell me that the breath is the soul. But I tell them that this is absurd, for if that were so, every breath that they drew would be a new soul, and moreover every animal would hav a living soul.

The Bible tells us that God is the alpha and omega, the first and the last, the beginning and the end. Then the Christian tells us that the soul of man will liv forever. If that be so—that the creator is the first and the last, and that the soul of man shall exist forever—then it must be that the soul of man is of god. Admitting this, a certain portion of the divine creator himself must perish in hell! I think that he is a short-sighted creator that made man subject to sin, foreknowing all things, placing the evil before man when he knew that he would partake of it; and finally paying the transgression himself by dying on the cross. It is absurd to think of. I hope my Christian friends will soon hav a better opinion of a divine creator. H. WIXSON.

SOUTH DARTMOUTH, MASS., Sept. 12, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Had circumstances permitted I had intended to be with our friends at Watkins. But, as one said, "sarcumstances are mighty onsarten." We arrange beforehand what we will do; we lay our plans with great assurance; we say we will do so and so. But something occurs to upset all our calculations, all our plans, all our intentions. Still, notwithstanding all this, we meet plenty of people every day who assert and reassert in a most positiv manner that we are all "free agents." Do they really know what a free agent is? If we could act independent of surrounding events and circumstances we might with some propriety call ourselvs free agents. But how is it with us? We say to-day, perhaps, that, if nothing happens, we will go to Boston, or New York, or some other place to-morrow. Why do we qualify our language in this way—by interpolating the three words, "if nothing happens," if we are free to act in the full sense of the word? The very fact that we thus qualify our words is evidence that we are so completely surrounded on all sides by incidents and occurrences that we are not free in our movements. Then, again, there is another thing to be taken into account in this connection. But perhaps it is only putting the thing in a little different shape. I refer to the fact that we are not able to discern the future—what is to take place at some date ahead of the present is unknown to us. Could we with an "all-seeing eye" look into futurity, and thus find out what is to occur, we should then, indeed, be free agents in every sense. Till this occurs we may as well cease trying to vainly persuade ourselvs that in all our acts and deeds we are perfectly free, unhampered, and unconfined. I hav met with many of late who are identified with the church and who hold to the teachings of the theologians who are fully persuaded in regard to the truthfulness of the doctrin of free agency. These church people and believers in theological dogmas furnish very good timber out of which to construct a class who so credulously hold to the doctrins of "free agency."

Yours, EDWIN H. BARTLETT.

SAN ANTONIO, TEX., Sept. 23, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find printed letter of a correspondent of our daily paper:

AUSTIN, Sept. 21, 1882.

Editors Express: The dispatches stating that the Rev. J. D. Shaw, of Waco, had given evidence of a departure from the so-called orthodoxy is causing a great deal of comment here. Groups of people may be seen almost anywhere on the streets discussing the views of that prominent divine. I had a talk with several church-members, only a few of whom showed enough liberality to even admit that Mr. Shaw had any right to hav views of his own reflecting on or differing from the teachings of the books put into the hands of the studious religionist by his church. But I heard many use the usual charity that seems to be a concomitant and necessary part of a purely spiritual-and-a-belief-in-the-supernatural and mystified religion called Christianity, said charity being expressed in such terms as, "Oh, he is crazy," "He is trying to raise a sensation," "He was never honest in professing to be a Christian," "No honorable man would use a pulpit to preach against the church that made him," and other usual Christian expressions. There is a general sentiment among liberal and generous thinkers who are not mere sentimentalists, that Mr. Shaw has not so much for which to thank the church, unless a man with a very brilliant mind and strong brain should feel grateful for having been brought up to read only one side of a great question and taught to believe that to look into the other side was heretical and dangerous. It is also freely remarked that the usual uncharitableness of charity preaching professors of the Christian religion are using the only weapons at the command of an intolerant dogmatism when they accuse Mr. Shaw of insincerity and hypocrisy, and that Mr. Shaw need not expect either sympathy, just treatment, or a fair hearing. I will remark that I hav Mr. Shaw's sermons in full, having heard him deliver them both, and having taken them, with the permission of the gentleman, to publish them, and am preparing them for publication.

One by one they come marching forward out of the wilderness of bigotry and orthodoxy to kneel at the altar of truth and science. Wishing you success, I remain Yours fraternally, CHAS. L. SAUER.

A LETTER TO BE READ AND DIGESTED BY THOSE WHO BORROW LIBERAL PAPERS, BUT WHO ARE ABLE TO SUBSCRIBE FOR THEM.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Sept. 29, 1882.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: As you are aware, Robert S. Shoemaker, of Rush, Pa., is one of the most earnest and faithful Liberal workers in our ranks, and it pains me to learn that it is feared that consumption will soon deprive us of his most valuable aid in the cause of Freethought. I just received the following letter from him, and I desire to hav it published for the benefit of those who are able to subscribe for Liberal papers, but prefer to get the reading of others for nothing. H. L. GREEN.

RUSH, PA., Sept. 25, 1882.

Dear Friend Green: I see you are about to publish a pamphlet containing the names and addresses of members of the New York State Freethinkers' Association. Of course, I want a copy of it, for which I inclose you the stamps. My wife and I are both members of the Association. We lived at Wyalusing when we joined, but now liv in Rush, Susquehanna county, Pa. I think it a good idea to publish such a work in order to let us know where to find Freethinkers when we wish to do so. I am glad you had a good convention at Watkins Glen. I was so sorry I could not be with you.

I still continue distributing Liberal papers, tracts, and pamphlets through this section, and a great many say to me that they believe about as I do, but they are afraid to come out openly and advocate the Liberal cause. They are so afraid of Mrs. Grundy.

The great shame of Liberals is that they do not patronize Liberal papers. Although I can count up fifty Freethinkers in this vicinity, there are only two besides myself who subscribe for Liberal papers. The balance of them depend on borrowing their Liberal reading of my brother and myself or go without. I keep trying to get them to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER or Investigator, but don't hav much success. Some plead poverty, and some say their wife won't hav these papers in the house, etc.—any way to get out of doing their duty. I do feel cross about it sometimes, especially when people who are much more able to buy their reading matter than I am depend on some one else to furnish it to them free of charge. It is all right when they are under the thumb of the church; then I am willing to supply them; but when they get their eyes open and leave the church, they ought then to do to others as I hav done to them. With best wishes to Mrs. Green and yourself, I am,

Fraternally yours, ROBERT S. SHOEMAKER.

TROY, N. Y., Sept. 23, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: This is to acknowledge receipt of your postal card and book entitled "Crimes of Breeches"—I mean "Crimes of Preachers"—it's all the same, though, for most of the crimes are those of the former—a valuable book to read from, especially where one's Christian neighbors are within hearing distance. The facts are so stubborn that they hit the mark every time. No book, no matter how full of convincing argument it may be, will touch the generality of Christians as this one, for they are continually praising their ministers as if they were saints on earth instead of that criminals the nine-tenths of them prove themselvs to be. Since the "Crimes of Preachers" was published the criminal ministers and priests seem to be on the increase, as if their villainies were now going on through spite, from pure cussedness. Show them up, Bro. Billings, and you, Mr. Bennett, can slash priests and ministers as well as any man whose works I ever read. Your blunt, straightforward manner in dealing with your opponents is greatly to be admired. They don't hav the field all to themselvs when you enter into a discussion with them. I hope you may liv many years to disseminate your views upon religious and social questions, for I admit to the reading of your works (so kindly sent me by that good old gentleman, Mr. Frank, of Buffalo) that I owe my conversion from Christianity to Liberalism, and if you should think fit to print this, and it should meet Mr. Frank's eye, I hope he will believe that I am indeed thankful to him for his endeavors to Liberalize me, who was a mere stranger to him. I hope he is well and prosperous, for a kinder, human man I hav never met. I send you a newspaper received a few days ago from India. That is my home, strictly speaking, and I intend going back during next month some time. I'll call and see you while in New York, for if you hav any message to friends in Bombay I shall be happy to deliver it. I marked off an article in the paper I send with this, entitled, "Hill Chaplaincies." Read it; it's good. The paper may be interesting to you. Yours sincerely, WM. DALY.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Aug. 30, 1882.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: I received the books in good condition, and am well pleased with them. Please find inclosed five dollars, four of which is due you on the books of travel; for the balance you may send me five copies of Col. Billings's "Crimes of Preachers." I am glad to know that some one has been keeping tally for the lecherous bellwethers of the Christian flock; and I trust the colonel's book will serve as a "whip [of facts] to lash the rascals naked through the world" and show them up as they really are—a nuisance, which the people, if they only think, can get along without. Every Sunday-school should be supplied. These preachers know they are wrong. A preacher, it would seem, must necessarily be either a hypocrit or a fool. If he is a fool people will find it out. If he is a hypocrit they ought to know it, and Billings's book will be just the thing for the faithful lambs to chew.

I hav an uncle who is a minister of the old United Presbyterian church, a regular, full-blooded, five-points, predestination, hell-and-damnation, total-depravity, infants-in-hell-a-span-long, Calvinistic, nobody-will-be-saved-but-us sort. I think he is one of the hypocrit order. I once sent him a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER containing a list of sinful clergymen, to show him how things were getting along in God's "moral" vinyard, but it only increased his faith. He wrote me a sickly reply, trying to make out that they were only the bad "unbelievers" of the flock that were described in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and quoted some Bible slush to show that God had prophesied that there would be some hard cases, black sheep, etc., creep into the holy flock. "Why doesn't God put his stamp on the genuin article?" I replied, and wanted to contrast the best ministers with the great Infidels of the past and present, but the reply I received was that he "did not want to discuss that subject." That is the way with the hypocrit stripe. The fool stripe, like Elder Shelton, Humphrey, Talmage, etc., make a great noise with their orthodox boomerangs, but the hypocrits keep their mouths shut. By this craft we hav our grub; and he that hath no sense comes unto us, and we will take him in for Christ's sake and all the money he will giv.

Yours for truth, J. L. MCKELVEY.

J. PETTY'S REPLY AGAIN TO "WORKINGMAN."

MR. EDITOR: I am sorry to hav to trespass on your space and time again, but I cannot bear to be misrepresented; so please giv me another hearing to vindicate myself.

"Workingman" says, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 16th, I "write in a bungling manner." Why does he not tell me something I do not know? I never write in any other way. He then asks me, "Did you not intend to tell the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER that in writing that communication you were prompted by a selfish motiv and had a personal end to serve—an ax to grind?" Now, what an insult! Is that what you take me for? and then tell me "you were either disinterested or you were selfish," and then ask me "Which horn of the dilemma will you take?"

"Workingman," I never was prompted by selfish motivs nor a personal end to serve, nor can you prove it. All that kind of things were hatched in your own jobbernowl, not in mine. You add, I "assume to quote from your communication." I did quote; I did not assume. Did you not ask me, "Is it not possible that a few of the Greenback organization possess a Petty amount of information?" Did I not say, "I acknowledge the corn?" And then you charge it to me, saying "it is equal to Guiteau's jumble on the gallows," when it was your own jumble and your own child. Then you assume to saddle it on me, and then add, "If Patrick Ford had no religion I'd be apt to fall down and worship him." This, you say, is another child of Petty's, when it is your own assertion and you want to drop it at my door. But it is just like you, and you will hav to take it in. You add, "There are none that you worship, but you would worship Patrick Ford, you said, if he had no religion." You appear to agree with my proposition when I said that "the more ignorance a man possesses the better he is off," when you add that "ignorant people can be harmonized with less difficulty than independent thinkers," and then add again, "I do not accept his conclusion that the more ignorance a man possesses the better he is off." Now, what can we do with such a man, who says ignorant people can be organized with the least difficulty, but will not hav them because they are not independent thinkers? Yet he believes that organization is the balm in Gilead. You assert, "The church is a solid phalanx, and its cohesiv force is ignorance. So," you add, "is the Democratic party; so is the Republican party;" and add, "These are led by intelligent knaves." I do not believe it. I believe they are led by selfish and rascally knaves, which is not intelligence. I believe with you when you add, "We want a phalanx that will be governed by intelligence." In conclusion you add, "Let you and me harmonize our differences and help to the organization of our forces." How can you expect any such thing when I am such a bungler? But to conclude this squabble, I will giv you an anecdote. There was once an eccentric character very much like myself, and he got into jail. He had but one friend. (I do not know whether I hav one or not.) He went to see him, and said, "Jack, what brought you here?" "Well, Bill, I will tell you; I said the world was crazy, and the world said I was crazy, but the world being stronger than I, they put me in here."

J. PETTY.

LOCUST VALLEY, N. Y., Sept. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: In your replies to W. M. Whitehead's queries of the advantages of Liberal views over those of the Christian belief, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 16th, they are very lucid, and would be perfect by adopting and incorporating my associate philosophy, that there exists a cosmic mind-material or element which has the function of infinit intelligence, and a will-force acting co-operatingly, and thus dynamically and mechanically adequate upon its associate interdependent materials, which are not conscious or intelligent, in giving their laws of action for a purpose in the production of all phenomena as the only origin of their coherent potentiality. As all matter co-operates in varying proportions suited to different phenomena; and as co-operation we know to be an exclusiv act of intelligent impress and direction, therefore intelligent design and will-force impress are the only possible origin or impetus to motions or acts of unintentioned and unconscious matter of any kind. And of nature's coherent acts in mechanisms and adaptation to existing and coming needs, nothing but mind co-operation can giv such coherent purposes to such unconscious materials.

Such conjoint reply to above queries would assuredly be triumphantly complete; and, with the necessary association in my philosophy that all finite minds are individualized parts of that cosmic mind-material attracted to our prepared organisms and developed in proportion to their sensitiv structure, and so are as immortal as the source from which they come, would add to the happy results and conviction in such rational and scientific views of nature in its associate intelligent and non-intelligent materials as interdependent forces.

Such doctrin would be the most rational and happy substitute for the desecrating Christian, Jewish, and all other mythological religions, and so in conformity I believe would rapidly change the supernatural religions of the world by conviction of its truths into a natural and much-needed reform of simple adoration for and gratitude to such exclusivly good intelligent first cause as manifested in bounteous provision for every intelligent and animal gratification when rightly used. Thus, too, insuring us, our minds, with having that only satisfying immortality which is a necessity of our individuality partaking of such cosmic mind-element, and alone accounts for our intelligence as being co-creators for our own advancement in utilizing the adaptable materials of nature, as disposed by intelligent and beneficial direction,

Thus intelligent and unintelligent matter hav always existed in interdependent relations of coherent cause and phenomenal effects between controler and controled, as enforced mental oppressions upon and impressions from all such acts of unconscious matter in its useful and esthetic disposition which constitutes creation, while evolution is the foreseen and provided disposition in laws thus coherently impressed upon unintelligent matter as its potential mode of co-operation from the simple to the complex in ever increasing adaptability and usefulness which unintelligent and unintentioned matter of itself only could not provide for or co-operate to effect such coherent accomplishments.

With a high estimate of your general intelligence, acquirements, love of justice and kindness, I am persuaded that with unprejudiced close consideration of my philosophy of infinit and finite minds and of unconscious matter, our views may readily combine into a unique and scientific harmonious whole for the permanent enlightenment and advance of our race, intellectually, morally, and religiously, such as the world has never attained in philosophical completeness of appreciation of nature and its intelligent origin as cause and effects in the disposition of matter, not in the creation of matter by a mythical personal god as in all priestly religions assuming to rule men's minds. I would like to hav your valuable aid in promulgating such consummation.

Most truly yours, CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.

MR. EDITOR: My last article for THE TRUTH SEEKER was written nearly two months ago at Battle Creek. I had been spending a few days in this enterprising town of ten thousand inhabitants, and was about to leave for Kalamazoo, when I received a cordial invitation to spend the Sunday with the family of H. Crocker, occupying one of the finest residences on North avenue, in the western part of the city. On Saturday evening we had a kind of parlor entertainment, and I spent an hour in the recital of original poems, with much apparent satisfaction to the domestic circle. On Sunday morning the family carriage was brought into requisition, and we passed a large proportion of the day at Guquack Lake, Oak Hill Cemetery, and through the principal streets of the city generally. As Mr. and Mrs. Crocker are both very social and intelligent people, the several hours' ride was the more refreshing and enjoyable.

I had visited the great machine shops of Nichols & Shepard, and spent several hours among the workmen, and I am pleased to report that among the mechanics employed at these extensiv shops I met with many workmen who are orderly and systematic readers, and who are intelligent enough to select a line of historical and reformatory reading matter as far above and beyond the sectarian and fictitious lines as the light of day is clearer and brighter than the darkness of the night.

From Battle Creek I passed on to Augusta and Kalamazoo. There are several very earnest and practical friends and patrons to THE TRUTH SEEKER and its proprietor at Augusta, and they expressed much regret that they had not been apprised of the time of your visit at Kalamazoo, as they would hav availed themselvs of the opportunity of seeing you in person.

There are many activ, earnest Liberals all over the state of Michigan who hav read your journal and the many and important books you hav written and published, and there is a general desire to see you and hear directly from you upon the various topics which hav engrossed your attention so many years.

I spent a full week at Kalamazoo, stopping at one of the most popular boarding-houses in this charming city. While I was walking upon the street one morning in this city I met with a young and frivolous-appearing man, who said he was canvassing the town for a new edition of the Christians' Bible. I inquired of him if he did not think he was assisting to promote and perpetuate an idolatrous veneration for an old relic of the darker ages of ignorance and superstition. He answered very promptly and conclusivly. Yes, he knew he was, but he didn't care a d——n. He said very emphatically, "It is their money I am after, and so long as they will pay me their money freely I don't care a d——n what they do with the books. As long as the people like to be humbugged I like to humbug them, especially if they will pay me well for it." He went on to tell me how much he had done already that morning, and how much better he thought it paid to cater to the superstition of the people than to encourage them in reading scientific, philosophical, and reformatory works. He said he had tried both sides.

I parted with this stranger, reflecting upon the frailty, the weakness, and the depravity of human nature in its individual manifestations, but hoping that in the aggregation of human life there might be enough of intelligence and integrity to leaven the whole mass, when there shall be sufficient time for all the qualities and forces to find their equal and legitimate action in the development of the races.

At Kalamazoo, as at Marshall and Battle Creek, I found a large class of reading and Liberal-minded people. Not one of the former subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER refused to renew their subscription, and several who had taken it some years ago concluded to take up the line of march with the increasing army, fifty thousand strong, who are now readers of this strongest exponent and defender of constitutional rights and individual liberty. There were added to the old list at Kalamazoo twenty new and substantial recruits, making nearly a half hundred in all, and it is strongly hoped that none will fall off, but that the number will gradually and permanently increase, not only in this town, but all through the state and the country generally. THE TRUTH SEEKER, with such correspondents as Elizur Wright, T. B. Wakeman, T. C. Leland, Putnam, Pillsbury, Palmer, Elmina D. Sienker, Grace L. Parkhurst, Susan Wixon, and a host of other dear minds and warm, earnest hearts, will operate like a strong and ever-increasing force to clear away the rubbish of ignorance and superstition and to erect and establish institutions and enterprises which will look forward to a more hopeful and happy future for the race,

Yours truly, C. S. ROWLEY.

Only a Girl.

BY ETHEL ETHERTON.

Close the door carefully, muffle the tread,
Drop the soft curtains round the white bed,
A pale mother's sleeping, aye, giv her rest,
See the fresh rosebud upon her white breast;
She has struggled with pain, she has wrestled with death;
Her's is the victory; let not a breath
Awaken her slumbers; hark, there's tread
Nearer and nearer approaching her bed;
Manly his bearing, yea, noble his mien;
Lowly he bends the fair sleepers between,
Lifts the frail floweret, with womanly care,
Breathlessly gazing, his lips part in prayer.
No! there's a chill in the ambient air.
Each word falls distinctly and painfully slow,
Curdling and freezing the blood in its flow;
"It's only a girl"—a hush as of death
For the moment suspended each listener's breath;
In the pause, the pale sleeper uplifted her eyes,
"I must hav been dreaming," she said with surprise;
"I thought that a cold hand of iron clutched my heart,
While hard, cruel words, like a poisonous dart,
Pierced my soul to its core; I sprang for my babe!
'It is only a girl!' were the words I heard said,
And Elmer, O Elmer, that voice was like thine;
That hand—angels spare me—once warmly clasped mine,
As you called me more precious than ruby or pearl,
And yet it was when I was only a girl!
If a girl is thus dear, then the mother and wife
To every true man is as dear as his life!"
She clasped the cold hands o'er her hot, throbbing brow,
The blood had all rushed to that citadel now;
Then her words, quick and scathing, burned into the soul;
Emotion swayed reason beyond her control;
"It's only a girl"—O man in thy strength,
Know that God measures souls by their depth—not their length.
The streamlet may wind o'er miles of fair earth,
Yet bear on its bosom no proud ship of worth.
A man may hold kingdoms, and nations control!
What is that to the birth of one beautiful soul?
The germ in your strong arms unfolded with care
May, like Harriet Hosmer, or Rosa Bonheur,
Move the world by her art or lull it to rest
With poesy's magic, the balm of the blest,
The mission of motherhood! Man! do you dare,
With sneers stain this sanctum sanctorum of prayer,
This holy of holies, this mightiest dower?
Dare to scoff at the sex in which lies this power?
Ah! Whence were the monarch, the duke, and the earl?
Had not each a mother, once "only a girl?"
And whence came thy being and all the proud van
You marshaled in battle—yes, every man?
The magnet that led them through storm and through strife
Was a mother, a sister, a sweetheart, or wife,
Each closely enshrined in his heart like a pearl,
And yet each fair image was "only a girl."
It was only a girl that Deity chose
To incarnate the Christ. The story in prose
Sweeps down through the ages like stars through the night
To illumin the world with its God-given light.
'Twas only frail woman that wept at the tomb
And talked with the angels when Jesus had gone;
And woman that bore the glad tidings to man
That Christ, the beloved, had risen again.
'Twas "only a girl" in a womanly form
That steered a brave ship through tempest and storm
When the captain lay dying—dismayed the whole crew;
That vessel by woman was piloted through.
Still another, more noble, courageous, and brave,
Saved a burning ship's crew from a watery grave;
In an hour of dire peril, when every breath
Was a prayer, for the breakers were talking with death;
When no man on shore would imperil his life,
This beautiful girl, in her beautiful faith,
Gave humanity one hand, the other to God,
And landed them safe on the briny-washed sod.
Another as self-sacrificing, as brave,
Whose youth, strength, and beauty are given to save
The aqueous traveler whose bark would strand
On ocean-jagged rocks and bars of sand.
Without her beacon-light outshining far,
As if God had let down a guiding star,
And trusted it, so fraught with life and death,
To a weak girl, but strong in holy faith.
But countless numbers, like a torrent, rush
Into my mind. I see God's burning bush,
And by its light I gather gems and pearls—
In every age and clime once "only girls."
Go to the reeking battlefields of yore
And read the records writ in human gore
Of woman's valor, mercy, courage, love,
And point me to one name that's carved above
The name of woman in such deeds as these,
And I will pray to heaven, on bended knees,
That every child henceforth may be a boy,
That every father's heart may leap with joy.
But ere in scorn you breathe "Only a girl,"
Look, lest you cast aside the greater pearl,

Two Ministers Disagree Totally.

From the New York Sun.

The Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby lately told a reporter of the Times, who interviewed him with regard to the religious condition of the city, that he saw nothing discouraging in it. Indeed, that Presbyterian pastor was very well satisfied with the way things were going on, saying:

I was born in New York, and I may say that I know this city through and through, and because I know it I feel free to say that, all things considered, the religious aspect is quite satisfactory. Here is where a large part of the rascals of America and a goodly proportion of the dregs of Europe congregate, and this is very bad material to deal with. I believe the ministers of New York, of all denominations, work as hard as any body of ministers in the world; and if the results fall below the numerical exhibits of other parts of the country it is because it is in the nature of things that it should be so, and I know of no way in which the matter can be mended.

Is not that a rather remarkable statement for a Christian minister to make? In substance, Dr. Crosby declared that the material of the population of New York was in large part so bad that Christianity could not be expected to show the progress here it was making in other places. "I know of no way in which the matter can be mended," he added. By that he seems to hav meant that, for one, he gave up hopes of any improvement, and was entirely satisfied to let things remain as they are.

But it is true, as Dr. Crosby claims, that the low state of religion in New York shown by the statistics of church membership is due to the congregation here of nativ rascals and "the dregs of Europe?" If that is so, then the major part of the population of the city must be made up of those rascals and dregs, for the majority of the inhabitants are so far indifferent to religion that they do not attend the churches at which Dr. Crosby says the ministers are working so hard and so faithfully.

Everything that is bad in New York, in our municipal government, in our social life, and in our public morals, is very often attributed by observers like this Presbyterian minister to those nativ rascals and foreign dregs. That corrupt and degraded part of the population which, after all, must be numerically very small in proportion to the whole, is given by such philosophers an extraordinary amount of influence in the city.

The Rev. Dr. Rylance, of the Episcopal church, however, took a different view of the religious situation in New York. So far from regarding the condition of religion here as satisfactory, he did not hesitate to say that "I deem it very unsatisfactory—to a degree that is almost discouraging." The hot haste of the population after money he held to be one of the causes of the prevailing religious indifference; for he agreed with Mr. Richard Grant White that New York was like a mining camp, crowded with adventurers, "a reckless class, full of dash and spirit, and bent on gratifying every desire"—trying to get rich or to make the most of their riches rather than to save their souls. But Dr. Rylance found another more general cause for the trouble. It was the growth of skepticism, which is something far more serious than mere thoughtless neglect of religious observances.

"It is in the cities," he explained, "that scientific skepticism has struck deepest root, for there the most reading and thinking is done." The statistics of church membership, not long ago published by the Times, discouraging as they were, "were more favorable to organized religion than the facts," said Dr. Rylance, who added:

I am sorry to say that in nearly all church returns there is much dead wood. Often there are names on the books that can be duplicated from grave-stones, especially in the larger organizations. But this is nothing compared to the number who continue to figure on the roll and hav dropped away through indifference or other causes. They hav not left the church in form, but nevertheless hav ceased to be members. Their faces are never seen in the churches, they contribute nothing, and cannot be counted as religious factors.

Nor is that the worst. "I fear," he said, "that many good men still attend church from mere habit, or because they deem it wise to keep up a semblance of belief," and do not wish to lend personal aid to the disintegration of religious faith they see going on. "This leads to half-heartedness and mere convention, both in pulpit and pew."

Does not that read very much like what the Sun has so often said? It is not because of "the rascals of America and the dregs of Europe" that the religious condition of New York is so alarming, but because there is an actual decline of religious faith both inside and outside of the churches, both in the pulpits and in the pews. And so far from the situation being satisfactory, as Dr. Crosby says, it is, to use the words of Dr. Rylance, "very unsatisfactory—to a degree that is almost discouraging."

And the Episcopal clergyman differed just as squarely from the Presbyterian minister as to the responsibility of the churches for this declining interest in religion and this growing disintegration of religious faith. "I think," said Dr. Crosby, "all the churches are doing a good work, and should not be held accountable for what, in the nature of things, is inevitable." But to the question what is to be done, Dr. Rylance replied:

My answer is a despairing one. The chief obstacles to a better state of things are in the churches themselves, in the maintenance of notions and forms that are not vital to true Christian religion, and only tend to place the church in a false position toward, and out of harmony with, the world. Some things we can do, and these should be done. My idea is to preach and practice the Christian ethics with a minimum of doctrin, laying particular stress upon man's brotherhood and God's fatherhood, and dismissing things in hundreds that hav hitherto been insisted upon, especially in the way of mere ecclesiasticism. I think such a course would be in the right direction. What we need is less dogma and a higher order of Christian or spiritual ethics.

The only thing which can check advancing Infidelity is genuin Christianity, not only preached but practiced also. Churches which are maintained as a sort of religious clubs for the delectation of their privileged members, outraging Christianity in their very constitution, can never stem the progress of that tide.

AT this season, and during the winter, many persons will suffer a great deal of discomfort from cold feet. This is due to imperfect circulation, and can be remedied by wearing the Wilsonia Magnetic Insoles. They develop and maintain a more activ circulation, and thereby promote warmth. As a consequence of this, the tendency to contract cold and influenza is very much diminished, and with children croup and pneumonia will be warded off. There is abundant testimony to support these assertions. The comfort afforded by these Insoles is worth many times their cost. Adults', $1.50 per pair; children's, $1. Mailed on receipt of price. National Convention of Spiritualists

At Detroit, Mich., in Royal Templar's Hall, corner of Woodward and Grand River avenues, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, Oct. 27, 28, and 29, 1882. This convention is for the purpose of discussing the feasibility of organization among Spiritualists upon a rational, scientific, philosophical, and moral basis. Many hundreds hav indorsed this call, and it is hoped each devoted true spiritualist will either be present or send communications, or at least their name and address, as in sympathy with this movement. Among a few of the many who hav signified their intention of being present if possible, are Maria W. King, A. J. King, Dr. J. M. Peebles, Capt. H. H. Brown, J. P. Whiting, Giles B. Stebbins, Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, Chas. A. Andrus, A. B. French, J. H. Palmer, etc.

Circular.

To the Freethinkers of the United States and of Canada:

I propose to publish immediately a pamphlet containing the Articles of Association of the New York State Freethinkers' Association, including its creed and platform, viz: The demands of Liberalism, the resolutions passed at the late Watkins Convention, with the names of the officers of the association and an alphabetical list of the members with the full post-office address of each.

This association, in many respects, is national in its character. Its articles of association confine its membership to no section of country, and at each convention the Freethinkers of all the states and of Canada are invited to participate. And I wish to hav every person in the United States and of Canada, who desires to be known as a Freethinker (who has not already done so), to at once unite with this association, so that his or her name and post-office address may appear in the pamphlet. All that is necessary to become a member, is to send your name and twenty-five cents to me. The price of the pamphlet and postage will be thirty cents.

Those who are members are requested to immediately forward to me their names written in full with their full post-office address. These addresses should be written very plainly, so that no error shall appear when published.

Now, Liberal friends, whether you are known as Materialists, Spiritualists, Free Religionists, or Agnostics, at once send in your names, that we may hav a full and perfect list of the Freethinkers of the United States and of Canada.

FOR GIRLS.

A

SPECIAL PHYSIOLOGY,

OR,

Supplement to the Study of General Physiology.

ILLUSTRATED.

BY MRS. E. R. SHEPHERD.

12mo. EXTRA CLOTH. PRICE $1.00.

We hav here a work, the need of which has long been felt by all intelligent women, and especially by mothers and teachers, conveying to girls that special knowledge so important to them, but which, for proper reasons, must be omitted altogether from the general and school physiologies. Written in a careful and entirely unobjectionable manner, it is so plain and practical as to be easily understood, and its perusal is sure to leave an impression of the importance of the subject on the minds of the readers. It discusses the physiology of woman; the proper relation of dress to comfort and health; the age of puberty; menstruation; some of the diseases of women, their causes and prevention; something about marriage and motherhood, and many other topics of importance.

The special attention of mothers and teachers is called to this book, with the hope that they will read it, and convey to their daughters or girls in their charge the information given; or, better still, after reading, place it in the hands of the girls for whom it was written. Sold at this office.

THE SABBATH.

BY M. FARRINGTON.

A thorough examination and refutation of the claims of Sabbatarians who are trying to foist upon the country their holy day by unconstitutional legal enactments. EXPERIENCES IN EARTH AND SPIRIT LIFE

Revelations, by a Spirit,

through the trance mediumship of

MRS. NETTIE PEASE FOX,

Mediumistic author of "The Golden Key, or Mysteries Beyond the Veil;" "A Search for the Temple of Happiness;" "The Unattained Attainable," etc.

Bound in cloth, $1. Sent, post-paid, to any part of the world.

This is one of the most deeply interesting Spiritualistic works ever published. Given in narrativ form by a lady whose earth life was one of strange vicissitudes, startling events, and wonderful mediumistic experiences. After many years in spirit life she returns to earth, and, through the fully entranced organism and powers of another, gives her earth history, followed by revelations from spirit life, interesting and instructiv to those who would know of the condition, opportunities, and employments of those who hav crossed the "narrow stream meandering these two worlds between." A better understanding of this remarkable book may be obtained by consulting the following table of a few of the many subjects upon which we hav revelations from the spirit world.

Death Foretold; Death-bed Visions and Revelations; Is There Another Life? Angel Ministration; Spirit Prophecy Fulfilled; Saved from a Horrible Fate by Spirit Warning; A Father's False Representations Corrected by the Spirit Mother; Life Saved by Spirit Power; My Death Foretold; My Sudden Departure from Earth Life; First Awakening in Spirit Life; Mansions in Spirit Land; Return to Earth Life; Some Spirits Still Worship a Personal God; Spirits Attend a Marriage Ceremony of Earth; Marriage in Spirit Life; Temple of Science; Library; Modes of Traveling; Visiting Another Planet; Meeting of Husband and Wife, whose earthly marriage had been unfortunate, and many important revelations are given of life and its employments in the spirit world; deeply interesting.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey around the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 30, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey aronnd the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case. Some of those were in a terribly shattered condition—had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become so loathsome and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHEA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Hernia (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by a slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urinary deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or milkish hue, again changing to a dark and turpid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs.

☞ Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

Sent to any address securely sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhea or Seminal Weakness, giving its cause, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, headed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. ☞ Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. R. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Notices from the Press.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Daily Times.]

We cordially indorse Dr. R. P. Fellows as an able and learned physician who has been so highly successful that his name is blessed by thousands of those who found no relief in the old medication, but were cured by the scientific method originated by Dr. Fellows.

Gems of Thought.

As the influence of woman has been uniformly elevating in new civilizations, in missionary work in heathen nations, in schools, colleges, literature, and in general society, it is fair to suppose that politics would prove no exception.—History of Woman Suffrage.

In love, if love be love, if love be ours,
Faith or unfaith can ne'er be equal powers;
Unfaith in aught is want of faith in all.

It is the little rift within the lute
That, by and bye, will make the music mute,
And, ever widening, slowly silence all.

The little rift within the lover's lute,
A little pitted speck in garnered fruit,
That, rotting inward, slowly molders all.
—Tennyson's Idylls of the King.

Curious, I say, and not sufficiently considered, how everything does co-operate with all. Not a leaf rotting in the highway but is an indissoluble portion of solar and stellar systems; no thought, word, or act of man but has sprung, withal, out of all men and works sooner or later, recognizably or irrecognizably, on all men. It is all a tree—circulation of sap and influence - mutual communication of greatest and minutest portion of the whole. The tree Igdrasil, that has its roots down in the kingdom of hela and death, and whose boughs overspread the highest heaven.—Carlyle's Hero-Worship.

There is no cruelty so inexorable and unrelenting as that which proceeds from a bigoted and presumptuous supposition of doing service to God. Under the influence of such hallucination all common modes of reasoning are perverted and all general principles are destroyed. The victim of the fanatical persecutor will find that the stronger the motivs he can urge for mercy are the weaker will be his chance of obtaining it, for the merit of his destruction will be supposed to rise in value in proportion as it is effected at the expense of every feeling, both of justice and of humanity.—Colton's Lacon.

If a father's economy degenerates into a minute and teasing parsimony, it is odds but that the son, who has suffered under it sets out a sworn enemy to all rules of order and frugality. If a father's piety be morose, rigorous, and tinged with melancholy, perpetually breaking in upon the recreation of his family and surfeiting them with the language of religion on all occasions, there is danger lest the son carry from home with him a settled prejudice against seriousness and religion as inconsistent with every plan of a pleasurable life, and turn out, when he mixes with the world, a character of levity and dissoluteness.—Paley.

After hearing the pastor of a Unitarian church ascribe the post-office to Christianity, nothing surprises me. That pious people should giv Protestantism credit for the printing press and the submarine cable seems rational. The same folk believe that Tenterden steeple was the cause of the Goodwin Sands and that thunder is the cause of lightning.—O. B. Frothingham.

Not in the Bible, but in the Koran, do I find a sentence that best enunciates the great need of the hour—reform in civil service of the republics. It reads, "A ruler who appoints a man to office when there is in his dominions another man better qualified for the position, sins against God and against the state."—Chadwick.

Those who can read the signs of the times read in them that the kingdom of man is at hand.—Prof. Clifford.

Assertion to some people is as conclusiv as proof.—Mrs. E. Lynn Lynton.

If Christianity has civilized the world, it is her duty to explain the principle on which it has been done. The diluted, emotional philosophy, which first gave currency to faith, could not confer firmness and purity upon human motivs. Christians in all ages hav had the good taste to admire stoical virtues and to preach them, but hav not been able to practice them. Austerity, self-denial, and even suffering hav alone raised humanity to a higher plane of thought and feeling, and carried the soul somewhat out of the sphere of sense. Self-indulgence has never subdued selfishness and pride, but rather causes men to neglect their suffering friends. For a time Christianity came to the relief of those who could not bear the strong meat of the stoics, but it presents to the masses no saving principle to cause them to love morality for its own sake. And we all know by experience that although we hav sought pleasure rather than pain, the hard lessons which hav done us the most good hav been forced upon us by trouble and misfortune; but this is not the language of theology.—Alhaza.

When the church was small and poor, what public charity did it aid? Hear what Ingersoll says of the "morning" of Christianity: "How many hospitals for the sick were established by the church during a thousand years? Do we not know that for hundreds of years the Mohammedans erected more hospitals and asylums than the Christians? Christendom was filled with racks and thumbscrews, with stakes and fagots, with chains and dungeons, for centuries before a hospital was built. Priests despised doctors. Prayer was medicin. Physicians interfered with the sale of charms and relics. The church did not cure—it killed. It practiced surgery with the sword. The early Christians did not build asylums for the insane; they charged them with witchcraft and burnt them. They built asylums, not for the mentally diseased, but for the mentally developed, and these asylums were graves."

"Oh, what a night was that which wrapped
The human mind in gloom!
Oh, what a sun which breaks this day
On superstition's doom!

Ten thousand happy voices join
To hail the glorious morn;
We'll scatter blessings far and wide
On nations yet unborn."
—Elmina D. Slenker.

Odds and Ends.

When the funds are unsteady—When money is tight.

Gladstone says the fear of becoming ridiculous is the best guide in life. Ladies who follow the fashion are without a guide.

It is claimed that some of the beef now sold is impregnated with garlic. They hav to strengthen it so it can hold up the price.

A Kentucky book agent was attacked by robbers the other day, but he succeeded in talking them to death before the villians could escape.

"A reputashun," says Josh Billings, "once broken may possibly be repaired, but the world will always keep their eyes on the spot where the krack was."

Mrs Maloney.—"That's a foin child ov yours, Mrs. Murphy. How old is he?" Mrs. Murphy.—"He'll be two years to-morrow. He wur born on the same day as his father."

"What made the mule kick you?" they asked of the gentleman who had been seen flying through the roof of a barn. And he answered: "Do you think I was fool enough to go back and ask him."

"What is periphrasis?" asked the lady of the city editor. "Why, madam," said he, "it's simply a circumlocutory pleonastic cycle of oratorial sonority, circumscribing an atom of ideality lost in verbal profundity."

There was a young lady in Worcester
So scared by a crow of a rorcester
That her mother cried, "Hannah,
I'm surprised at your mannah!
Why don't you behave as you orcester?"

A young man who undertook to trace his family back two centuries, struck a penitentiary before he had exhausted one century, and concluded to stop. He feared he would collide with a gallows before reaching the objectiv point.—Norristown Herald.

"What will I do with my hens if they do not lay?" Let them get into your neighbor's garden among the vegetables. If they do not lay, the neighbor will probably lay them. The only trouble about the method is the hens are laid out so soon.

"We hav banished that tall, long-necked fellow from our set," said a Fifth avenue belle to a young Egyptian. "Yaas," drawled the descendant of a mummy, "I see he is ostrich-sized." Music by the band and the surf on the shore drowned the subsequent conversation.

Iconoclastic photography: The horse has always been spoken of as a noble animal: but the instantaneous photographs which hav been made of him threaten to bring him into well-merited contempt. You can't respect an animal whe looks like a kangaroo with a broken back.

Lizzie, aged seven. Her mother tells her she must not take the jam, because God sees her. "Can he see me in the closet if I shut the door?" "Yes, certainly." "Could he see me if I got in your pocket?" "Yes, God sees every one." "But could he see me if I got under the table and pulled the cloth over me?" "Yes, I tell you, God sees you all the time." Lizzie (poutingly)—"Oh! pshaw! I would like to be by myself some of the time!"

Ministers will hav their little jokes like other people. "Come over and preach for me to-night," said a divine to a clerical friend whom he met in the street. "I can't to-night," was the reply; "I'm right down ill with a sick headache." "Well," drolly observed the other, "that won't matter, for if you preach as you usually do you won't hav to use your head." They both laughed, and poked each other in the ribs and said it was a good one, just as though they had been the worst kind of sinners all their lives.—Yonkers Gazette.

Ella Wheeler wants to know if we are going "where the summer shadows dance." No, love, we are not. We are going to sit in the skylight of the Commercial Building and howl for paste, and claw the exchange fiend, and pray for the man who stole the scissors, and swear that the deaf editor wrote that obnoxious paragraph. That's our vocation. Perhaps some other people will change their shirts and go, but if the summer shadows hav any business with us—with us personally—they must come around to the office, Ella, and sit beside us for a while when the foreman announces that the column is short.—Commercial Advertiser.

TESTING HER BORROWING CAPACITY.

"Here's that yeast," said a little girl to the lady of a family who had recently moved into the neighborhood.

"Why, couldn't your mother use it?" inquired the lady.

"Oh, we buys all our bread at the bakers."

"Buy all your bread! Then what did you want of my yeast?"

"Oh, ma says she couldn't think of anything she needed to borrow just then, and she wanted to see if you could be depended on in a case of emergency, so she tried you on the yeast."—Chicago Journal.

"Parson," said a man approaching an Arkansaw minister, "I reckon you'd better take my name off your church books and let me go!"

"Why so?" asked the preacher. "You hav always been a consistent church-member."

"Well, you see I stole a mule and I thought that it wouldn't be healthy for the church for me to belong to it."

"When did you steal the mule?"

"About six months ago."

"Why, since that time you hav assisted in several revivals. When were you seized with remorse?"

"To-day."

"Was there a cause that influenced you to make an acknowledgment?"

"Yes, something of a cause."

"What was it?"

"They proved that I stole the mule. So I hav concluded to quit the church. If they hadn't proved it, I would hav remained longer."—Arkansaw Traveler.

THE

BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?

BY

Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,

A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.

The author, though possessing all the prerogatives of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.

The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come rom? What is their authority? and, What is the real ource of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the ght of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what sitself a marvelous condensation.

WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.

The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.

The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adocated.

The strong commendations of the secular press show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."

HISTORY
OF THE
CHRISTIAN RELICION
TO A. D. 200.

By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.

Verdict of European Scholars.

The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religio Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.

Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupferschmidt, the secretary, says:

"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a criticism of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."

The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learners," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."

One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

THE BOSTON INVESTIGATOR,

The oldest reform journal in the United States,

Is published every Wednesday at the Paine Memorial Building, Boston, Mass.,

By JOSIAH P. MENDUM.

Edited by HORACE SEAVER.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.

The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months or one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted, we won't ask you to continue without any longer. 6m33

Notes and Clippings.

PAUPER lunacy is largely on the increase in London. The greatest difficulty is experienced in finding accommodation.

GIVEN a good quartet and a fine organist, a fashionable church can get along with very cheap preaching.—New Orleans Picayune.

NOW the vexed question is whether John Bunyan was decended from Scotchmen, Italians, or Gypsies. It is claimed that the first Bunyan in the British Islands was an Italian mason who came to labor on Melrose Abbey. In the Melrose Abbey graveyard the oldest tombstone has on it the uame of Bunyan.

AN unmarried clergyman in Vermont discoursed learnedly upon the evils arising from the use or wearing of corsets by the softer sex. And now the curious women folks of his congregation want to know, you know, how he found out all he knows so knowingly about things that unmarried men know nothing about.

MR. MARROWFAT was reading at the breakfast table an account of a very sad affair. It related to the case of a fashionable lady who, disregarding the love of a devoted husband and careless of the fate of three beautiful children, had eloped with another man. When his father had finished the account little Miltiades suspended his attack upon the hash and asked quite solemnly, "Papa, what church has lost its pastor?"

THE prohibitory liquor law is still openly violated in nearly all the cities of Kansas, though pretty strictly enforced in the rural districts. Leavenworth has 117 barrooms, in which business is not interfered with, and the owners pay the old city license, just as they did before the law was passed. Topeka has 104 public bars, and Atchison 70. The largest place where liquor is sold only out of sight is Emporia, with 6.000 inhabitants.

"You do not shine very brilliantly in the role of a prophet, Mr. Fogg," said Parson Jones; "I thought Mr. Crapo was going to get the nomination." "Now, look here, Mr. Jones," replied Fogg, "it's all very well for you to talk. I confine my predictions to this world, and you to the next. When you make a slipup nobody this side of the graveyard knows anything about it; but you just try your hand on mundane politics, and you'll see the difference."

THE Rev. Dr. Thomas, of Chicago, who was not long ago turned out of the Methodist church for alleged heresy, says that he is happier now than ever before. He carries on his preaching in connection with the People's church. This organization does not possess a house of its own, with the customary equipment of first, second, and third mortgages, but rents Hooley's Theater, and manages its affairs on a cash basis of revenue and expenditure from week to week. Dr. Thomas draws large audiences that seem to be very glad to hear him preach. He receives an ample salary.

IN Boston a confectioner has been fined ten dollars for sending ice cream to his customers on Sunday that they might hav it for dinner. The court which inflicted this fine decided that ice cream is not one of the necessaries of existence in such a sense as to warrant sending it out on Sunday. The old-time practice among the Puritans of Boston and its vicinity was to hav cold dinners on Sunday. The absence of hot cookery on the day of rest was considered the essence of household godliness. The degenerate sons of these staid old sires hav introduced the modern luxuries of hot Sunday dinders, ice cream being the only really cold thing on the table to remind them of early days. It will be a sad hardship for many a family if this frigid confection is legally torn away from the Sunday dinner table. In this city the Sunday delivery of ice cream for dinner is as common as that of milk for breakfast.

AN original sect is reported to exist in Finland, the fundamental principle of which is the sovereign authority of woman in the family. The disciples of the sect, whether married or living in concubinage, take an oath to submit themselvs entirely to their wife or mistress, and to confess to her once a week. On their side the women choose one of their number as sovereign, whose duty it is to see that the men remain faithful to their oath, and to punish them if they transgress. There are some villages entirely devoted to this new religion. The only analogy to this sect is to be found in Siberia, where the Purifiers recognize equally the authority of women.

PROF. JOSEPH LECONTE, of the University of California, has examined the footprints which hav lately attracted attention at Carson, Nevada. He savs that the strata exposed in a quarry consist of heavy bedded sandstones, alternating with thin layers of shale. The stone has been removed down to an even stratum of shale, which forms the floor. The whole area thus cleared is literally covered with tracks of many species of mammals and birds. Le Conte concludes that they were made in the early age of man's existence, but he does not believe that any of them are the imprints of human feet, though some may possibly be so. Those of gigantic elephants are unmistakable, and others are of extinct species of birds.

THE Rev. Dr. Patton, president of Howard university, and the Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, hav had a disagreement over the question whether lying is ever justifiable. Dr. Patton says that a lie intended to deceive a murderer and thereby saving a life is sinful, and he blames Dr. Buckley for teaching otherwise. Dr. Buckley reasserts his views as follows: "In case of an attempt to commit murder or any other high crime, a denial of the presence of the person or an announcement of his departure seems to me to be right. The man about to do murder has no claims upon me growing out of human or divine law. If possible, I must seize and confine him and hand him over to the officers of the law. If this cannot be done by force, I must prevent his act; if this be impossible or hazardous, any stratagem to accomplish the end is right."

MUCH curious information is conveyed in the "Report of the Health of Wenchow," compiled by Dr. D. J. Macgowan. The author has gathered together a miscellaneous collection of memoranda concerning many of the superstitions prevalent in the celestial empire. Epidemic frenzies are very common in China, the most conspicuous recent instance being the terror created in 1876 by the supposed supernatural clipping of queues. Sorcerers are in the habit of scattering charmed bits of paper representing men, which are the means of disseminating evil spirits throughout the community. When one of these spirits enters a house he proceeds to cut off a piece of the queues of the inmates, and the sorcerer, on obtaining possession of this, can evoke at will the soul of its owner, which he is able thereafter to use as a servil demon, while the man dies through the loss of his spirit. The only cure is for the sufferer to cut off an inch or two more of the remainder of his hair and keep it for eighty days soaking in a cesspool, thus severing the mysterious connection between his head and the portion of hair in posssession of the sorcerer. But for prevention, reliance is placed on amulets and charms. In 1876 the governor of Kiangsu issued a proclamation embodying a charm of his own invention, to be posted over the doors of dwellings or to be worn as an amulet. He further recommended an anathema attributed to Tao-Tsze, the founder of Taoism, which was to be chanted while copying it on yellow paper with the blood of a cock mixed in vermilion, the paper being thereupon burnt and the ashes swallowed. There was scarcely a house door that was not protected by a charm, and scarcely an individual who did not wear an amulet on cap or sleeve.

THE population of the earth has long been a fascinating study for statisticians Behm and Wagner, who hav just published an emended edition of a former work in Germany. They giv the total as 1,433,887,500—which is about 22,000,000 less than their estimate of two years ago. They hav concluded that China has 50,000,000 less than they formerly supposed. There has thus been an actual increase of about 28,000,000 in the population of the globe—an increase, however, which must be spread over ten years, as many of the recent censuses are decennial. For Europe the present population is rated at 327,743,400, showing an increase of about 12,000,000 over the previous figures by the operation of the censuses. In Asia, making allowance for the readjustment of the population of China, there has been an increase of 20,000,000, the present population being set down at 795,591,000. Of course the estimates must sometimes be little better than guesses, for example, for such places as Africa. For this continent Dr. Rohlfs maintains that an estimate of 100,000,000 is quite enough, while Behm and Wagner retain the old figures of 200,000,000 with considerable hesitation.

A YOUNG student of Jena who had been reading Darwin's works found that they raised religious doubts in his mind. They could not fail to do that, provided their philosophy had gained control over him. Accordingly the young man wrote to the late Mr. Darwin, who replied as follows: "Sir, I am very busy, and am an old man in delicate health, and hav not time to answer your questions fully, even assuming that they are capable of being answered at all. Science and Christ hav nothing to do with each other, except in as far as the habit of scientific investigation makes a man cautious about accepting any proofs. As far as I am concerned, I do not believe that any revelation has ever been made. With regard to a future life, every man must draw bis own conclusions from vague and contradictory probabilities. Wishing you well, I remain your obedient servant, Charles Darwin, Down, June 5, 1879." This candid declaration of the philosopher contrasts strongly and favorably with the more or less disingenuous attempts of some of his disciples to reconcile what we know as Darwinism with religion. In acknowledging that he did not believe in revelation, and looked on immortality as doubtful, Mr. Darwin only accepted the logical consequences of his principles. Mr. Darwin and his disciples, with their theory of evolution and its inductiv method, allow no place for revelation. If their theory is true, the doctrin of divine revelation taught by theology is untrue. The only evidences offered of it, or which can be offered, are, in their view, not worth attention. The intellectual basis of religion is swept away; and Christian theology has no more foundation than the mythologies it replaced. This is the logical consequence of the teachings of Darwin, which are so widely accepted by science, and now so profoundly influence human thought. It is an inevitable conclusion, and makes the dominant scientific philosophy of this generation the most uncompromising antagonist theology ever had. "Science and Christ hav nothing to do with each other," wrote Mr. Darwin to the young student. But that was because the science taught by Mr. Darwin does not admit of the possibility of a divine incarnation; and there was no use in arguing about a consequence of its teachings which was obvious. And as to immortality, according to that science, it is something for poets to dream about, but of which man can know nothing. In the view of the Darwinian philosophy, an oyster, an ant, a dog, or an ape is as much and as little immortal as a man. "Every one," as Mr. Darwin said, "must draw his own conclusions from vague and contradictory probabilities." This is practically a denial of immortality, certainly such as Christian theology teaches. On one side is the church based on the supernatural. On the other is the scientific philosophy of Mr. Darwin, which knows nothing and admits nothing except the natural. They are, and they must ever be, irreconcilable antagonists.—Sun.

A Truth Seeker Around the World

PACIFIC COAST RECEPTIONS.

DEAR READERS: I must tell you of the kind reception which my friends of San Francisco tendered me on the evening of the 5th inst. at Platt's Hall. I have already sent you some account of the meeting, to be published long before these lines will see the light, and will necessarily have to make some repetitions. The platform was tastefully decorated with floral adornments, a wreath was woven around a lithograph of myself, and large cards bearing the names of Zoroaster, Buddha, Confucius, and Mohammed were on the front part of the stage, with this motto: "True teaching founded on reason we follow."

Mr. Fred Schuenemann-Pott, who has recently returned from an eastern lecturing tour, was requested to preside at the meeting, and would have done so had not, unfortunately, his own society been advertised to hold their annual meeting on the same evening for the election of officers and the transaction of other important business. I had, in the middle part of the day, a very pleasant interview with the distinguished Freethinker, and of course found him a very genial and intelligent gentleman. At that time he hoped he might be able to be present at the reception and to preside, but a little later in the day the following letter was received from him:

SAN FRANCISCO, June 5, 1882.

DEAR SIR: Having been honored by your kind invitation to preside at the Bennett reception to-night, I feel very sorry to state that I am unavoidably prevented from attending your meeting. Let me add, although it is hardly necessary, that on this occasion, as on every similar one, all my sympathies are fully engaged in the cause of universal mental liberty.

Yours for the sake of justice and truth,

FRED SCHUENEMANN-POTT.

From the inability of Mr. Schuenemann-Pott to be present, an invitation was extended to Mr. James Fell, of Victoria, B. C., to preside, which he accepted. He is a prominent wholesale merchant in the flourishing young town where he resides. He is an earnest patron of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and has made the journey to San Francisco at this time mainly for the purpose of meeting me and to invite me to visit his portion of the Pacific coast. I could not feel otherwise than honored by such friendship, and was much pleased to have him preside at my reception. As he is a large, fine looking gentleman, and a ready speaker, he presided with ability and grace.

After the band secured for the occasion had played two or three airs, Mr. Fell, being introduced by Byron Adonis, made the introductory speech, in which he described the advance which Freethought is making on our continent, with complimentary allusions to myself and what I have done in aid of general mental liberty. He felt there is much to encourage all to press forward in the work of emancipation of man from the tyranny of priestly superstition and bigotry under which the world has been struggling for centuries.

My kind friend, Byron Adonis, editor of the Jewish Times, made an earnest and thrilling speech, in which he denounced the oppression which has come from the power of the church, with the purpose of crushing the spirit of individual right for each person to examine and believe for themselves. He denounced ecclesiastical oppression and intolerance, and praised the great spirits of the world who have struggled to free their fellow-men from bondage of that kind. He dwelt at some length upon the wrongs that have been done me, calling attention to the fact that I had been incarcerated in a prison cell because I had presumed to raise my voice in defense of mental freedom, of the right to oppose popular errors, and to sustain free speech, a free press, and free mails. He ranked me among such martyrs as Socrates, Bruno, and others who laid down their lives in defense of the right to think, speak, and act.

He next read several letters from eastern friends who could not be present at this meeting, together with a poem of welcome by S. P. Putnam. As they too will meet your eyes long before this, it is not necessary to repeat them here.

Some resolutions which you have seen, or will see, in defense of the position I have occupied, and condemnatory of the wrongs that have been done me, were read and adopted.

After this I spoke for twenty or thirty minutes. I expressed my gratitude for the honor conferred upon me, and dilated somewhat upon what I had witnessed in foreign lands, particularly with reference to the worship of innumerable gods in the Asiatic countries, and the numerous god-factories conducted in those godly lands. I also bore evidence to the civility, kindly disposition, the good conduct, and general morality of the people of pagan lands.

The chairman called for three cheers for me, and they were heartily given. He spoke of my books of travel, and hoped they would have as wide a reading as the Bible.

Dr. J. L. York made the closing speech of half an hour's length. His style is earnest and eloquent. He holds his audience to strict attendance upon what he has to say. His remarks were substantially as follows:

Mr. President, Ladies, and Gentlemen: The occasion which calls us together to-night is to me a source of gladness which I am unable to express—not that I believe in hero-worship of any kind, but to render unto Cæsar that which is Cæsar's and unto Bennett that which is Bennett's, is, to my mind, simple justice to an able exponent of Freethought and one of the torch-bearers of the light transmitted from the Infidels of the past. And all the more is the significance of this occasion intensified by the memory of persecution and injustice which have been meted out to him at the hands of prejudice and Christian bigotry from which he has so recently escaped. And it does seem to me that if there is anything which deserves to be called a crime, ingratitude, indifference, and cold neglect at the hands of those we serve is a cruel crime against heaven and man. And how can I better pay tribute to our honored guest than to pass in brief review the history of Infidelity, and so far as I can in the brief space of time allotted to me do homage to some of the great Infidels whose lives have illuminated the darkness of the past and to whom we owe the political and religious freedom we enjoy to-day?

It is said that men and women are known by the company they keep. This is so; human sympathy taking root in similar views is the cohesive band which holds us together. I know there are some who are ashamed to be called Infidel, growing out of a want of knowledge as to what Infidelity is and the grand service it has rendered in the enfranchisement of our race, and it shall be my purpose to speak of its history, its principles, and some of its leaders whose lives have graced the age which produced them, and who yet live in the world of mind like the fragrance of a thousand flowers wafted down to us from the twilight and childhood of our race.

And I assure you, dear friends, that when you become fully acquainted with the principles, object, and service of Infidelity, you will find no cause for shame for the company you are in to-night or that larger number of great souls whose names are dear to us as Infidels of the past, whose heads have been lifted above the night and darkness of superstition. The word Infidel for centuries has been used as a word of opprobrium to stigmatize those who dare step aside from the usual or well-beaten paths of religious thought. From early boyhood I have been taught that Infidels were bad people, and not until late in life did I discover the fallacy of measuring human character by the standard of any religious belief. There are no religionists on earth who do not hold all to be Infidel who do not embrace the faith they hold, and do not see the truth as they see it, and worship the same God in the same way they worship him.

From the commencement of the Christian era every effort has been made by the church to force all people to hold the same religious opinion. The effort grew out of the belief that God wrote a book, and in that book the command that everybody should believe the same things, and failing to do so, should be damned; hence Infidelity or unbelief, which is simply a struggle for liberty and mental freedom, grew up in the world. As the church has always held that unbelief is a sin and crime, thus heresy and Infidelity are the result of religious evolution.

In every period of the world's history a few men have been brave enough to speak out and give their honest thought to the world; and for the destruction of these Infidels the church has always used all of the power she possessed; she has sown the seeds of discord everywhere in all lands, and the sacred ties of family and kinship have given away before the flood-tide of religious superstition; fire and sword have consumed innocent people whose only crime was that of honesty, and the cruel waves of war, like mountains, have flooded the world, and over all has floated the bloody banner of the triune God religion.

Religion, like everything else, is the subject of evolution. Change and progression is the law of the universe. The philosophy and science of five thousand years ago do not contain the sum total of knowledge to-day. No; the world moves, and men and women everywhere are feeling about them for the rudiments and roots of all of the dogmatism of the present day, and this effort to know the truth is called Infidelity.

The religions of the past have been the clothing of the childhood of our race, and adapted to the people who originated them; the stepping-stones to higher truth, the eyesight of an age when the eye was dim. The creeds of the world have been the crutches upon which the race has hobbled when it was lame with ignorance, feeling its way midst doubt and fear, in darkness and superstition.

So far as may be known, the religions of the world have grown from one stem, and by history we find that ancient India is the birthplace and mother of the religions, morals, literature, and language of the world, and our best oriental scholars inform us that this early religion inspired the Egyptian, Hebrew, Greek, and Roman civilization, and permeates the economy of the laws and usages of our present civilization. Cousin says that the history of this early Hindoo religion is the abridged history of the philosophy of the whole world. And thus did the wise men of India precede the wisdom of Moses and give her laws, customs, and religion to Egypt, Persia, Greece, and Rome.

Thus it happens that the story of Christna precedes the story of Christ and the story of the virgin mother in the Brahman religion is many centuries older than the story of the virgin mother of Bethlehem, and without a doubt the latter has borrowed from the earlier, and the Infidelity of our age consists in not believing that Jesus of Nazareth was the only crucified savior of men, and that the early story was copied from the later story.

If I could say that Brahmanism and Buddhism were copied from Christianity, and that the beautiful Vedas, the scriptures of the Hindoos, were copied from the Hebrew, and that all of the light and knowledge and moral life of the world had eminated from Christianity, I might be a Christian instead of an Infidel. To my mind Infidelity is an inspiration. All inspiration is an inbreathing from the infinite universe, and has not been confined to any country or people, and the Infidelity of the world is the result of inspiration quite as much as the religion of the world.

From the dust-covered centuries of the twilight ages; from the martyred souls of the far-off past in every condition of life, among all peoples inspired thoughts, like shocks from the battery of truth, have blessed the throbbing heart of humanity. From the dim distance of more than five thousand years comes the voices of the Hindoo law-giver, the prototype of Moses of the Jews, and of Buddha, the divine man and prototype of Jesus of Nazareth, giving forth an inspiration quite as divine as anything in the Old and New Testaments.

For more than twenty-five centuries, from Zoroaster, Prometheus, Pythagoras, and Confucius, has poured forth a stream of inspiration which, in point of wisdom and moral beauty, is at least equal to anything in the four gospels attributed to Jesus the Christ of God. For more than two thousand years, from Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Zeno, Lucretius, and down to Apollonius and Jesus, there has been a constant stream of knowledge, moral life, and goodness shed forth to enlighten the world, and there has been no age deprived of inspired men in morals, art, science, and religion. Infidelity is as old as man, for as long as men have worshiped gods, so long has there been people who did not believe in gods, and have been the Infidels of ancient times.

Old Diagoras, the Greek sage and thinker of twenty-three hundred years ago, was a decided Infidel. He said his gods were the atoms, and he would sooner worship no God and believe in none than to worship gods who tolerated wickedness or were powerless to prevent it. Religious people put a price upon his head, and he had to flee to save his life.

This was ancient Infidelity; so also is it the Infidelity of our day, for that is the doctrine of Tyndall and the leading scientists of our day. The atom and the law inherent in it stand between us and God, and, like Diagoras, we can't get behind the atom to see if there be a God or not. There may be a thousand gods, for aught we know, instead of three, and I am glad to join hands in spirit to-night with the Infidels of the past, such as Socrates, that grand old Deist, who held such an exalted belief when the world was polluted with false religions. We owe a debt of gratitude to those Infidels of ancient times who gave up their lives for the sake of truth; like Campanella, who was kept in prison twenty-seven years and put to the torture seven times; or like Vanini, who had his tongue torn out and was burnt at the stake, and Servetus and Bruno, two grand men, who perished at the hands of Christian deviltry. For the sake of science and truth, I am proud that I can claim a kinship in sentiment, spirit, and purpose with these old worthies of the past, like Voltaire, that brave and polished Infidel of the eighteenth century, who bearded kings on their thrones, and pointed the finger of scorn at all the living priests of Europe; whose intellect was as clear as the sun, and whose wit and satire were like a two-edged sword, and yet with goodness and benevolence as kind and tender as a woman. He it was who said the only gospel we should read is the grand book of nature, written with God's own hand and stamped with his own seal. Who can but feel a sense of pride to be counted in sympathy with the spirit and life-work of such noble men as D'Holbach, Kant, Jefferson, Franklin, Humboldt, Comte, Hugo, Buckle, Garrison, Lincoln, Draper, and a host of others whose lives have shed light and glory in the world? Who can but feel a sense of reverence and gratitude for such a life as that of Thomas Paine?—name ever dear to all true lovers of justice and liberty. Born in poverty he was, and yet how rich in true wealth! Born amid the surging breakers of despotism, he arose like a Samson in his might and carried away the gates of the enemies of liberty in both church and state. Who but the immortal Paine could have uttered these heaven-born words, "Where liberty is not, that is my country?" There is not in all the scriptures of the world words more sublime than these.

A few more years of infidelity to error; a few more years of Freethought; a few more Bennetts in prison for the sake of principle; a few more men like Ingersoll to carry the torch of mental freedom, handed down from the Infidels of the past, and superstition will flee away like fog before the morning sun. Infidelity has been the savior of the world; doubt and unbelief have opened the door for science, which has scattered its blessings in the pathway of our race, and is to-day the hope of the world. Infidelity is not unfaithfulness to duty. Let no man pride himself on being Infidel unless he be a seeker and lover of truth. Free thinking is not loose thinking; true religion is simply goodness, and Infidelity, the crown of a well-rounded manhood, is freedom to think and liberty to utter our best thought for truth and humanity.

After the meeting was over a great number of friends pressed forward to take me by the hand and express their friendly regard. This was kept up for nearly half an hour, after which I retired to my hotel, grateful for the honors that had been done me.

GOLDEN GATE PARK.

Tuesday, June 6th.—Mr. George Hanson to-day took me in his carriage to Golden Gate Park, some three or four miles northwest of the city. Here over a thousand acres of sandy waste have been reclaimed and converted into a splendid park, with serpentine drives and avenues and plats of trees, shrubbery, and flowers. It is hardly equal to our Central Park in New York, but the metamorphosis which has taken place from the desert sands to the present luxurious growth of vegetation is indeed wonderful. Nearly a quarter of a million of dollars has been expended upon the grounds and the glass conservatory or Palm House, recently constructed near the center of the beautiful park.

The scrub oaks which originally covered some of the knobs, by a system of trimming and cultivation, have greatly improved and become very respectable trees; and by their side foreign strangers, which have been introduced and acclimated, now spread their umbrageous boughs, embellishing the grounds in a beautiful manner. Walks and drives have been made, arbors trained, grottoes built, mounds constructed, and summer-houses placed in sequestered nooks. Here art has greatly surpassed nature, and converted into an Elysium what was once a lonely waste, the smooth sward and well-kept flower-beds lying in the close proximity to the high grass and tall, yellow-blossomed lupims, now in full bloom. The circuitous and winding drives in the park amount to over ten miles, and the walks nearly five miles. Several lakelets beautify the landscape.

The conservatory or palm house is two hundred and fifty feet in length, oriental in style, graceful in outline, and highly ornamental. The main entrance or reception room is twenty feet square, with a showy fountain in the center. It opens into the rotunda or palm house, a circular room fifty-six feet in diameter, and about the same number of feet in hight. An octagonal space in the center is filled with palms, cycas, ferns, pandanus, and many other varieties of rare tropical plants. A group-fountain of neat design ("Out of the Rain") is in constant play, and furnishes the necessary amount of moisture for the growing plants. On the right of the rotunda is the orchid house, an arched room thirty-five by fifty feet. It is well filled with fine specimens of this variety of plants. An arched room on the extreme right is occupied for the cultivation of rare equatorial plants. A circular pond, twenty-eight feet in diameter, is furnished with the necessary heating apparatus. Some fine specimens of the victoria regia, with circular leaves over seven feet in diameter, are flourishing here. The queen lily is the object of general attraction. Here are also fine specimens of nelumbiums and other rare plants.

Some departments of the building are set apart for flowering and ornamental foliage plants, while other portions are used for hard-wooded plants, such as japonicas, azaleas, etc. In the rear are two propagating pits, fifty feet long and twelve feet wide, and a growing-house, seventy-five feet long and twenty-five feet wide; also a potting-room, thirty by thirty. A heating apparatus beneath the potting room supplies the requisite warmth to all the chambers. The conservatories cover an area of fifteen thousand feet. Thirty-five tons of glass cover them, and tons of putty were used in their construction. The conservatories were purchased from the Liberal, James Lick, who imported them from France, and were erected after the design of the royal conservatories at the Kew Gardens, near London. Mr. Lick made a very generous donation in connection with these conservatories, for which the citizens of San Francisco hold him in grateful remembrance.

THE CLIFF HOUSE.

Some three miles over a very pleasant smooth road brought us to the Cliff House, a romantic place of resort on the coast, not far from the Golden Gate, and some seven miles from the city. The hotel stands upon a rocky bluff one hundred feet or two hundred feet above the water, and thousands flock here to have a good view of the ocean, as well as the hundreds of sea lions, a large variety of seals, constantly sporting in the water below and climbing on the rocks to sun themselves, not far from the shore. Here I met Doctor and Mrs. J. L. York and daughter by appointment, and we passed an hour or more very pleasantly taking in the grand scenery which abounds here. It is a curiosity to watch the sportive, intelligent-looking sea-lions climbing the steep rocks, and then diving off from ten to twenty feet into the deep water. There are said to be five hundred of them in this locality, and some of them very large, ten to twelve feet in length, and estimated to weigh over a thousand pounds. They are natives of the northwestern coast, and occasionally reach enormous size—sixteen feet in length, and affording forty gallons of oil. Their food is exclusively live fish, which abound in the waters they frequent. These animals do not a little barking, so that when two or three dozen of them are exercising their lungs at the same time, it is said the din rises so high as to be distinctly heard above the ceaseless roar and dash of the Pacific as it beats against the rock-bound shore.

CHINESE QUARTERS.

In the evening it was proposed to visit the Chinese quarter of the city. Every stranger who visits the Golden Gate city is expected, at least during one evening, to pay his attention to the Chinese quarter, where he can obtain about as good a view of China as in Hong Kong or Canton. Some half a dozen of us made up the party, and that no mistake might befall us we secured the services of a policeman well acquainted in that particular portion of the city. We made pretty thorough work of the matter, and visited the boarding-houses, opiums dens, gymnastic rooms, theaters, places of worship, and restaurants, which occupied our time until past midnight.

A noticeable feature of Chinese life is the compactness with which they live. An ordinary three-story house seems to be enough to contain a colony of them. Even the basement and sub-cellar are divided into small compartments—six by eight feet wide—and in these small places, away from the light and with but little air, two or three celestial Mongolians seem to flourish and find happiness. In such boarding-houses as these, actors, tradesmen, and laborers of various kinds manage to get along as pleasantly as an American family would in three ordinary rooms. It is a wonder how in these underground rooms they can obtain fresh air enough to sustain vitality and health. We were in several places of this kind where the inmates were in, perhaps whiling away the time by performing upon native or American musical instruments, or playing cards, or other games. It is noticeable how peaceful and quiet they are thus packed together; how as a matter-of-course they seem to take the life they live, and how little disturbed they are by our intrusion. When they look up and see the policeman who is our guide and protector, they seem entirely acquiescent and pleasant, not showing a frown or displeased look, though we even intruded into their private apartments, and into their very "holy of holies."

A narrow hallway, not more than four feet wide, often runs through the basement of a house nearly a hundred feet in length, a glimmering lamp at each end; and through these narrow, dark passages scores of Chinamen pass many times a day, and their rooms on either side seem little more than berths on a steamer. In one small apartment, seven by nine, the cooking for the establishment is being performed by one or two of the celestials, with as much apparent contentment as cooks of other nationalities would display in the most spacious quarters. These people seem to possess the ability to make themselves comfortable under circumstances that would be deemed very adverse by an average Anglo-Saxon-American.

Some few are reading as they recline upon their beds or cots, some are engaged at various kinds of mechanical work, but the majority are playing on musical instruments, or at some game of amusement. The Chinese are very found of gambling, and the hard earnings of days and weeks are often lost at games of chance. They have sort of club-rooms where gaming is carried on on a large scale, and considerable money lost and won. The police usually "go for" these places, and it is amusing to see how sharp the celestials are in ascertaining when a policeman is in the vicinity, and how soon by signs, words, or grunts the intelligence that a "cop" is about is communicated to the entire inmates of a house and locality, when in an instant all objectionable indications are removed, and nothing is to be seen but what is approved.

"For ways that are dark, and for tricks that are vain,
The heathen Chinee is peculiar."

We visited a number of

or establishments where the fumes of the smoking drug seem sufficient to prevent a good breath being obtained. These places are indicated by large red cards bearing Chinese characters, which, being interpreted, mean, "Pipes and lamps always convenient." The smoking-rooms vary in size, are dingy in appearance, and are well supplied with lounges, or wide shelves, where the dissipating Mongolians happily recline while they inhale the entrancing smoke, which makes the pleasant, dreamy state come over them, and causes the memory of trouble and unhappiness to vanish for the time being, as a whisky-guzzler's fiery fluid "drives dull care away." I saw many indulging in the pernicious habit, but none that seemed so far gone as to be entirely oblivious to the things of earth, though it is quite probable that they sometimes reach that state. The police often raid these smoking dens, and the wary Mongolians are constantly on the alert to see when danger is near. The greatest dread and trouble of their lives are the police, who seem very fond of dropping down upon the usually quiet orientals and interfering with their manners and customs. There is a chronic antipathy between the two races, which will probably never become wholly obliterated. The Irish police are extremely fond of arresting Chinamen and exercising power over them, while the celestials regard the police as mortal enemies.

One of the worst features connected with opium smoking is the spread of the evil practice among Americans. There are said to be considerable numbers of men, women, and boys who regularly visit these smoking dens and smoke there or take the opium home with them. A few months devoted to the practice invariably tells upon the health of the smoker, making him look wan and cadaverous.

CROWDED STREETS.

Most of the streets in the Chinese quarter are compactly filled with human beings, and present a close resemblance to the narrow streets of Canton. There are stands where Chinese food and dishes are offered for sale, while food is often carried around with other commodities on large trays and baskets, by means of shoulder-sticks, giving the beholder the impression that he is almost in China proper, for all seems a dense hive of Chinese life and customs.

The signs are usually large Chinese characters in flaming vermilion, often pendant, hanging from the door-cap, or upper portion of the building, or running up and down by the side of the entrance. Many of the signs are Chinese names in English letters, and such cognomens as Hop Wo, Wo Ki, Hop Yik, Hop Lee, Tin Yuk, Yan Kee, Shun Wo, Hang Hi, Chung Sun, Yan Ko, Chung Kwong, Shan Tong, and Wing On Tsiang, are common enough. I am informed that these familiar signs are not always the real names of the occupants—not the appellations of the dignified, long-tailed individuals who sell you silks, Chinese wares, or bear you a smoking cup of fragrant tea; nor do these signs always indicate the special business conducted in the establishment to which they are attached. Those who read the signs and are able to translate them say they are often poetical sentences or some favorite motto or maxim. Thus, when the cigar-maker hangs out the sign, "Shun Wo," it does not certainly mean that Mr. Shun Wo is conducting the establishment, and that he is impelled by conscientious motives to announce to the world the name of the individual transacting the business affairs of this cigar emporium, but perhaps he is simply making an abstract statement or conveying to the world the information that in that very place is the seat of "faith and charity." In the same way Hong Ki, the laundryman, puts up a sign which means "the sign of prosperity," perhaps wishing to impart the idea that where prosperity abounds the linen must necessarily be well washed and ironed. Wung Wo Shang means "everlasting harmony producing wealth." Kwong on Chiang is "extensive peace and affluence." Hip Wo is "mutual help and concord." Tung Cheung is "unitedly prospering." Tin Yuk has the beautiful meaning of "heavenly jewel." Tak Tseung are very good words, for they mean "virtue and felicity," while Yan On Cheung means "benevolence, peace, and affluence." Almost everybody should be in favor of Yan On Cheung. Wa Tun means "the flowery fountain." Chung Sun stands for "sincerity and faith," and at the same time Man Li stands for "ten thousand profits." But all the signs are not of this character, though the most poetical phrases are sometimes placed over the meanest shops. Perhaps the hanging, vertical sign by the side of a grocery reads thus: "Dried fruit, sugar, oil, rice. All sorts of goods from north and south to furnish customers." Thus it will be seen that Chinamen are not materially unlike other people, and that they know how to use beautiful phrases and sentiments equal to the most pious Christian.

Each store has its particular sign, and a motto is usually adopted, which becomes a sort of trade mark, and the object often is a sort of superstitious notion that particular mottoes will bring good luck and a profitable trade to the establishment. These inscriptions in Chinese characters, when interpreted, mean "peace and felicity," "perennial spring," which, in its fullest meaning, is, "may health flow in as an unfailing spring." "Virtue and peace" may be read "wealth gotten virtuously will be enjoyed peacefully." Again are "virtue and harmony," "everlasting plenteousness," "all things complete," "glorious abundance," "eternal affluence," "the spring of increase," "superabundant harmony," "the sign of the bird," "peace and contentment," "abundant happiness," etc. It certainly speaks well for a people to delight in signs and sentences of this kind. When kindness, harmony, contentment, and integrity bubble up around the daily life of a people, and they pursue an honest course, it is not a bad people; and who shall say they are not as heavenly-minded and well disposed as those who bear the Christian name and believe in one god's dying to please another?

I saw several apothecary shops, where the curatives are kept for sale in the form of roots and herbs, barks and seeds, and sometimes the cured parts of certain animals. The signs of these establishments are rather expressive; thus, interpreted, we have, "the hall of the approved medicines and of every land," "fresh and perfect medicines decocted," "the hall of two peaks," (this was also the appellation of a noted ancient physician), "great life hall," "promise life palace" (meaning, take our medicines and live many years), "benevolence and longevity hall," "hall of harmony and the apricot forests," "hall of everlasting spring," "hall for multiplying years," "hall of all peace," "vast age hall," "hall of joyful relief," "hall for promoting harmony," etc. Our patent medicine men and cure-all doctors cannot do much better than that.

Clothing stores have inscriptions which are read as follows: "New clothes, shoes, stockings, and hats." "New goods for family use." The name selected for the shop may be "Union and harmony," "Elegant and ornamental," "Union and peace," "Rich and luminous," etc.

Restaurants are numerous, and several of them were visited by our party, and at one occupying three floors in a good sized house, and richly decorated with an abundance of gold and vermilion, carved work, etc., from China, the whole outfit having a most rich appearance, we called for a cup of their best tea. After waiting a few minutes some small china tea-pots, one for each person, were brought forward, and beautiful gilt china cups, and the tea we all pronounced the best we had ever drank. It had a most delicate and rich flavor, far beyond what ordinary tea possesses. Several kinds of cakes and confections of Chinese style and manufacture were also furnished, all of which we partook of with unfeigned pleasure. The price was but twenty-five cents each, and it would be difficult to get up a more agreeable repast, or to be served in more genteel style. I made inquiry as to the price of the tea furnished us, and learned it is worth four dollars per pound. This, however, is not the dearest article; the rarest and most expensive tea is sold at twenty dollars per pound, but is tea that would throw almost any devoted tea-drinker into absolute ecstasy.

The signs of the restaurants are said to have this meaning: "Manchau and Chinese, animal and vegetable food by the meal, with wine, diversions, and entertainment;" "The place for comforting the inner man." Each restaurant has its particular style or title, thus: "The almond flower chamber;" "The chamber of the odors of distant lands;" "Fragrant tea chamber;" "Garden of the golden valley;" "All fragrance saloon;" "Balcony of joy and delight," etc.

Butcher's signs read in this way: "We receive the golden hogs—that is, we take whole hogs to roast;" "We see them roasted whole for sacrifice in golden skins." As greasy and common-place as their business may be, they also hav an eye and ear for the beautiful, and the term "golden" has the same charm for them as for the great bulk of their people. They apply these choice sentiments to their shops: "grand concord;" "virtue and harmony;" "brotherly union;" "constant faith;" "everything complete;" "virtue abounding." It is hardly to be expected that butchers would naturally delight in such poetical sentiments.

On the pawnbrokers' shops are such sentiments as these: "Great and glorious pawnbrokers;" "Mutual benefit pawnbrokers;" "Honest profits only desired;" "Let-each-have-his-due pawnbrokers;" "Live and let live;" "Peaceful affluence pawnbrokers."

Workers in gold announce their business in this way: "Gold and silver ornaments;" "Convenient exchange," that is, deposit your gold and silver to be made up as ordered. Like the tailors, they have selected characters for their signs, and generally express a beautiful sentiment, and which also give some indication of the business, like "Flowers and delight" (they engrave flowers on the ornaments they manufacture); "Oriental gold;" "Precious jewels;" "Flower pearls;" "Gold and precious stones," etc.

The slipper manufacturers are not behind others; their vertical signs not only announce their business, but they vie with their neighbors in the employment of characteristic sentiments which awaken poetic thought in the minds of Chinese scholars, and often serve to call up the memory of admired Chinese classics. The same is true of tinners, florists, intelligence offices, etc. They all abound in poetic sentiments similar to the foregoing. In some shops paper shrines and emblems for the gods are manufactured, and there the various paraphernalia of worship are gotten up in the most approved style. We visited two joss-houses, or places of worship, where, besides the images representing their gods, were altars, shrines, incense-burning, with long, slim bamboo sticks for burning a holy smoke very pleasureable to the gods. I bought a package of them, and perhaps when I am particularly anxious to appease or mollify the gods, and dispose them kindly toward me I may light one of these bamboo splints and produce a marvelous effect. A number of priests are always in attendance at the joss houses, and are ready to take in what they can by the sale of various prayers and oblations on bright-red paper, with amulets and charms of various kinds. The priests of all religions are similar in character; they are alike fond of money, filthy lucre, the root of all evil. For this they will make all sorts of promises of welfare and happiness, present and future.

On various other shops peculiar and characteristic signs are employed. Thus the cigar makers have "Harmony and profit;" "Abounding happiness;" "Fountain of righteousness;" "Excellent thoughts;" "Fountain of the most excellent;" "Constant increase of wealth." Lottery establishments have "Lucky and happy;" "Follow profit and overtake it;" "Winning hall," etc.

The Fan Ton, or gambling saloons, have also their insignia and street advertisements, as, "Get rich;" "Please come in;" "This evening the skin is spread;" "Straight enter the winning doors;" "Great perfection;" "Winning happiness;" "Twin delights;" "Lucky and happy;" "The fortune path;" "The stony brook;" "Overflowing abundance;" "Happy thoughts;" "Justice and harmony;" "Ever-flowing riches;" "Heavenly felicity;" "As you wish it;" "Forest path," etc. The barbers have also similar mottoes, and the emblem of their trade is a wash-stand and basin placed outside the door.

Chinese doctors are by no means scarce, more than with other nationalities. One hangs out a board on which is painted, "Yeary Tsze Ying feels the pulse and writes prescriptions for internal and external diseases;" "Doctor Ma Yu Yuk feels the pulse and heals thoroughly the most difficult and unheard of diseases;" "Dr. Tseang Ling cures wounds caused by falling or by being struck, also broken bones." Another advertises to cure small-pox; another proclaims that he attends to the diseases of children; others again, as with us, advertise themselves as successful treaters of diseases brought about by vice and immorality. Clairvoyant physicians are not wanting. They are men, and profess to be mediums, and to cure nearly all the ills flesh is heir to.

Fortune-tellers also abound. Mr. Yee Tin (or rainfield) proclaims himself the scion of the family of the renowned Shin Hong Chit, and a divine reckoner by the "eight diagrams" of man's destiny. There are others who have distinguished ancestors, and are able to hold intercourse with the departed dead, and convey messages from them. They also tell fortunes by looking at the palm of the hand and reading therein the lines of destiny.

Within the stores and shops of all kinds are to be seen scrolls hanging on the walls, with sentences written upon red paper and pasted upon them, over the doors, over the shelves and money-chests and receptacles. On the scrolls are quotations from the classics of a moral character. The red papers are a sort of prayer to the gods. Some of them are said to read in this manner: "New Year, great good fortune. In all things may our desires be met. Let the four seasons abound in prosperity. Merchandise revolving like wheels." "Goods flowing out and coming in." "Let the east and west assist our plans." "Wealth arising like a bubbling spring." "Profits come in like rushing waters; customers coming like clouds," etc.

It is not customary for wholesale dealers in opium to put up a special sign for the wholesale branch of their business, but the red cards of the retail dealers which are posted on the glass windows and the doors of their stalls are of large number. These cards read in this wise: "Opium dipped up in fractional quantities," "Foreign smoke in broken parcels," "No. 2 opium on sale at all times." This No. 2 opium is what is scraped from the pipes after use, and prepared again; it is sold to those who cannot afford to buy the first-class article.

In various shops are inscriptions in Chinese characters, which when put into English read in this way: "Goods honest, the price true;" "Neither young nor old will deceive;" "Once seeing and once speaking fixes it;" "Not two prices." Customers, however, are advised that the market price of goods may change, even in the course of a single day, by such notices as this: "The price in the morning may not be the price in the evening."

On scales for weighing, such mottoes as these are often seen: "Scales be busy and prosperous;" "Daily weigh your thousands of gold." On the safe is inscribed: "Heap up gold," "Amass precious stones." Over or at the side of the entrance are inscribed: "Ten thousand customers constantly arriving," "Let rich customers continually come."

In the sitting room such mottoes as these are posted in conspicious places: "Sit with honorable men;" "Point to the day of returning" (meaning the day when they will be able to return to their native land); "All things as you desire" (may your wishes be gratified); "What the heart desires may the hand perform." Over the doors of dwellings are placed such mottoes as this: "Let the Five Blessings come to this house." On the inner side may be seen: "May good fortune fill this house;" "Man and things are flourishing;" "Old and young in health and peace." At the stairway is, "Ascending and decending in safety and peace." On the red cards pasted on the walls of school-houses are sentiments like the following: "Become famous in poetry and books;" "Thorough study, final success."

These mottoes and maxims seem quite as proper as our painted beer mugs overflowing with the foaming liquid, a pair of billiard cues painted on the window, a big wooden Indian offering a wooden cigar to a wooden smoker—no, I should say one of flesh and blood, and, who ought to have more sense than to indulge in such filthy practices—or a gourmand with a rib of roast beef smoking before him. In point of morality and poetic beauty the Chinese seem in this direction fully our equals.

It is said that when Chinamen meet on business they do not immediately plunge into conversation wholly referring to merchandise, profits, exchange, rise and fall in prices, the briskness or dullness of trade, the liability of neighbours to fail; but rather the first thing to be attended to is to take together a choice cup of fragrant tea, for a pot of the herb is constantly kept warm in every respectable Chinese store, and among those who smoke time is taken for pipes; and mutual compliments are passed, when the mottoes on the walls are read and commented upon, and also the lessons they teach. It has been said by those well acquainted with the customs and character of the Chinese that in such respects they are in advance of the mass of people in Europe and America. The frequent reading and hearing the moral maxims so freely dispensed in places of business and in dwellings have a good effect, and they also tend to cheer and strengthen them in making the struggle of life. Their respect for morality, and their observance of moral maxims, is not surpassed by the people of any Christian country.

There are a few theaters in the Chinese quarter, which were not in operation on the occasion of our visit, though we called and looked through them. One we visited, however, was in full blast, though the last night of the season. We, of course, did not see the entire play, and this cannot be thought strange of when it is remembered that Chinese plays are pretty lengthy, sometimes requiring three weeks to complete them. It was, however, strictly oriental in character, and was played by exclusively Chinese actors, and the spoken words and singing were altogether in the Chinese language. Their theaters do not abound in scenery to the extent ours do, but they have some transformation and some pendant scrolls, on which are quotations from the classics of Confucius and Mencius. The orchestra is immensely inferior to ours, and in music generally the Chinese, like all Asiatic nations, cannot compare with the music of Europeans and Americans. The orchestra is usually placed at the back of the stage, and from it issue the most unmusical and discordant sounds that can be imagined.

On either side of the recess are doorways, whence enter and exit the actors who take part in the performance. On the stage stand the immense chests which contain the wardrobes of the actors, and by the side of them the largest Saratoga trunks sink into insignificance. Here and there are tables, over which the actors recline between their parts. They use no curtain, as in our theaters. The shifting of the scenes, when done at all, is in full sight of the audience; and when in the play a man is killed, he drops upon the stage, lies dead as long as is thought necessary, when a resurrection takes place by his leisurely picking himself up and walking away. I could hardly make out the nature of the play we stopped a while to witness, as it seemed a jumble of unintelligible jargon; but the actors seemed to enjoy it, and the celestials, standing closely packed, seemed to appreciate it. Acrobatic and gymnastic feats are plentifully interspersed in the dialogue of the play. The costumes are gorgeous and grotesquely beautiful.

We visited also a gymnasium, where some half dozen of young Chinamen were practicing a great variety of difficult feats with ropes, hoops, spears, swords, knives, etc., very difficult to describe. They displayed great agility, and their feats of strength seemed remarkable. Their evolutions are very rapid and precise, and one is struck with surprise at the great variety of feats so rapidly performed. As acrobats and athletes they compare favorably with other nationalities.

The entire twenty-five or thirty thousand Chinese who reside in San Francisco do not conduct business in the Chinese quarter. Laundrymen, shoemakers, pedlers, etc., are found elsewhere among the Anglo-Saxon and Celtic races. Of laundries alone there are three hundred scattered over the city. Of cigar-makers, between three and four thousand Chinese are employed. Of pedlers, five hundred. They carry on some thirty clothing manufacturing establishments, ten or fifteen slipper manufactories, while many hundreds are engaged in the manufacture of shoes and gaiters. It is said nine-tenths of the shoes worn in the city and state are made by Chinese workmen. A large proportion of women's and children's underwear is made by the Chinese. Shirts of every description are made by them.

Of Chinese lodging-houses there are some fifty, where the inmates herd and pack together in a manner prejudicial to health and comfort. Most of the domestics employed in the families of Americans sleep in these lodging-houses in the Chinese quarter. The rooms contain from six to twenty, according to size, and even forty are said to sleep in a single room. How they live under such circumstances and preserve any health at all is a marvel. Closed at all points, the atmosphere, upon entering one of these places in the morning, must be terrible beyond description. Over five thousand Chinese are employed as domestics in the city, and the other towns of California are said to have a proportionate number.

It is sad to state that the Chinese are about as bad as the Europeans and Americans in the evil of prostitution. There are said to be not less than one hundred and fifty of them, generally small houses, in the Chinese quarter. The inmates of these degraded houses are brought from China for the express purpose of serving several years as prostitutes, and they are nothing more than slaves. If they wish to reform and lead better lives there is no chance for them to do so. Their masters or mistresses—for both sexes keep these vile places—are inexorable, and hold their hapless victims to the occupation which they are kept to perform, and there is no hope for them but to sink lower and lower in degradation till they are kicked out in the gutter to die, when they are no longer able to earn money for their soulless masters. There are two classes of these disreputable houses, one patronized by Americans and Europeans, and the other by the Chinese. The latter will not patronize houses visited by Americans, considering them heathens, and they utterly despise their own women who will let themselves descend so low as to be on a level with Christian barbarians. It is a mournful truth that there are large numbers of Americans and men from Europe who think no better of themselves than to patronize these Chinese houses of prostitution. In fact, their very existence shows they are patronized. Were there no demand for a thing of that kind they would cease to exist. Were it not for the ungoverned passions of the male sex there would be no prostitutes of any nationality.

These Chinese prostitutes do not abandon themselves wholly to a life of shame, as do those of Europe and America. Through the day they work at various kinds of employment, such as making shirts, slippers, men's and women's underwear, etc., and at the close of the day they are compelled to resort to their abandoned homes and subject themselves to that which, under many circumstances, must be most repulsive. This cheapening of labor at the honest and respectable modes of employment must act very injuriously upon well-disposed American girls who wish to work for a livelihood.

There is no question that the influx of Chinese into California has worked and is working a great evil to the people of the state. For heavy farmers, fruit growers, and manufacturers who wish cheap labor, they are unquestionably a desirable acquisition. They are, as a rule, ingenious, patient, and faithful, and can perform nearly every kind of work they are set about; but to the working class of Americans, who depend upon their labor for their livelihood, they are an unmitigated curse. They cheapen the wages to a point at which American laborers cannot live, and they so degrade it that a proud-spirited American almost despises to be known as a laborer. A Chinaman, in consequence of his cheap diet, the frugal habits of his country, and his limited needs, can live and lay up money on one-fourth the sum it requires to support an American laborer, and when a single state has over a hundred thousand of these Mongolians employed it necessarily throws out of employment an equal number of American young men and women, who have either to leave the state, work at starvation wages, resort to crime, or simply starve. It is hardly possible for a state to prosper where its working population are not employed, or are not receiving pay enough to afford them a decent living.

There is no doubt that a considerable portion of these people from China are guilty, more or less, of loose morals. They are addicted to lying and stealing, and fall into the various temptations incident to other nationalities. Human nature is much the same with the inhabitants of all lands. Dishonesty and a desire to possess themselves of money not legitimately earned is perhaps no more singular with Asiatics than with the people of the Western hemisphere. It is the report of the policemen of the city that a large proportion of the Chinamen are thieves, and that they will resort to all manner of artifices and tricks to obtain money; and they are sharp and apt enough to learn from Americans all the dark and devious ways employed to get something for nothing. They are credited with being very shrewd in avoiding detection as well as in evading the meshes of the laws when caught. They have very little respect for our laws, and very little for the oath administered in our courts of justice. The Christian Bible is no more sacred to them than a last year's almanac, and an oath upon it possesses no sacredness to them. They have far more sense of sacredness for an oath on the intestines of a rooster than for all the Jewish and Christian Bibles ever printed.

They do not and never will assimilate with the American people. They never will become Americans. They never will become attached to our institutions and laws. They come here, as a few years of exile from their homes, to make all the money they can to take with them upon their return. Their study is to get all the money they can while here, and to spend as little of it as possible among us. Indeed, their presence here, so far as trade and patronage are concerned, amounts to very little. They buy very few American manufactures. Their clothes and shoes and clothes are largely brought from China, and even much of their food comes from the mother country. They are, indeed, very poor customers for anything produced in America. They are very willing to leave the result of their muscles here, but they wish to take with them when they go every possible dollar.

It will, of course, be remembered that it is mainly the lowest or coolie class of Chinese that come to this country. They are the class easily bought up in the parent country and brought here to work on a contract for a certain number of years. It is incorrect to judge the entire Chinese nation by the low classes of criminals and dishonest people brought here. There is probably as much integrity among the Chinese as any nation, but the class usually brought to this country are the low, the vicious, and abandoned. If they do not make perfect models of excellence, it should not excite wonder. Unfortunately there are many thousands born upon our soil no better than they. The natives of this country are not nearly so upright as they should be. We have but few stones to throw at the children of the celestial kingdom. They can easily see that the "grab game" is the one largely played here, and their ability to follow and imitate stands them in good stead.

Not a little pains have been taken to Christianize the Chinamen brought to our shores, but the success thus far met with is of a meager character. They attend Sunday-schools for the sake of learning English, and though they may seem to take interest in the religion of the country they really do not. They are astute enough to perceive that the Christian religion has nothing superior to the teachings of Buddha, Laotse, and Confucius, and they can find no reason for embracing it. If they do, for the advantages thought to be derived from professing the Christian religion, seems to embrace it, it is usually only a pretense to further ulterior designs; and when they return to their own country they never profess Christianity longer, leaving it with the land where they sojourned.

With the enactment of the Chinese bill in Congress this continued large influx of Chinese population it is supposed must soon cease, though how the same is to be wholly cut off seems not quite clear; for they can be landed in British Columbia to work on the projected railroads, or for other purposes, and from there can make their way down through Washington Territory and Oregon into California and as many other states as desired. They are sharp enough to avail themselves of all sorts of shifts, and it will be but little for them to travel across land five hundred or a thousand miles to reach any desired portion of our country. That they will still continue to come, though in decreased numbers, seems not improbable. Those already here are not opposed to the embargo being placed upon the influx of others, for thereby better opportunities for labor and business are afforded them. They are not so obtuse as to be unable to perceive that if unlimited millions of the people of China continue to be poured into this country they themselves will be inevitably injured by the immense competition produced. There are many difficulties and evils connected with this emptying of China into our country which will probably never be entirely removed.

Mrs. E. Heddon's "Universal Spirit."

"A universal spirit existing as a part of nature is as rational to conceive of as to conceive of force."—MRS. C. HEDDEN in TRUTH SEEKER, Sept. 14th.

It is a pleasure to meet an intellectual woman of original thought. Such is evidently your interesting critical correspondent. She is earnest in her conclusions, firm in her belief, and evidently rejoices that she has outlived the superstitions of the past. She scornfully discards a creator or creation; yet, alas! like thousands of others of our best thinkers, the great fundamental error and principle idea underlying all religions she disdains to repudiate. An eternal God, to her, is an absurdity; but "an eternal spirit is no more of a problem than the existence of external force." Yet both ideas are identical, both are the product of fiction, both equally impossible as a fact in nature.

Has our good friend ever considered that the present status of her belief is but the fruit or surviving relic—somewhat rationalized through the evolution of scientific thought—of the crudest form of a personal god-worship, and that if in former years she had not been subjected to the hereditary influences of such a belief, but, instead, to rational thought and a scientific education, this present aspect of her Theistic belief would appear as absurd to her now as the old orthodox view of God she has discarded?

The trouble with our progressiv brethren and sisters of the Swing, Savage, and Beecher school is that they will involuntary, and in spite of their awakened reason, persist in some methods of "logic" as the churches they hav left behind, and ever soar far off into the realms of—nothing, and there seek supernatural agencies to solve the natural.

What difference to us, in our researches, whether the universe, force, and all the manifold phenomena of nature are a mystery or not? We know they exist, are real, and that all particles and elements act according to their several inherent potencies. But of a god or a universal spirit we know absolutely nothing. Therefore, if we desire to penetrate the causes and methods of their existence and operations, we must strictly confine ourselvs to the means within our reach, to the knowable, the actual, remain within the realms of nature, and in it and from thence find all requisit solutions for existing mysteries.

But seeing harmony and order in nature and favorable conditions and environments to man's existence, and being partially ignorant as to the causes producing them, it does not justify us, or explain the mystery, to assume the existence of a far greater mystery, which, if real, would infinitly more resemble the handy-work or design of a creator, and, then, consequently, more imperativly than man necessitate another creator to this creator, and this one another ad infinitum.

A god and Mrs. Hedden's universal spirit, as well as all other Theistic or Spiritistic ideas, are all alike, unthinkable, unknowable, superfluous, impossible, and, consequently—nothing. There is no intelligence without a brain, no light without eyes, and no sound without ears. Eternal darkness reigns supreme throughout the realms of space, until that necessary agent to produce light—the eyes—is first forthcoming! Exterminate all animal organism from the face of the earth, and where would a single germ of consciousness remain, or a single thought be manifest? Return to the nebular or carboniferous periods of our earth, and will our friends please and produce one solitary ray of intelligence transmitted to us from the clouds and mists, rocks and trees, or forces and potencies existing then? Or one thought, idea, or truth from those preadamite ages before animal life was possible on earth? Surely it will not be argued by our progressiv friends that intelligence was necessary to evolve our world from nebulæ into its present favorable condition to life? that intelligence is necessary to shape the rock, tree, crystal, flower? that it needs the special consent or act of a god or spirit to cause fire to burn, corn to grow, certain drugs to cure, others to kill, etc.? But similar as all other effects are produced, so man is formed. Precisely as these, so man is but a purely physical cause. Topsy's answer, "I growed," is about as philosophical and correct a solution as any.

From an article in the New York Times I quote the following: "The minutest forms of organic life yet discovered, the primary monads, are minute transparent spherules, about one four-thousandths of a millimeter in diameter, with dancing movements, the simplest form under which living matter exists." Now, it seems to me, whether science can reveal the modus operandi or not, if inorganic matter and its wondrous and numerous potencies, acting spontaneous of its own inherent attributes, and without the aid of intelligence from within and without, can and does produce all the above effects and infinitly more, and does thus transform the inorganic into living, sentient, crudely intelligent creatures, then this same potent matter can do all else in the universe.

And all other and higher class of beings are but a higher degree of development in the grand chain of evolution which pervades all nature.

Intelligence is an attribute of a living body. Before birth of the organism, mind in the individual is unknown. As a living body can only be limited, finite, local, so mind can only possess like attributes, and never be infinit or universal. We can conceive practically, and logically predicate infinitude of space and matter. We can infer the existence of an infinit number of animals and men (each a special minor intelligence) existing upon an infinit number of planets throughout endless space, all possessed of individual minds or spirits, but the idea of a universal, all-pervading sea of spirit, or vast reservoir of the concentrated extract of intelligence, or even a god, however grandly conceived, if without a material organism is, I insist, utterly absurd and absolutely unthinkable.

Intelligence is individual, and can never be omniscient or omnipresent. It is thought-activ mentality, and implies concentration, application for a certain subject at a certain time in a certain direction, and this local application or concentration of thought positivly excludes all other subjects at the same time and in all other directions. Therefore there cannot possibly be such a thing as universal spirit or intelligence, and the idea is infinitly more difficult of comprehension, and the problem becomes vastly more complicated and mysterious than without this assumed agent.

A force acting in New York and one in Rochelle, one on our earth and a like force on Sirius, all this is thinkable; but a mind concentrated upon every spot of this earth, here and in China, in-doors and out, and upon every one of the countless millions of worlds and suns and systems in endless space at the same time, this is unthinkable!

Therefore, knowing a great deal about the wonderful potencies of matter and force, but knowing absolutely nothing concerning intelligence without a brain, let us remain within the beauteous realms of nature, within the boundaries of the knowable, and here patiently labor among the infinit glories of matter and its magical and potent attribute to unravel the difficulties of the mysteries of cosmic existence.

OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Rochelle, Ill., Sept., 282.

AN anti-Semitic congress was held at Dresden, in the kingdom of Saxony, Europe, recently. At the instigation of Herr Stoecker, the infamous clergyman who initiated the anti-Jewish crusade, eight resolutions were passed. They begin by stating that the present condition of the Jews is dangerous to themselvs and to the whole civilized world. That their condition is dangerous to themselvs reads something like an edict of the Inquisition, which burned its victims' bodies in order to save their souls. Another reason given why the Jews should be extirpated was that their influence is in no way proportioned to their numbers or justified by their abilities, and that they hav no scruples as to their methods of making money. This is regarded by these Christians as sufficient excuse for killing off such Jews as they can. Furthermore, it was alleged that their habits of intermarriage, their hygienic and alimentary customs, and their strange language unfit them for amalgamating with the people among whom they reside. The reverend gentleman goes on in a similar strain, dilating in a manner totally opposed to all principles of liberalism or any of the ideas of the nineteenth century. This German bigotry finds its opposit in France, where the most Atheistic government of modern times is making money unsought out of the religious superstition of the people. Some years ago one of those miraculous appearances of the Virgin Mary which are reported from time to time occurred at Lourdes. "Our Lady" appeared to a little girl and her brother in a certain grotto. The peasantry believed the story. Wonderful cures were said to be wrought, and thousands of pilgrims flocked to the shrine. The church, nothing loath, consecrated the legend and the grotto, and the fees paid by pilgrims returned a handsome annual income. Recently the bishop died, and his see is still vacant. But the fees of the pilgrims continue to flow in, and the prefect of the department, at a loss what to do with them, sends every cent to Paris to the minister of finance. That official is not likely to object to the source from which the money comes, and in some future budget may make an item of revenue from miracles.

THE NATIONAL LIBERAL LEAGUE.

Its Sixth Annual Congress Held at St. Louis.

IMPORTANT MEASURES RESOLVED UPON.

The Best and Most Harmonious Congress of the League Ever Held.

MORNING SESSION.

The Congress opened, pursuant to the published call, at the hall of the Young Men's Temperance Union (formerly the First Congregational Church) at St. Louis.

The churchly appearance of the walls and seats, which had so lately echoed only hymns, sermons, and prayers, caused many of the delegates to remark that the telegram of the president of the League at the Watkins Freethinkers' Convention, to the Methodists, that "liberty, science, and humanity would soon hav need of the churches, and wouldn't wish to pay too much for repairs," was coming true.

In the absence of the president, Mr. Wakeman, and of Hon. Elizur Wright, the first vice-president, Mr. T. C. Leland called the Congress to order, and Mrs. Dr. Juliet Severance, of Milwaukee, presided at the morning session, and opened with a short and appropriate speech.

About fifty delegates were present at the opening, but they continued to arrive during the day, so that in the end the Congress was the largest as to actual delegates ever held.

The secretary, Mr. Leland, Mrs. L. K. Jackson, E. A. Stevens, and E. C. Walker were appointed a Committee on Credentials and Proxies.

While this committee attended to their duties short addresses were delivered by Mr. Doty, of Port Jervis, New York; Mr. Hall, of Illinois; and Prof. A. P. Severance, of Milwaukee. The latter gave a very amusing account of the squabble the bigots had got into over the Sunday laws at Milwaukee.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The president, Mr. T. B. Wakeman, who had arrived during the morning session, presided, and opened the business of the Congress by an address of about half an hour in length as to the general purposes of the League and the business to come before it. His address was warmly approved and applauded. It will doubtless be written out and published in due time.

At the conclusion of the address the secretary read the following telegram:

"SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Sept. 28, 1882.

"To the National Liberal League Congress, St. Louis, Mo.: California Freethinkers send golden greetings. Please adopt 282. "BYRON ADONIS."

After this many letters were read from Leagues, delegates, and friends who could not be represented or present. These were of the most encouraging character.

The Committee on Credentials then presented a partial report, showing that nearly all of the Leagues were represented by delegates, proxies, and letters to appoint them.

Mr. Leland then moved, pursuant to notice that had been given in Man, the organ of the League, that the annual members of the League present who had paid $1 to become such be admitted to votes and seats in this Congress on a par with the delegates, but that this action should not be regarded as precedent to future congresses. This subject excited a lively debate. It was contended that it would open the door to those who might wish to pack the Congress at a dollar a head, by those who had a pet measure to pass or an ax to grind, and that even politicians, or, what was worse, even Christians, might pack the Congress and steal the whole League as they had Girard College.

The majority, however, considered that this danger would be provided against by the wisdom of the future congresses, and admitted all annual members present to vote.

Mr. John Steves, of Durand, Ill., then moved the appointment of a committee on resolutions and recommendations to the auxiliary Leagues. This motion was carried, and the Chair upon Nominations from the Congress appointed the following committee: John Steves, Durand, Ill.; Dr. Miller, St. Louis, Mo.; Mrs. H. S. Lake, California; George Chainey, Boston; E. A. Stevens, Chicago; E. C. Walker, Iowa; Dr. J. H. Severance, Milwaukee.

On motion of Mr. H. L. Boyce, of Nebraska, it was resolved to appoint a committee to propose nominations for officers of the League for the next year. The Chair upon Nominations of the Congress appointed this committee as follows: H. L. Boyce, of Nebraska; Prof. A. B. Severance, Milwaukee; W. J. Gorsuch, Baltimore; Mrs. L. K. Jackson, of St. Louis; T. C. Leland, of New York; W. T. Doty. of Port Jervis; Charles Eckhard, of New York.

Mr. W. J. Gorsuch, of Baltimore, rose and spoke in regard to taking political action on the part of the League by means of a committee. Several members arose and objected to taking up the subject so late in the afternoon, and it was moved that the subject be deferred to the next morning session, and that Mr. Gorsuch should hav half an hour to open the subject and present his proposition.

Mr. W. T. Doty, of Port Jervis, then called the attention of the Congress to the subject of life insurance and benefit and relief societies. He explained at some length the printed papers and forms which were in use in his League at Port Jarvis, and advocated the policy of having that or some similar plan adopted by the Leagues generally.

Mr. Follet, of Illinois, strongly inclined to favor the project, so far as the benefit of members of the Liberal Leagues were concerned.

Mr. Leland wished also to hav some benefit to the League result from the insurance of members, and that its protection and the publicity it would giv to the persons managing any benefit or life insurance association of League members would be a benefit to them worth at least a dollar for every person insured.

Mr. Wakeman gave instances of benefits which had accrued to voluntary benefit associates among the employees in the New York Post-office, the police, and others. He remarked that hundreds of similar societies were in successful opperation in New York and other states, and that this mode of union of many to protect each from the calamities of death, accident, and sickness was being made, cheap, safe, and practical, and was in the air. Why should not Liberals adopt it?

Mr. Jackson, president of the St. Louis League, arose to show why not, and made the most terrific and personal speech of the Congress. He thought that the whole subject was foreign to the League, and that its officers were being imposed upon, or had a hobby or purpose of their own in this matter.

Mr. E. C. Walker, of Iowa, showed that Mr. Jackson thought as he did because he did not understand the subject and the general interest among the Leagues and Liberals in regard to it. Why should we pay millions to general life insurance companies, mostly under the control of Christians, when better and surer protection could be obtained by Liberals among themselvs.

Mr. E. A. Stevens gave a narrativ of his extended experience in benefit associations, and was in favor of them, but feared to make a money matter of them for the benefit of the League.

Mr. Longley, of St. Louis, Dr. Hall, of Illinois, and several others, took part in this discussion.

Mr. Leland read a letter from Mr. D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, warmly recommending it to the consideration of the Congress as a great practical measure.

The following resolutions were finally moved by Mr. Follett, and passed almost unanimously:

Resolved, That this Congress recommend that each auxiliary League establish a relief and benefit department or association, and appoint a committee to aid its members in misfortune, sickness and at death.

Resolved, That a committee of four be appointed to consider and report to the Board of Managers upon the desirability and practicality of adopting some method of life insurance and benefit to the League and its auxiliaries, for any League to act thereupon before the next Congress if it so desires.

Thereupon the Congress nominated the president, appointed as such committee Benjaman Bancroft, Hon. Elizur Wright, T. J. Burke, and W. T. Doty. To this committee the Congress added Mr. T. B. Wakeman as chairman.

THE EVENING SESSION,

On the 29th. was devoted to public addresses. Mrs. Dr. Juliet Severance delivered a very able discourse upon the relations of Liberalism to woman, and advocated the right and sound policy of woman suffrage in a manner eloquent, logical, and conclusiv.

Mr. Chainey concluded the session by a short address, which was received with the highest satisfaction.

MORNING SESSION.—SEPT. 30TH.

The president opened the session promptly at ten o'clock.

The first business in order was the reading of letters and communications from Liberals who could not attend, but wished to be present in letter and spirit. The communications were from Carl Jenetz and W. T. Hill, of Little Rock, Ark., League; H. W. Heat and Walter Walker, of Farmington, of the Utah League; H. L. Green, of the State League of New York; Samuel Whittles, of the Fall River, Mass., League; J. H. Burnham, of Saginaw, Mich., League; John Kelly, of Fillmore City, Utah; V. J. Borrette, of White Rock, Nevada; J. Deming, of Bushnell, Ill.; Dr. S. T. DeJones, president of the Pittsburgh League, Pa.; D. J. Vandiamant, of Solomon Valley, Kanas. Walter C. Wright, of Medford, Mass, chairman of the Executiv Committee of his state, sent a letter by way of report and suggestion. He says:

"As to the insurance matter proposed for discussion at the Congress, the best disposition appears to me to be to refer it to any auxiliary wishing to make the trial. This, in case it might not hav the success anticipated by its friends, would not involve the whole Leagne. If successful, it would naturally spread from League to League."

As Mr. Walter C. Wright is, like his father, Hon. Elizur Wright, an expert in life insurance by profession, his suggestion will doubtless hav great weight with the committee appointed on that subject. Many of the letters favored the new era, 282, and none opposed it. Others gave or favored insurance or benefit suggestions, and some inclosed money from one dollar to five.

After the letters the order of the day—the subject of political action—was taken up. Mr. Gorsuch opened by an address, mostly written, which occupied over half an hour, and which had a decided effect upon the Congress. It will probably be printed, and only an intimation of its contents can be given here. He contended that the great problem of this age is industrial emancipation, and that upon its achievement the future welfare of our republic, and indeed of the whole race, was dependent; that the various labor parties, having many names, and generally short-lived, yet ever recurring, in Europe and America, were attempts, ill prepared but prophetic, of a general movement in this struggle for the emancipation of labor and the productiv classes, which in the end must succeed; that the old religions were allied with selfish capitalists and monopolists—classes who used them and their priests to keep down the people while they were being robbed; that the old political parties, even in this country, were under the control of robber and parasite classes of society, and could do little more than make laws to enable them to get and keep their plunder and extortions; that Freethought had been educator of the people to a sense of the injustice of the present distribution of the products of labor, and that upon Freethought it devolved to offer any suggestion and to put forth any effort it could toward a union of all those who must co-operate, politically, in this country if the objects they desired were ever to be attained.

Mr. Gorsuch spoke with great power and feeling, and at the conclusion of his address moved these resolutions, which were seconded:

Resolved, That a permanent committee of five be appointed on political action, said committee to correspond with all labor and labor-sympathy organizations, to discover their sentiments in regard to combined national action, and also shall endeavor by all means in its power to impress upon such organizations the absolute necessity of such combination.

Resolved. That this committee, acting in conjunction with the Board of Managers, shall be empowered to call a national politico-labor convention if, after thorough investigation, a majority of said committee and Board of Managers decide favorably thereupon, said convention to be composed of delegates from all labor and reform unions or bodies, time and place of convention to be appointed by this committee.

Mr. Stevens, of Durand, Illinois, was willing to hav the League send out a committee to see what could be done with the warring labor and reform factions, but he was not very sanguin as to the results. Such people were only theorizing and were not ready to advance along the whole line. He was favorable to Henry George's plan of nationalizing the land, the general adoption of co-operation, including transportation and distribution.

Mr. J. H. Walser, the presiding genius of Liberal, Mo., spoke on the other side. The people who clamored for political action had not yet reached the first idea of what was necessary in order to make it successful. For instance, Mr. Gorsuch had spent much of his time in abusing lawyers and politicians, yet the lawyers, as a class, were honest and honorable, and, in the present state of society, indispensable. Every particle of the property of the country passes through their hands once in every thirty years, and it would be hard to find any other class of the community as honest when things are fairly considered. So as to politicians, they were also the necessary tools of political action, which must be by political parties. It was absurd to begin political action by the abuse of lawyers and politicians, which are the tools you hav to use, or to create others in their places. And would your new ones be much better than the old ones? The reason that all the labor parties break up is that they can't trust the lawyers and politicians they try to put in the place of the old ones. They are pretty sure to steal what money is collected, or to sell out to the old parties as soon as they can get influence enough to sell. He feared that taking political action now might injure the Liberal cause by its failure. All other parties, papers, and the churches, are against any such party. [A voice, "Let them come!"] Yes, let them come, but I prefer meeting them in detail. What we do at Liberal is to hold the balance of power between the parties, and so we are feared and respected by all, and we get our share of Liberals elected every time. Can you do better than that?

Mr. E. A. Stevens, of the Chicago League, in reply, said that he had no respect for the balance of power. It meant simply being used by the other parties for their purposes in turn, and the Liberals were pretty surely cheated in the end. The fact was that the old parties had no living principles now, and consequently their politicians lived for and by lying, and so gained office for private ends only and often for shameless peculation and swindling. The living principles of the Liberals would find and raise up honest men who would not abuse or betray the people. Yet the people needed education in true political economy. The thrift and economy commonly preached to them was nonsense. If everybody stinted and became economical there would be a general standstill and then bankruptcy. Everybody has a chance under competition, we are told.. Yes, but just as every boy has a chance to be President; but there are so few Presidents in a hundred years that the chances won't begin to go around. The trouble was there were not consumers enough. Politicians had no ideas on these subjects; they only knew how to run their machines. The people must educate them, and must first be educated. Laboring men must hav an intelligent ballot or it would be worse than no ballot at all. The best definition of intelligence now is the recognition of injustice and falsehood. Let this committee be appointed as a step in that direction. Let it send forth circulars and documents explaining to the people that they must overcome the present injustice in the distribution of the products of labor by an intelligent ballot, or it would be done by inevitable revolution, which, in all other systems of government, had been resorted to to sweep away injustice.

Mr. Thomas Curtis, of St. Louis, next took the floor, and was introduced by the chair as one of the original charter-members of the League at its organization in Philadelphia in 1876, and that from long service in the Liberal cause, those who knew him were accustomed to weigh his words as well as count them. He said, in substance, it did seem foolish at first for the Liberals of the country to try to move, politically, fifty millions of people. It was like the old story of the tail trying to wag the dog. The trouble will be that these very labor and reform organizations you may try to combine in order to wag your dog are largely composed of your religious opponents. The thousands of Catholics in them will obey not you but their priests, and so with the Protestants, and even the semi-Liberals. Until these men are liberated from their old religious bonds they cannot co-operate with themselvs nor with you. To educate in the direction toward justice is well. Every Liberal should become an educativ political center. He should preach, teach, and write against those parties which had sustained injustice in the forms that had been indicated. In this way the Liberals would gradually combine upon one of the parties now in existence as their organ. It would soon feel its dependence upon them, seek their assistance, and become educated to execute justice often by them as its candidates. Would not this be better and cheaper than to try to build up a new party?

Mrs. Dr. Severance strongly favored the resolutions and the appointment of an earnest committee. The proposition was not to turn the League itself into a political party. Nothing of the kind was contemplated. The League would go on and do its own work as before. Nor would the members be harmed by the new party in any way unless they choose to act with it. Heretofore the League Congresses had passed resolutions of sympathy with reform; now it was proposed to go a little further than empty words and see if reformers were ready to do something practical, and, if so, to help them. There is no reason why the most conservativ leaguer should object to this. The reformers of all kinds should favor this effort, for all reforms are related to Liberalism at bottom, and it is from thence that the common union should spring.

Mr. Alexander Longley, though not opposed to the appointment of a committee, strongly urged Liberals to consider the views which had been presented by Mr. Walser and Mr. Curtis. These views could be carried out now in the next canvass. The committee may not succeed, and we must not be discouraged from doing what is practical in the event of its failure. The building of a great party is a very great and a very expensiv undertaking—more so than its projectors imagin.

Dr. Hall, of the St. Louis League, thought that reformers did not consider that capitalists were products of society, much as the carnivorous animals are products of nature. Capitalists had come to act toward the working classes just as the carnivora toward the herbivorous and granivorous animals, that is, as their proper food. The trouble is that they had learned to do this as a matter of course, and without the slightest idea that there was anything wrong about it, or that things could be run in any other way. The doctor illustrated this from zoology and comparativ physiology in a very amusing manner. The press, unfortunately, had become one of the decoy hunters for the capitalists, and in all the range of nature he had not found a meaner instance of this kind of co-operation in order to plunder.

Mr. Follett, of Illinois, did not care to discuss zoology or biology to find excuses for social lions, tigers, or hyenas. He had become disgusted with the word policy. He wanted to strike straight from the shoulder. No reform was ever effected without that. He should vote for the appointment of the committee.

Dr. Hall, of Illinois, did not wish to be confounded with his zoological namesake of St. Louis. He was a reformer, and for that reason had stood off from political parties for thirteen years. He had felt like the woman in the story of the fight between her husband and a bear. "Go it husband, and go it bear," was all there was to say of the old parties, He had sacrificed much, professionally and otherwise, and was still ready to sacrifice if necessary. He should vote for the committee.

At the conclusion of Dr. Hall's remarks the Congress took a recess until 2 o'clock.

AFTEROOON SESSION.—SEPT. 30TH.

The president, Mr. Wakeman, at the request of several members, gave a short account of the attempt of the League to set on foot the National Liberal Party at its Congress at Cincinnati in 1879. He said that it was well known that a political convention was called in conjunction with the Congress of the League in that year, and was held at the conclusion of the Congress with great enthusiasm. It promised much. The Liberals, the Socialists, the reformers among the employers, and Col. Ingersoll took part in it. A platform was framed acceptable to all in a remarkable degree, and a complete body of officers and committees were appointed to begin its operations.

That was the last that was heard of it. Why? As chairman of its executiv committee I will report. It was fatally officered. The most blatant leader of the Socialists, who had backed the effort in convention, accepted a place on one of John Kelly's newspapers in New York, sent his children to a Roman Catholic convent, and has spent much of his spare time since in abusing his former comrades and Liberal movements and societies.

The reform capitalist who was elected president of the new party was too pure for open contact with this world. He was a professed admirer of the astonishing purity of our former president, Mr. Abbot, and it was with great difficulty that he could be brought to co-operate with the Liberals who were opposed to Comstockism.

When I looked around to find him to lead the new party I found that he was under indictment for forgery and bigamy, and had some half dozen wives on hand to illustrate his purity.

The fate of Col. Ingersoll, who was looked to as the chief of the new party, was almost equally unfortunate. We can all remember him swinging his hat at the front of the platform calling for three cheers for the new party. Those cheers were all that the new party ever had of him. He went right out and was rebaptized into the Republican party, and has been the hewer of wood and the drawer of water for it ever since. And the astonishing thing about it is that he seems to like his position. We told him when he gave three cheers for that new party that it would make him President of the United States. So it would if he had but been true to it.

But you will say these men were not workmen. Are you sure that workmen would hav done better? It is a strong man who is strong enough to own his own vote in this country. As a friend and member of the Liberal societies in New York I hav had much experience in political parties started by labor re formers. They generally die in a year or two from the untrustworthiness or suspicions of their members. The stories they tell of each other are an amusing study in human nature. There is much reason to believe that only those who hav a lively sense of a material hell, or those whose souls hav passed under the spell of the religion of humanity in some form, can withstand the temptations of an electioneering fund or the promis of an office, for much more than a year.

Yet from past failures I learn not to despair, but to try again. If this committee is ordered, I will giv it a majority of workmen if possible, and also all the assistance in my power. For the conviction remains that only those who hav broken with imagined autocracy and aristocracy above the skies can lead effectivly the break from the real autocracies and monopolies on the earth.

Mr. Parker thought that it might be best to limit the action of the League to the maintenance of liberty and the suppression of superstition.

Mr. S. D. Moore, of Adrian, Mich., coincided with the views of the last speaker; that as long as there was $500,000,000 of church property in the United States it might be well to attend to that, and that new political parties could grow without any start from the League.

Prof. A. B. Severance, of Milwaukee, explained that the new party, if formed, would not hamper, but would doubtless aid, the League in its original constitutional work. The new party would hav its own officers and organization. This seemed to him to remove the principle objections that had been made to the resolutions.

Another member arose and pointed to the vacant seats as a reminder to those present of the interest exhibited in their discussions and plans by the labor organizations and other societies, the co-operation of which they expected to secure.

The president next arose and read the following letter, which had just been handed him, as germain to the question under discussion. It was addressed to the president, and headed "Socialistic Labor Party:"

Late last evening I obtained from Dr. Donai your letter to him relativ to the Convention. Although rather tardy in aiding you, I hope that there will yet be time to rally sufficient of our St. Louis comrades to make a good audience. Hav written to several alreadv. When will that independent political action be taken? You know how we feel about it, considering the masses want action and are fully ripe enough.

May your efforts result in the inauguration of a vigorous movement, emancipated from the old quacks, mediums, and word wrestlers that hav hampered progress, is the earnest hope of Yours impatiently, PHILIP VAN PATTEN.

William J. Gorsuch, of Baltimore, who introduced the resolutions for the organization of a political party, then addressed the meeting, and reminded his hearers that religionists were so divided and arrayed against each other that the Liberals had an equal show, and would, he thought, be welcomed by the Democratic party, at least to some extent.

Prof. Peck, of Milwaukee, next addressed himself to the task of removing the impression created by reference to the unfilled condition of the seats, and stated that the Knights of Labor, to whom he belonged, were rapidly becoming imbued with the principles of Liberalism, so much so, in fact, that while formerly the members were bound to secrecy and unity by an oath, with license to reveal the nature of their obligations to the priest, an affirmation is all that is required at present owing to the reform introduced by the Liberal and Socialistic spirit.

Cries of "question" followed the delivery of this speech, and Gorsuch's resolution was carried by an overwhelming majority, there being only three dissenting votes.

The chair upon nominations from the Congress announced the following as the Committee on Political Action: William J. Gorsuch, Matthew Farrington, Byron Adonis, Juliet H. Severance, E. A. Stevens, of Chicago, and E. C. Walker, of Iowa.

Then followed the offering of various resolutions on a great variety of topics, all of which were referred to the Committee on Resolutions. They related largely to the Christian theft of Girard College, political action, the new era, insurance, and church taxation.

The next order was the report of the officers of the state Leagues. Reports were made by Mr. Follett, of Illinois; Vandiamant, of Kansas; Mr. Howe, of Texas; Mr. Thayer, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Walker, of Iowa, and Mr. Jackson, of St. Louis.

Mr. Jackson made a remarkable speech, and afforded his listeners much amusement by his vehement denunciation of Missouri. "I represent," said he, "the meanest state in the Union. Bob Ingersoll has said that St. Louis was like a diamond pin in a dirty shirt, and I'll represent the pin and let all else go. We hav a peculiar element here. St. Louis is the Rome of America, and makes more priests in a year than New York—which is said to be the stronghold of Catholicism—does in five. We hav a good League here, and it is a 'nukelus' around which the state of Missouri revolves. [Laughter.] The city of Liberal is pretty good, but gravitates toward Kansas City. Missouri ought to be obliterated from the face of the earth; it is an ulcer on the United States, and I am ashamed to represent it. There is one thing, however, to be said in her favor. It is that she was the first to telegraph to Philadelphia that she had liberated her slaves, but she forgot to add that they had been liberated in compliance with a forcible request of Union soldiers." [Laughter.]

The impression of the Congress evidently was that Mr. Jackson was too severe on his state; and at his request Mr. Thomas Curtis was put on as chairman for that state next year, in the hope that better things would be heard from her. The other reports were that good progress had been made the past year in every state.

George Chainey, of Boston, then came in at the head of the Committee on Resolutions, and read the following:

1. Resolved, That we reaffirm our devotion to the fundamental principles, and the neglect of which by the government of these United States has called us into existence as a League, namely:

First. Total separation of church and state, to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution; and this separation we mean to include the equitable taxation of church property, secularization of the public schools, abrogation of Sabbatarian laws, abolition of chaplaincies, prohibition of public appropriations for religious purposes, and all other measures necessary to the same general end.

Second. National protection for all citizens in their equal civil and religious rights, irrespectiv of race or sex, or belief or unbelief, to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, and protection to be afforded through the United States courts.

Third. Universal education the basis of universal suffrage in this secular republic, to be secured under present laws and proper legislation, and finally to be guaranteed by amendment of the United States Constitution, requiring every state to maintain a thoroughly secularized public school system, and to permit no child within its limits to grow up without a good elementary and secular education.

2. While the members of the present Congress well know that the accomplishment of these ends is the dearest wish of every member of the League, it is well aware that there exists some diversity of opinion (as is natural among free men and women) touching the wisest methods of working for their achievement.

As a guide to present action, this Congress adopts the following resolutions:

First. Resolved, That, pending the proposed formation of a separate political party, each auxiliary League and individual member of this body make it their constant care to secure in their separate communities the nomination of such men for office as publicly declare their belief in the principle of the absolute secularization of the state.

Second. Resolved, That it is our higher duty to secure the secularization of the people who compose the state; that for this end we recommend the diffusion of scientific and Liberal literature; the maintenance of competent secular lecturers; the establishment of independent secular schools, free public libraries, and reading-rooms; and any agency that has for its aim the physical, mental, and moral completeness of mankind.

Third. Resolved, That in all the other reform tendencies of the age, such as woman's demand for enfranchisement, the just claim of labor to be freed from the greed of heartless corporations, and the unjust privileges accorded to capital, the growing desire for a social condition founded on the equal distribution of such natural bounties of nature as are the product of no man's labor; the demands of civil service reform, and anti-monopoly leagues, we recognize the same fundamental sense of justice struggling in the birth throes from which shall at last be born a state wherein every opportunity in politics, education, and nature shall be eligible to the weakest and poorest member of society on the same terms as to the wealthy and the strongest. Reply to Mr. Whitehead.—Concluded.

Prof. Davidson, in further remarks upon the incapacity of the fathers, says:

The three fathers of whom we are speaking had neither the ability nor inclination to examin the genesis of documents surrounded with an apostolic halo. No analysis of their authenticity and genuinness was seriously attempted. In its absence, custom, accident, taste, practical needs, directed the tendency of tradition. All the rhetoric employed to throw the value of their testimony as far back as possible, even up to or very near the apostle John, is of the vaguest sort. Appeals to the continuity of tradition and of church doctrin, to the exceptional veneration of these fathers for the gospels, to their opinions being formed earlier than the composition of the works in which they are expressed, possess no force.

The ends which the fathers in question had in view, their polemic motivs, their uncritical, inconsistent assertions, their want of sure data, detract from their testimony. Their decisions were much more the result of pious feeling, biased by the theological speculations of the times, than the conclusions of a sound judgment. The very arguments they use to establish certain conclusions show weakness of perception. What are the manifestations of spiritual feeling compared with the result of logical reasoning? (Davidson on the Canon, pp. 123, 124).

Thus we hav the testimony of one of the ablest and clearest minds that has ever written upon the canon that the fathers most depended upon to establish the authenticity of the small books forming it were "ignorant," "credulous," "blundering," "passionate," "one-sided," "uncritical," "inconsistent," "possessed undue enthusiasm, with contradictions," "exaggerations," "not possessing ability or inclination to examin," "attempting no analysis of genuinness," "an unreasonable apostolic reverence," "custom, accident, taste, and the tendency of tradition taking the place of careful examination," "a disposition to misrepresent," "exceptional veneration of the fathers for the gospels older than the composition," "want of data," "their decisions the result of pious feeling," "based upon [incorrect] theological speculations," "unsound judgment," "weakness of perception," "lack of logical reasoning." These are the characteristics of the fathers depended upon to establish the authenticity of a gospel story which has no solid foundation to rest upon, and which is clearly of an apocryphal character. The charge of ignorance is thus most clearly established.

The opinion that the early supporters of the gospel story were incapable, uncritical, and dishonest, and that many fraudulent productions were foisted into notice, is supported by other testimony. Mosheim, the great ecclesiastical historian, givs the following evidence:

There were a number of commentaries filled with impositions and fables on our Savior's life and sentiments, composed soon after his ascent into heaven [an unauthentic and improbable event] by men who, without being bad, perhaps were superstitious, simple, and piously deceitful. To these were afterward added other writings, falsely ascribed to the most holy apostles by fraudulent individuals.

He adds the very damaging testimony that the early Christian fathers and others fell into the pernicious error of deeming it not only lawful but commendable to deceive and lie for the sake of creed and piety. He continues in this way:

This vice early spread among the Christians. Of this no one will doubt who calls to mind the numerous forgeries of books under the names of eminent men, the Sibyline verses, and I know not what besides, a large mass of which appeared in this age (the second century) and subsequently. I would not say that the orthodox Christians forged all the books of this character; on the contrary, it is probable that the greater part of them originated from the founders of the Gnostic sects. Yet that the Christians who were free from heterodox views were not wholly free from this fault is too clear to be denied.

The ignorance and superstition of the early fathers are made clear by what they taught. Clement of Rome, at the end of the first century, taught as true the fable of the phenix, which was said to renew its life every five hundred years, rising from its dead ashes. He believed this mythical bird had a real existence, and quoted what he supposed to be a fact to prove the doctrin of the resurrection of the body. Tertullian believed the same absurdity, and after Celsus had shown the fallacy, Origen defended the fable, also believing in its truth.

Barnabas, or the person who wrote the epistle bearing his name, ignorantly believed that the hyena changed its sex every year, being alternately male and female; that a hare bears as many young as it is years old; that a weasel is impregnated in the mouth; that the reason why men should eat only animals with a cloven hoof was because the righteous people lived in this world, but had expectations of the next.

Justin Martyr believed in demons, and that they were a hybrid between angels and the daughters of men; that insane people were possessed by devils or demons. He said the food of angels consisted of manna. Athenagoras also believed in demons; that angels were distributed over the universe to keep it regular, and that they cohabited with the daughters of men and produced giants and demons. Theophilus argued that the pains of women in child-birth and the fact that snakes crawl upon their bellies were proofs that the fable of creation and the Garden of Eden is true. Tertullian held that the hyena annually changes its sex, and that the stag renews its youth by eating poisonous snakes. He also taught that eclipses and comets were indications of God's anger and forerunners of great calamities. He held that volcanoes were the chimneys of hell, and that the volcanic condition is a punishment inflicted upon mountains as a warning to wicked men; that demons are the cause of diseases and that they send them upon human beings to torment and annoy them; that they cause blight to grain, and are the source of all the accidents and misfortunes that befall people in this world. He taught the monstrous absurdity that a corpse once moved along of itself in a cemetery to make room for another corpse to lie beside it. He recommended magistrates to summon before them persons possessed with a devil, and said if the devil did not acknowledge himself to be a devil he would falsely claim to be a god, and then must be killed.

Clement of Alexandria taught that hail storms, tempests, and plagues are caused by demons; that "credulity is necessary to render faith easy;" that events in the life of Abraham were typical and prophetical of arithmetic and astronomy. He was so generous as to teach that the Jews and Gentiles would hav the gospel preached to them in hell. He was also lascivious. It has truly been said that "his chapter on the immorality of pagan women in the bath betrays the hatred of the canaille for the upper classes, and shows if the bishop of the church could use such language, that the early Christians of Alexandria must hav been from the very lowest grades of society." His book was so unseemly that his translators were forced to omit the most indecent parts.

Origen taught that the sun and moon are living beings endowed with reason and free will, and that they occasionally committed sin. He was not quite sure whether their souls were created at the same time with their bodies or existed before. He was also rather uncertain whether their souls would be released at the time of the destruction of their bodies at the end of the world. He claimed that their light was the knowledge and wisdom reflected from the eternal light surrounding God's throne. That they had free will he proved by a quotation from Job (xxv, 45): "How, then, can man be justified with God? Or how can he be clean that is born of a woman? Behold, even to the moon, and it shineth not; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight!" That the stars are rational creatures he inferred from the fact that they move. He said, "As the stars move with so much order and method that under no circumstances whatever does their course seem to be disturbed, is it not the extreme of absurdity to suppose that so much order, so much observance of disciplin and method can be demanded from or fulfilled by irrational beings?" He held that the sun, moon, and stars are subject to vanity, and that they prayed to God through his only begotten son. Famin, the blighting of vines, fruit trees, and other crops, the destruction of beasts and man, he believed to be directly the work of demons.

Lactantius believed that demons enter men and injure them through the viscera, producing both physicial diseases and mental distempers. He believed, further, that the symbol of the cross was potent to drive them away, so all that a person had to do to keep the devils out was to wear the figure of the cross around the neck or other parts of the body. He strongly ridiculed the rotundity of the earth and the possibility of there being people on the opposit side of the globe. He held it to be utterly impossible that the sun, moon, and stars could ever be under the earth, and that snow, hail, and rain could, by any possibility, fall upward to the earth. This ignorant philosophy of his was written in his work entitled "The Divine Institutions."

Cyril believed in the fable of the phenix, and declared that God created it expressly to enable man to believe the doctrin of the resurrection. But as wonderful a bird as he conceived it to be he greatly regretted that it was irrational, that it could not sing praises to God, and knew nothing of his only begotten son.

Chrysostom believed the air is peopled with angels, Thomas believed it filled with demons, St. Augustine also believed it filled with demons, and that they try to deceive men by appearing to be gods. He taught that there is a class of satyrs and fauns called Incubi, to whose lascivious attacks women are constantly subject. He held that there was so much evidence of this, to deny it is an impertinence. He believed that numerous miracles took place in his day, and narrated difficult and impossible cures which had been performed upon many people, by the relics of some dead saints or by the rite of baptism being performed; he taught that evil spirits were cast out of cattle by prayer. He also ridiculed the rotundity of the earth and the belief in antipodes. Nearly all the early fathers wholly disbelieved in the rotundity of the earth; the doctrine came from the Greeks, and it was denounced as an untrue heathen doctrine. Patricius, Diodorus, of Tarsus and other historic theologians taught the same. The Christian religion was staked on the flatness of the earth, and when science demonstrated that the earth is a globe, theology received a more deadly blow than ever before, and will never recover from it. The fathers believed all exact learning to be of the devil.

Keeler says:

The erroneous and grotesque beliefs of the Christian fathers could be quoted until they filled a large volume, but a few are sufficient to illustrate the intellectual condition of the ages which originated and transmitted the Bible to us. It will be said the fathers were as good as their times. That cannot be maintained. They were not even as good. There were men in those days who saw that the world is round. The fact that Augustine, Lactantius, and other fathers opposed the theory shows that there were men who advocated it. . . . . In short, the sum of the charges against the fathers is that they were not competent to tell what was evidence of a fact and what was not. They cited as evidence of a theory things which are not in the slightest degree such, and they would look directly into the face of evidence which established theories they did not indorse and still would be unable to say it was evidence. Now, if the fathers were great scholars, they should not hav been so persistently in the wrong. They should hav seen the truth, at least as others did. What has become of the names and memories of the men who stood up for the truth? Are they even yet called great? The Christian church has been honoring the wrong persons.

The ignorance of the fathers not only pertained to nature but embraced literature as well. Very few of them understood Hebrew. Justin Martyr quoted from Jeremiah and called it Isaiah. Clement of Alexandria quoted as scripture passages found in no book of the Bible. He also quoted from Paul words which Paul did not use. In quoting from other writers he often put in words and sentences not in the writings of the persons quoted. Tutullian quoted as in Leviticus a passage not to be found in that book. He also misquoted history. He pretended to quote from Isaiah a passage not found in that book, but to be found in Revelation. He committed many similar inaccuracies. The gospel writers made like errors. The person who wrote the gospel of Matthew attributes to Jeremiah a passage found only in Zechariah; and the writer of Mark credits to Isaiah a passage which is in Malachi. The fathers quoted from apocryphal books the same as though they were genuin; and they also quoted from heathen poets and writers, and often called the same scripture. When Paul, even, uses the maxim, "It is more blessed to giv than to receive," and attributes it to Jesus, he uses a passage not found in the four gospels, and his quotation "Evil communications corrupt good manners" (1 Cor. xv, 33) was taken from the "Thais" of Menander, one of the seven wise men of Greece. The familiar quotation "For in him we liv and move and hav our being" (Acts xvii, 28) is from the Greek poet Aratus, and from the "Hymn to Jupiter" of Cleanthes. The passage "The Cretians are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies" (1 Titus i, 12) is taken from the Greek poet Epimenides, who is called a prophet. Paul quoted as scripture passages not to be found in the Old Testament. The writer of Matthew made the same mistake. He pretended to quote as the words of a prophet "I will open my mouth in parables; I will utter things which hav been kept secret." There is no such prophecy, no such language in the Old Testament.

By way of repetition it may be said that in the early churches such apocryphal writings as "The Revelation of Peter," "The Revelation of Paul," "The Epistle of Clement," "The Shepherd of Hermas," "The Gospel of Barnabas," "The Gospel of Nicodemus," "The Gospel of the Hebrews," and many other similar apocryphal and unauthentic productions were read and accepted by the fathers as scripture divinely inspired, but there is not a thing to show that the four books according to, not by, Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John were ever read or known till late in the second century. We hav here the strongest proof that what was then regarded as the word of God was afterwards rejected by the councils which subsequently convened to decide which is the word of God, and such writings as early had not been accepted and were wholly unknown afterwards, were accepted as the only genuin article.

That the charge of ignorance justly attaches to many of the fathers of the church, and that of dishonesty as well, there is abundant evidence, but a small portion of this can be given here. Mosheim, in part ii, chap. 3, of his "Ecclesiastical History," says:

The interest of virtue and true religion suffered yet more grievously by the monstrous errors that were universally adopted in this century, and became a source of innumerable calamities and mischiefs of succeeding ages. The first of these maxims was that it was an act of virtue to deceive and lie when by that means the interest of the church might be promoted; and the second, equally horrible, though in another point of view, was "that errors in religion, when maintained and adhered to after proper admonition were punishable with civil penalities and corporal tortures." The former of these erroneous maxims was now of long standing. It had been adopted for long ages past, and had produced an incredible number of ridiculous fables, fictitious prodigies, and pious frauds to the remarkable detriment to that glorious cause in which they were employed. And it must be frankly confessed that the greatest men and the most eminent saints of this century [the fourth] were more or less tainted with the infection of this corrupt principle, as will appear evident to such as look with an attentiv eye to their writings and actions. We would willingly except from this charge Ambrose and Hiliary, Augustin, Gregory Nazianzen, and Jerome; but truth, which is more respectable than these venerable fathers, obliges us to involve them in the general accusation.

At another time he says, as translated by Vidal:

At the time when he [Hermas] wrote, it was an established maxim with many of the Christians to avail themselvs of fraud and deception, if it was likely they would conduce toward the attainment of any considerable good.

He again says:

It was considered that they who made it their business to deceive, with a view of promoting the cause of truth, were deserving rather of commendation than censure.

The French Protestant writer, Casaubon, talks in a similar way, thus:

It mightily affects me to see how many there were in the earliest times of the church who considered it a capital exploit to lend to heavenly truth the help of their own inventions in order that the new doctrin might be received by the wise among the gentiles. These officious lies, they said, were devised for a good end.

Le Clerc, corroborating these opinions, says:

Dissemblers of truth are nowhere to be met with in such abundance as among the writers of church history.

M. Daille, another learned and impartial French writer, in his celebrated work, the "Use of the Fathers," says:

We find them saying things which they did not themselvs believe. They are mutually witnesses against each other, that they are not to be believed absolutely on their bare word.

In book 1, chap. 6, he states, upon the authority of St. Jerome, that:

Origen, Methodius, Eusebius, Apollonaris, hav written largely against Celsus and Porphyry. Do but observe their manner of arguing, and what slippery problems they used. They alleged against the Gentiles, not what they believed, but what they thought necessary.

Jerome himself adds:

I forebear mentioning the Latin writers, as Tertullian, Cyprian, Minutius, Victorinus, Lactantius, Hiliary, lest I should rather seem to accuse others than defend myself.

Daille adds of the fathers:

They made no scruple to forge whole books.

An able writer in the Eclectic Review of 1814, page 179, speaks of the fathers in this way:

When we consider the number of gospels, acts, epistles, revelations, traditions, and constitutions which were put in circulation during the first three centuries, and which are unquestionably spurious, we find sufficient reason for examining with care and receiving with extreme caution productions attributed to eminent men in the primitiv church. Some of the early Christians do not appear to hav possessed, in some points, a nice sense of moral obligation. The writing of books under false names, and the circulating of fables, were not accounted violations of duty; or, if the impropriety of such conduct was felt, the end proposed—the promotion of the Christian cause—was thought to justify the means employed for the accomplishment.

Let us glance a little further at the characters of these fathers, upon whom we depend for the sacred writings of the New Testament. It is to Origen more than to any other that we are indebted for the collection of the books called the canon; for it is principally upon his authority that these books were selected out from the others and regarded as inspired. It was upon his ipse dixit that the council of Laodicea adopted his collection as the inspired word of God. It is well to see what kind of a man he was. Bishop Horsely, in his reply to Priestly, states:

Origen was not incapable of asserting in argument what he believed not, and that a strict regard to truth in disputation was not one of the virtues of his character.

The bishop further remarks:

Time was when the practice of using unjustifiable means to serve a good cause was openly avowed, and Origen himself was among its defenders.

It is, however, sad for the memory of this greatest of the Christian fathers that there are strong grounds for believing that late in life he renounced the system of Christianity he had labored so hard to establish. That this was the case, Robert Taylor says:

It is to be found, however, in Origen's own writings, and is confirmed in his life in the Greek of Suidas. His dolorous lamentations and repentance after this outrageous apostasy present us with the most authentic and, at the same time, the most demonstrativ view of the interior characters of the most primitiv Christianity; and must satisfy those who dream of a state of Christianity at any time before the Protestant reformation, when what are called the principles of the reformation were the principles of Christianity, how grossly their Protestant teachers hav deceived them.

Eusebius, bishop of Cesarea, was another of the most important Christian fathers. In fact, he is about the only authority for the early history of the church. It has been said by able minds, that "without Eusebius we should scarce hav had any knowledge of the history of the first ages of Christianity, or of the authors who wrote at that time." All other writers of church history begin where Eusebius left off. It is of no slight importance that we should know, then, what manner of man he was. Truth, then, requires it to be said that he was not a man who had an exalted estimate of truth. In the twelfth book of his "Evangelical Preparation" he devotes a whole chapter to proving that falsehood ought to be used whenever it is required, and he heads the thirty-first chapter with this question "how far it may be proper to use falsehood for a medicin, and for the benefit of those who require to be deceived." In another place he says, "I hav related whatever might redound to the glory, and I hav suppressed all that could tend to the disgrace, of our religion." Baronius, a sincere advocate of the Christian faith, calls Eusebius "the great falsifier of ecclesiastical history, a wily sycophant, a consummate hypocrit, a time-serving persecutor, who had nothing in his known life or writings to support the belief that he himself believed in the Christian system." This man is confessedly a hypocrit and falsifier, and it is greatly to be regretted that all we hav of the early history of the church, and the apocryphal writings which compose its scriptures, is from him.

It is little better with the truthfulness of the other fathers, but these points must be briefly stated. Of Irenæus and Papias Dr. Whitby wrote, and with undoubted truth, "as having scandalously deluded the world with fables and lying narrations."

Of Justin Martyr, Mosheim, in an emphatic manner, says, "Much of what Justin says is wholly undeserving of credit."

Of the fathers Clement of Alexandria and Lactantius the Rev. Mr. Jones, in his "New Full Method of Settling the Canonical Authority of the New Testament," page 34, part ii, says "it was the practice with them to make use of testimonials out of forgeries and spurious books to prove the very foundation of Christian revelation."

St. Jerome, author of the Vulgate or Latin translation of the Bible, and esteemed as one of the first dignitaries of the early church, says quite enough to convict himself, and in these words: "I do not find fault with an error which proceeds from a hatred toward the Jews, and a pious zeal for the Christian faith."

Gregory Nazianzen, bishop of Constantinople, and surnamed "the divine," admitted to Father Jerome that "a little jargon is all that is necessary to impose upon the people. The less they comprehend the more they admire. Our forefathers and doctors of the church hav often said not what they thought, but what circumstances and necessity dictated to them."

Bishop Heliodorus, in his "Romance of Theagnes and Chericles," modestly says, "A falsehood is a good thing when it aids the speaker and does no injury to the hearers." St. Synesius further declares that the "people were desirous of being deceived. We can not do otherwise respecting them." The same saint further says, "For my own part I shall always be a philosopher, but in dealing with the mass of mankind I shall be a priest."

As specimens of the kind of truth St. Augustine dealt in, it is enough to say that he stated as a positiv fact, and "as true as the gospel," that "while he was bishop of Hippo Regius he preached the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ to a whole nation of men and women who had no heads, but had their eyes in their bosoms;" and in countries still more southerly he preached to a nation "amongst whom each individual had but one eye, and that situated in the middle of the forehead."

The apostolic father St. Hermas confesses to a truly bad character of himself. In his gospel, as quoted by Cooper, he wrote, "O Lord, I never spake a true word in my life; but I hav always lived in dissimulation and affirmed a lie for truth to all men, and no man contradicted me, but all gave credit to my words!" And as the same gospel sets forth, the angel who heard the above admission made answer in this way, "As the lie was up now he had better keep it up; as in time it would come to be believed it would answer as well as the truth."

It hardly can be denied that we hav shown conclusivly that the fathers were not only ignorant of many of the simple truths of nature, but that they substituted for the same the most arrant pretensions, frauds, and falsehoods. Possibly Mr. Whitehead may not be able to see these things in the light we do, but candid minds must certainly admit that we hav adduced strong and reliable testimony on these two important points.

As vague as it is who wrote the books of the New Testament, as uncertain as it is when the most of them were written, it is nearly as uncertain at what particular time they were first formed into a canon and were accepted by the church as the inspired word of God. True, Origen was the first to make a list of the books composing the New Testament, and his list was afterwards adopted by some of the subsequent councils; but still there was a great amount of wrangling between conflicting fathers and contentious councils as to which books should be admitted into the canon and which should be rejected. For the first two centuries there was no canon—no New Testament as such. Hundreds of gospels, epistles, etc., were in existence, presenting about equal claims for credit and divine origin, and it was a long time before the vexatious question was allowed to rest. The selection of the books and the agreement as to the list were slow and unsatisfactory in process, and, as Westcott says, it is "impossible to point to any period as marking the date at which our present canon was determined." The same competent writer further says:

This result (the formation of the canon) was obtained gradually, spontaneously, silently. There is no evidence to show that at any time the claims of the apostolic writings to be placed on an equal footing with the Old Testament, which formed the first Christian Bible, were deliberately discussed and admitted. . . . . Step by step the books which were stamped with apostolic authority were separated from the mass of other works which contained the traditions of less authoritativ teachers.

It is not at all strange that the bishops and priests of the early Catholic church, deeming it advisable to sift over the numerous gospels, epistles, and revelations claiming recognition, should select out the few which they chose to dub the "word of God," and throw the rest away. But we hav seen that they did not select the oldest gospels, nor those whose authors were known. They seemed to choose those of comparativly late origin, and whose writers were wholly unknown and possessed very weak claims to divine aid or dictation. The way in which the matter was quarreled over, and even fought over, is worthy of note; and the modes by which it was decided which books to use in forming the canon should not be lost sight of. If some of the gospels and apostles were genuin, and some were spurious, there is very slight grounds for telling that the genuin were accepted and the spurious discarded.

As we hav seen, it was in the third century that Origen made a selection of the many books in various hands and formed his list. The council of Laodicea, which sat in 363, ratified Origen's selection. So it follows that in all probability we are indebted to the choice of this tricky priest for the compilation comprising the New Testament. Had he from freak made a different choice, our so-called word of God to-day would doubtless be very different from what it is. How the priest Origen and the bishops and priests who met at Laodicea were able to select those inspired and separate them from those not inspired bids fair to remain a mystery. William Penn had a just conception of the difficulties in these premises when he thus wrote:

I demand of our adversaries if they are well assured of those men who first collected, embodied, and declared them (the scriptures) authentic by a public canon, which we read was in the council of Laodicea, three hundred and sixty-three years after Christ. I say how do they know that these men rightly discerned true from spurious? Now, sure it is, that some of the scriptures taken in by one council were rejected by another for apocryphal, and that which was left out by the former for apocryphal was taken in by the latter for canonical. Now, visible it is, that they contradict each other, and as true that they hav erred respecting the present belief.

The means sometimes taken to tell which books were genuin and which not is thus described by Pappius, in his "Synodicum of the Council of Nice," in these words: "By placing all the books under a communion table, and, upon the prayers of the council, the inspired books jumped upon the table, while the false ones remained under."

Several councils were held at different periods during the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh centuries, and they were generally noisy and very inharmonious. A few quotations will suffice to show the character of them, even in the eyes of zealous Christian writers. Tindal, in the 195th page of his work entitled "Rights of the Christian Church," quotes St. Gregory Nazianzen, who, in his letter to Procopius, gives his opinion of the councils in this language: "That he fled all assemblies of bishops, because he never saw a good and happy end of any council, but that they did rather increase than lessen the evil; that the love of contention and ambition always overcomes their reason." The pious Nazianzen again givs his reasons for not attending further councils, thus: "Because nothing is to be heard there but geese and cranes."

Tindal, in speaking of the first council convened by Constantine in 325, writes thus:

If these accusations and libels which the bishops of the Council of Nice giv in of one another to the emperor were now extant, in all probability we should hav such calls for scandal that few would hav much reason to boast of the first Ecumenical Council, where, with such heat, passion, and fury, the bishops fell foul of one another, insomuch, that had not the emperor by a trick burnt their church memorials, probably they must hav broke up in confusion. After that council was over the bishops made so great a disturbance and were so unruly that the good emperor was forced to tell them that "if they would not be more quiet and peacable for the future, he would no longer continue his expedition against the Infidels, but must return to keep them in order." Indeed, says the same Christian writer, "the confusion and disorder were so great amongst them, especially in the synods, that it sometimes came to blows; as for instance, Dioscorus, bishop of Alexandria, cuffed and kicked Flavianus, patriarch of Constantinople (at the second synod of Epesus) with that fury that within three days after he died."

St. Hiliary, bishop of Poictiers, expressed himself in this way about the councils and synods:

Since the Nicene synod we do nothing but write creeds; we fight about words; we raise questions about novelties; we quar-

Fourth. Resolved, That we regard the independent Liberal papers springing up all over our land as one of the mightiest among the agencies that are ever widening the bounds of light, and we therefore commend to the earnest and generous patronage of all Liberals such papers as Man and THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York; the Investigator, Banner of Light, and This World, of Boston; the Alliance, of Chicago; the Age and Iconoclast, of Indianapolis; the Liberal Age and Freidenker, of Milwaukee; the Lake Pepin Gazette, of Lake Pepin, Minn.; the Agnostic, of Dallas, Tex.; the Mind and Matter, of St. Louis, Mo; the Liberal, of Liberal, Mo., and other papers and periodicals of a Liberal character. We welcome every new birth of this order as an aid and a promis of hope of man's deliverance from the long night of ignorance and fear of superstition.

Fifth. Resolved, That in the late impertinent attempt of Oliver Stevens, district-attorney of Massachusetts, under the instigation of one of the agents of Anthony Comstock, to suppress the publication of "Leaves of Grass," that most splendid piece of wit and wisdom, as many believe, of the good gray nurse and poet, Walt Whitman, and which has been publicly recognized by some of the sanest and brightest intellects of the world as the chief literary glory of America, we discern a vindication of the original claim of this League—that any censorship of the mails or press by amateur societies under state laws, or through postal officials under United States laws, is imminently dangerous to the liberty of thought, of speech, and of the press, which is at once the dearest right of our manhood, and the most healthful, intellectual, and moral influence which can be exerted upon society. That we therefore repeat our demand that all laws that endanger such rights and liberties be repealed.

Sixth. Resolved, That since the proposition of the Watkins Convention (an auxiliary of this body) to establish a secular university, from which all theological and ecclesiastical influences shall be excluded, has been ridiculed by the religious papers, one of them (The Methodist) impudently and falsely saying "we [the Liberals] will do no such thing unless we can creep into some Christian university and steal it," we beg leave to remind Christians that Stephen Girard, of Philadelphia, a Liberal in every sense, thoroughly imbued with our principles, formerly established such an institution, but that in spite of his will and of every attempt by law to exclude from it all ecclesiastical control and theological influence we learn with amazement that Christian sects hav crept in like a thief in the night, and are now using it as an agency of theological propagandism. That we hold this treachery and theft in measureless contempt, and we recommend immediate steps to dispossess these thieves of their ill-gotten gain. We authorize to that end the Executiv Committee of this body to take any steps necessary, legal or otherwise, to recover this noble and wise benefaction of a Liberal man, and to secure that it be carried out according to his original intent.

Seventh. In addition to these resolutions governing our actions, we wish to make the following expressions of our feelings:

(1) Resolved, That we extend our sympathies to those in other lands who are struggling against still stronger and more oppressiv tyrannies than we That we bid them good speed in the fight with injustice in all its forms of oppression in both church and state, and that we especially recognize the great secular movement in England under the leadership of those brave champions of Liberty—Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant—as substantially identical with our own; and that in his arduous struggle against the injustice of the British Parliament in making a dogma of theology a bar to political and legal justice we extend to him our heartiest sympathy, in the full faith that we shall yet see him triumph over all his foes, and take possession of his rightful seat in Parliament amidst the plaudits of all liberty-loving men and women the world over.

(2) Resolved, That we cannot, while assembled in this Congress, fail to recall to memory the devoted services and life-long consecration to every cause of liberty, science, and humanity of our former president, Hon. Elizur Wright, and that while we regret his absence we send to him renewed assurances of our esteem and admiration, sincerely wishing that he may be long preserved to be a tower of strength and a crown of glory to the cause of liberty.

(3) Resolved, That as soldiers at the front depend upon and are stimulated by those who at home furnish the sinews of war, therefore, we, as activ laborers in the great Liberal movement, express our appreciation of and gratitude to the silent workers who in country and town throughout the land are making sacrifices of time and means to sustain the principles which we proclaim.

These resolutions, reported by the committee, were passed unanimously.

After the adoption of the resolutions the Congress recommended the Board of Managers to call the next Congress at Milwaukee, and thanked Mr. and Mrs. Dr. Severance for their generous invitation to meet there, they offering to pay all local expenses.

The session then adjourned.

EVENING SESSION.—SEPT. 30TH.

Newspaper report.

A large number assembled at eight o'clock to listen to addresses by Mrs. H. S. Lake and Dr. Williams of Milwaukee. The services were opened by the recital of a poem, "The City of Light," by Mrs. Lake. This was followed by a song from Mr. Lake, borrowed in part from the Christian hymn-book, but remodeled to suit Liberal ideas. The chorus of this song afforded peculiar satisfaction and pleasure to the audience because it seemed expressiv of the iconoclastic idea of the Liberalist.

Mrs. Lake then began her address, which was quite lengthy, and elicited frequent applause. The subject of the discourse was, "The Mission of Liberalism." The history of the origin, development, and purpose of Liberalism was narrated in forcible language. The different creeds or isms were reviewed and defined. The mission of Liberalism, as explained by the speaker, seemed to be to undo what Christianity had done in the way of infusing into the minds of its adherents superstitious beliefs. The so-called labor of saving souls by means of revival meetings and other ingenious methods known to Christians was scoffingly portrayed, while the task of the Liberalist who did not work merely on the emotions and sympathies of men, but appealed to his intelligence, was painted in a manner to make him a veritable hero.

The address of Mrs. Lake was succeeded by singing, and Dr. Williams, of Milwaukee, then discoursed on the "New Dispensation," painting in glowing colors a vision of Liberalism triumphant and Christianity buried in the mausoleum of dead superstitions.

MORNING SESSION.—OCT. 1, A.D. 1882.

The president called the Congress to order at 10 o'clock.

Mr. Frank Rivers arose and asked unanimous consent to make a statement. He said that he formerly resided in Boston, and was known as a Liberal there, but had lately removed to St. Louis. He believed that the press of St. Louis preferred to treat the Congress with fairness, but that they had made some mistakes, and he wished one to be corrected.

The mistake referred to was in attributing the authorship of "Cupid's Yokes" to D. M. Bennett, when such was not the case. Mr. Rivers stated that Mr. Bennett had only been arrested for selling the book, and that it had been written by Ezra H. Heywood, who had never belonged to any Liberal League, and had sold the book without opposition before Bennett's imprisonment. He claimed that the mere fact of Bennett's Freethought propensities being distasteful to the people brought about his imprisonment for selling the book. Mr. Rivers also claims that Mr. Bennett never indorsed a line of the work, and only sold it to demonstrate his right to do so.

As Mr. Bennett is coming West soon for the purpose of delivering a lecture, I desire to set him right before the people of St. Louis.

But still more, said Mr. Rivers, should the League be set right. Nothing had been said on the subject at this Congress. The League had nothing whatever to do with it, nor with "Leaves of Grass," nor with any other book, except to vindicate the liberty of the press, of speech, and the inviolability of the mails. The press was certainly presenting a strange spectacle in going out of its way to try and hunt up something against those who had labored and suffered for its defense, and for nothing else.

Mr. Curtis, of St, Louis, concurred in the remarks of Mr. Rivers, and said that the prosecutions referred to in this country, and of Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant in England, were instituted only out of theological malice. Those same books had been sold constantly before the trials, during the trials, and ever since without a word of objection by the prosecuting parties; that those charges were only made against Liberals to get them into trouble and break down the freedom of speech, liberty of the press, and the privacy of the mails, and that the press should never go back upon the Liberal editors who were the last who had suffered for the common benefit.

As to the offenses, they amounted to nothing that would not be forgiven or whitewashed in a moment if they only had been Christians.

The next order of business was the annual report by the secretary, Mr. Leland, and of the treasurer, Mr. Palmer.

Mr. Palmer had sent a telegram that in consequence of the illness of Mrs. Palmer he had found it impossible for him to attend, as he had fully intended and arranged to do. He wished the Congress every possible success.

Mr. Leland read both reports, which will be printed in due time. They showed that the League had doubled itself in members, means, and auxiliaries within the last year in spite of all drawbacks; that in order to open an office in New York, and to found the Man newspaper, the managers had advanced $800 over the $1,500 receipts. The question of the continuance of Man and of its needful support was submitted to the Congress.

The Congress had no doubt on the subject, and the reports were adopted unanimously.

Mr. Follett, whose appearance supported the assertion, announced that he had once been a hard-working Baptist. He commented upon the report, and said that they should not be discouraged by the apparent expense, as the Baptist denomination in its earlier days had grown far more in debt by sending missionaries out to convert the heathen who had a much better religion than the missionaries themselvs; yet to-day the denomination was wealthy enough.

Mr. Wakeman said that if Man was to be continued funds must be supplied or pledged. At this point Mr. Cowan, of Illinois, became warmed up, and, rising in his seat, said he wanted to giv five dollars. Somebody suggested that this had better be deferred until the proper time. "You had better strike while the iron's hot," said Mr. Cowan, and looked as if he might be cooling.

His suggestion was acted upon with celerity and his five dollars taken with no more objections. The example was contagious, and the scene for a short time afterward remained one of a revival, with this great difference that the converts offered their money instead of their souls on the altar. Ten or twelve men not members of the League came forward with their five-dollar bills, and each man took the stand and delivered a short but impressiv speech while he waved his greenbacks over his head.

At this point, Mr. Cowan, the first contributor, proposed a love feast. It was seconded enthusiastically, but the opportunity was too good to be lost, and subscription solicitors were started circulating with the gratifying result of something near a hundred dollars in additional donations. The entire amount collected was over $200.

Pledges for future subscriptions were then taken with good results.

Mr. Clarke, of St. Louis, then moved that the secretary of the National Liberal League be directed to forward blanks to each auxiliary League for the purpose of procuring subscriptions from individual members and friends of the cause for the League and for Man, which was unanimously adopted.

It was moved by Mr. Gorsuch and passed unanimously,

That this Congress earnestly impress upon the auxiliaries the extreme desirability of raising money for the national treasury, and that each League be allowed to use the method to accomplish the same that seems best to itself; further, that each delegate or Liberal present be constituted a committee of one, to individually exercise every power to further this very important object in his League and neighborhood.

The Committee on Nominations then reported the proposed officers for the next year, Mrs. Jackson acting for the committee:

For President, T. B. Wakeman, of New York.

Secretary, T. C. Leland, of New York.

Treasurer, Courtlandt Palmer, of New York.

Chairman of Executiv Committee, E. A. Stevens, of Chicago.

Chairman of Finance Committee, Mrs. H. S. Lake, of California.

And then followed a long list of vice-presidents and of executiv officers in each of the states, which will be published in due time.

The committee had been unanimous as to all of the principal officers except the chairman of the executiv committee. As to that two names had been presented—Mr. E. C. Walker, of Iowa, and Mr. H. L. Green, of New York—but all had agreed upon Mr. Stevens as soon as his name was mentioned.

The report was received with applause.

As to the matter of two life members, Mr. Leland said that Mr. Charles Eckard, a delegate from New York, in the greatness of his heart, had put up the money, $50, for the election of two ladies; as his acquaintance with the Liberal ladies of the country was limited, he desired the secretary to make the selection for him. The secretary fell into embarrassment over the subject and desired the Congress to help him out. Thereupon Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, of Snowville, Virginia, and Mrs. Lizzie K. Jackson, of St. Louis, were nominated, with applause. Mrs. Jackson at once arose and suggested Mrs. Lake to her place, and declined; but the Congress would hear of no declining, and both ladies were at once chosen.

The long list of vice-presidents and executivs of the several states were revised, subject to further revision by the Board of Managers, and then the whole report was adopted and the officers elected.

During the discussion as to the officers for the several states many interesting speeches were made. For instance, when Kentucky was called, a stalwart-looking man, Mr. Bennett, came forward and said:

I am a radical in both politics and religion. I do not belong to any League, but stand alone in my community as an Infidel. I came all the way from home, a distance of five hundred miles, on purpose to see Infidels, and I am proud of the name. I am the only man in my neighborhood who dares to say what he thinks. According to the Christian theory, I will hav to roast in — [here several suggested hades as better than the word used to fill the blank], but they say in my town that Guiteau went to heaven direct from the gallows, and I would rather be in — with a decent company of Liberals, for they never murdered anybody. My friends, you talk right, but you don't yet work right. You must make this a political party. Dare to do what is right and take the consequences. [Great applause]. This is Sunday, I believe, but Sunday don't belong to theologians, and I hav got as good a right to it as anybody. I hav made friends of three or four ministers, and they all quit preaching when they associated with me awhile.

Mr. Bennett was unanimously elected as Liberal executiv for the state of Kentucky.

When the executivs of the states were present they were called out and were introduced, and made speeches generally, both instructiv and amusing.

After this business was concluded, Mr. George Chainey, of Boston, arose and said that several resolutions and suggestions relativ to a new secular calendar had been referred to the Committee on Resolutions, and that they desired him to report the following, which he read:

THE MODERN ERA.

WHEREAS, The uncertain and mythical origin of the Christian calendar now in general use commits those who use it, to some extent at least, to the Christian theology; and,

WHEREAS, It would be a relief to many and a great convenience to hav a more certain modern and purely secular date for recording time,

Resolved, That we earnestly recommend all those who do not wish to express their adherence to the Christian theology to unite in all parts of the world upon a common, secular, universal date as the year one of a modern era; and,

WHEREAS, Three great events common to the whole human race, and which gave mankind a new heaven and new earth, point to the year known as "A. D. 1600," making our present year 282, as the proper beginning of the modern era; we call special attention to those facts, viz.:

1. The general publication and acceptance of the new or Copernican system of astronomy.

2. The discovery of the unity of the human race (i. e., humanity in its solidarity and continuity) by the extension of commerce and European civilization to Asia, Africa, and Australia, and the recognition of progress in the success of the ages and generations of the human race.

3. The foundation of International Law by Hugo Grotius (begun in 1600 and published in 1625); and,

WHEREAS, These events, which changed the face of the world, are fitly consecrated by the martyrdom of the great Liberal of his age, Giordano Bruno, who was burnt to death by the Christian church at Rome, on the 16th day of February, 1600, for proclaiming the new astronomy, the true solar system, the infinity of the heavens and of worlds; and,

WHEREAS, This modern date may be most conveniently used to succeed the old era, having its last two figures the same, and being capable of a familiar contraction to '82 for 282, just as the old date, 1885, is contracted to '82; therefore,

Resolved, That the national Liberal League adopt this date, and earnestly recommend its general use.

The resolution was adopted unanimously and with applause.

A discussion then arose as to whether it would be more proper to describe the new era as the Age of Reason, the Era of Science, or the Era of Man, so as to hav a proper substitute for the "Year of our Lord" (Anno Domini) of the old era.

Mrs. H. S. Lake, of California, moved that the Era of Man (contracted E. M.) be recommended as the new style. This was seconded by Mr. Thomas Curtis, of St. Louis, Mo., and others.

Amendments were offered that the Era of Science (contracted E. S.) be used; but this, and also the suggestion to use Age of Reason, did not prevail. The motion to recommend the Era of Man was then passed by so large a majority that it was almost a general consent.

The last vote on the subject of the new era was taken at twelve o'clock, and the Congress then adjourned until the afternoon session. Many were the hand-shakings and congratulations over the harmonious and important work of the morning.

AFTERNOON SESSION — SUNDAY, OCT. 1, E.M. 282.

From St. Louis Press.

The afternoon session was occupied entirely with a lecture by George Chainey, a former Methodist minister, and an admission fee of fifty cents was charged at the door. There was no perceptible decrease in the attendance, which had been very good all day. Mr. Chainey's lecture was, properly speaking, a eulogy of Walt Whitman and a criticism, extremely favorable, of his prohibited work, "Leaves of Grass." Aside from this it was principally an assault upon the Christian religion, which he saddled with whatever of wrong there was in the world.

As a fluent, poetical, and well-composed lecture it was deserving of credit, and reminded one somewhat of Ingersoll in those respects. It was received with frequent applause.

The meeting was adjourned after the lecture until eight o'clock P. M.

The evening session, Sunday, October 1, E. M., 282, was set apart by general consent to hear Mr. Wakeman's address on "The Era of Man and its Scientific Foundation."

I will giv you first what the local press says:

The meeting was called to order at eight o'clock by Mrs Severance. The opening program was, Recitation, entitled "The King and the Painter," by Mr. Gorsuch, of Baltimore; song, "Pat and the Pig," Prof. Peck, of Chicago; song, "Angel Footsteps," Prof. Peck. An unwritten discourse was then delivered by President Wakeman on Science, Evolution, and the Foundation and Progress of Liberalism. In the light of a scientific lecture, Mr. Wakeman's effort was very commendable. The Darwinian theory of evolution was explained and indorsed, and it was compared with the accepted theories of Christianity. He described the structure of Christian religion as being composed of three stories—hell, earth, and heaven, and demonstrated that Liberalism had done away with the two extremes and dwelt in the safe structure of the earth and the present. He read extracts from Goethe and Emerson, and closed by an exhortation not very dissimilar to the ordinary orthodox exhortations, except that Man was substituted for God. President Wakeman is an extremely radical evolutionist and Liberalist, with a very ministerial aspect, and the effect of his appearance in the pulpit of what was not long since a church, laying aside God, quoting famous Infidels, and invoking an infinity of space containing nothing higher than man, with uplifted hands and eyes, the place before him on the pulpit once consecrated to the Bible, now usurped by the works of Goethe and Ingersoll, the congregation applauding his particularly blasphemous sentiments, was at once impressiv and suggestiv.

Thus it struck this pious reporter, but the audience did not take it so coolly. Before Mr. Wakeman concluded his hour and a half discourse the applause was very frequent, and at the conclusion there was round after round. The audience had followed him through a thorough exposition of the whole historical and scientific basis of the new era of Liberalism, Science, and Humanity into a new world, as he called it. One member thought an adjournment should be had, so that nothing should mar in their minds the effect of that address, which he said was to him marvelous.

A delegate from Texas said he had long thought how to spend the time and money to attend this Congress, but that discourse repaid had him a thousandfold. He should return home a new man.

Another delegate said that he now felt what it was to be born again. Mr. Wakeman had taken him up like a child in his arms and carried him from the Old World into the New.

Several others followed in a similar strain, until finally an elderly gentleman of St. Louis, strongly resembling Santa Claus, nearly exploded in his attempts to express the effect of Mr. Wakeman's speech upon him. This had an amusing and sedativ tendency, and the Congress settled down to finish its business.

A resolution of thanks to Mr. Wakeman was passed, with the request that the speech be written out and printed at the expense of the League.

Mr. Wakeman returned thanks for the compliment, and said that he was requested to giv the same address as near as he could for Mr. Chainey at Paine Hall on Sunday, Oct. 18th, and that then it would appear in This World without expense to the League, but he could not promis it would be the same speech, for the present occasion was a large part of it.

Mr. Curtis offered a resolution of thanks to the newspapers of St. Louis for their "tolerably fair" reports of the Congress.

To this objection was made that boy reporters had been sent to the Congress who had not general intelligence enough to know what the Congress was about. "What can an ordinary reporter make out of such an address as we hav had to-night," said another delegate; "the press ought to be told that they must send educated men here or none."

With this admonition the thanks were given.

Mr. Leland said that some had spoken to him to the effect that Mrs. Lake and Mrs. Severance should be made life members of the League, as well as Mrs. Slenker and Mrs. Jackson. To do that, he said, it was necessary to raise $50.

The audience in a few minutes raised the amount, and the ladies returned their thanks, and said the funds would be applied in their Liberal work.

Mr. Gorsuch expressed his gratification at the work of the Congress. It had placed the Liberal cause in the United States upon an indestructible basis. The demons of the night of superstition, the selfisness, the narrowness, the discords of the past, were vanishing in the light and warmth of the new era.

Others took up the strain and gave their experiences in speeches of five minutes, until the hand at 12 o'clock brought an end to the "love feast," and compelled the Congress to adjourn until another year.

Mr. Hale Replies to His Critics.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Will you permit me to offer a few words in reply to Mr. T. Winter's criticism of my communication on the "Materialism of Mind," published in your paper of September 2d, the title of which, he thinks, should be "Old Brains?"

If vituperation and sarcasm are to be received instead of argument, then no doubt I am most summarily disposed of; but if truth and logical reasoning are to be adopted, then I think I shall be able to stand the racket a while yet.

I would remind Mr. Winter that invectivs and ridicule prove nothing more than that the one who uses them has nothing better to offer, that all argument is played out, that it is his last resort; and most certainly Mr. T. Winter's communication is nothing more nor less than a tirade of invectivs and sarcasm; and if I should indulge in a little of that in my reply to him I think it ought to be excusable under the circumstances.

Mr. Winter seems to think I am a Spiritualist, but I am not of the kind he thinks, for the Spiritualists phenomenal cannot fellowship me. I am not conscious of ever having had any communication whatever with spirits out of the body, as Spiritual ists claim to hav. I will not attempt to reply in full to that tirade, for it would only be a waste of time, and would do no good. There has not been a solitary argument advanced to reply to. My proposition stands unanswered, That if material organization or evolution is the cause of all things, then all things are the result of that cause. That proves itself. That is all there is of it. It is all in a nutshell. Any child of ordinary intellect, with a small amount of brains, can understand that; and if Mr. Winter's brains are not in good working order enough to comprehend that, he had better get them repaired before he ventures to criticise subjects beyond his capacity to understand.

Mr. Winter says that speculativ folly about an undying existence is all moonshine and the source of every pious swindle. I would reply that if his theory of Materialism is true and the cause of all things, then every pious swindle is the result of that, for there can be no other cause, and so on through the whole catalog.

Mr. Winter says all statements without proof are worthless. That is just what I claim. Now let him prove his statement that no mental power can possibly exist distinct from a living, healthy brain, which he says I know well enough. I know nothing of the kind. If he does, let him giv his proof. I defy him to prove his statement.

I will not stoop to make any other reply to his sarcasm about Spiritualist folks living as well without brains as with than to say that such nonsense is unworthy of a reply.

Mr. Winter says, "Go ahead, ye Spiritualistic cranks, and show up a grand circus of disembodied spooks," etc., and seems to be very much excited, as if he had found a veritable mare's-nest. Now all I hav to say about the spook business is that I know nothing about spooks. I only know that, if his theory of Materialism is true and the cause of all things, then all of these false theories and shams, as he calls them, are the offsprings of that theory, and I trot them all out for his inspection, to see whether he will acknowledge the "corn." A man over seventy years old ought to know enough to know his own children when he sees them, and here they are, of all grades and sizes—all that ever hav been from the year one down to this time, including Old Nero with his fiddle, the goose that cackled and saved a city, and every theory and humbug that has ever existed; they are all the result, the offspring, of Materialism, if that is true, for there can be no other cause if that is the only cause.

Mr. Winter seems to be in about the same fix the old lady was in who did not wish to lend her washtub to a neighbor who wanted it. She said she hadn't got none, that the bottom was knocked out, and she wanted to use it herself. That is about what his tirade amounts to. I shall pay no more attention to Mr. Winter until he can present some argument worth noticing.

In regard to Ella E. Gibson's criticism, I will say that I admit the correctness of the criticism in reference to misapplied gender, and in part as to the personality of a supreme intelligence, and realize the difficulty of expressing our ideas of a great (I will not say first cause, but eternal) cause without endowing such an existence with the characteristic of person if not of gender. But it strikes me that the word it would be more objectionable than the male or female characteristic. The prefix it seems to me too insignificant when applied to the Great Supreme Intelligence of the universe. The very thought of such a being overwhelms us with the ideal of an ineffable majesty that makes the word it seem to be entirely out of place in such a position. We must hav some words to express our ideas, and if I hav failed in selecting the most appropriate in which to express my thoughts, I hav no fears that the Almighty will be annihilated in consequence any sooner than if a Materialist had said that no such being existed at all.

If I ever attempt again to write on any subject that involves these points for criticism, I will try and use such terms as will not mar the harmony of the universe.

JAMES HALE.

Thoughts by the Way.

The infinit exists within the limits of matter and motion, but above the plane of all sentient ideas. We are sympathetically but not intellectually associated with the infinit, and the endeavor to intellectualize what is only sympathetic has given rise to all the crudities the world has ever entertained respecting the character and attributes of the infinit.

Jesus Christ placed no pecuniary value upon his invaluable communications, but, with a soul broad as humanity's wants, taught without money and without price, and urged upon the listening multitude to emulate his example, and as they hav freely received to freely giv.

If a man is weak enough to believe in the Trinity, in vicarious atonement, and in eternal damnation, he is too weak to resist temptation, and therefore should not be trusted.

Theology has reached the lowest possible point of human degradation when beings formed in the image of God can be made to believe that infinit justice requires eternal pain.

The Old Testament is principally a catalog of the crimes and cruelties of the Jewish nation, and as such is as worthy the name of a revelation from God as the story "Cyclopean Giants" would be of a place in the archives of heaven.

Priest or minister: A concentration of theological errors, which he reflects upon his congregation.

Ultima thule, or the duty of man: Let every sentence you utter be worthy of remembrance; let every action of your life be worthy of imitation.

Keystone of Monopoly.

Can grain be made into flour without the use of millstones? We will suppose it cannot, anyhow. If it should happen that the millers own the means of making millstones we might be in a bad predicament, for they would charge as they saw fit for grinding. The price of grinding added to the price of the wheat would make bread dear. Bread being the staff of life, and necessarily used by everybody, and being so increased in cost, would hav its influence on every business of life. In some way or other, by reducing wages and enhancing prices, it would make life harder to the many. The power of money would be increased—a power ever hostil to the poor. All this would happen unless millstones could be imported from abroad in such quantities that the millers could not buy them all up and destroy them, as of late monopolists hav done with potatoes, coffee, and quinine. But if our government had made a law to tax everyone who sought to introduce millstones as though he were an enemy, and to tax him so high as to prohibit or restrict him from so doing, this tax, called a tariff, would protect the millers. This would be what is called "protecting the American industry against foreign imports." Those opposed to such a law would be called as "bribed with British gold by the Cobden Club." If any person or persons should attempt to make millstones they would hav their trouble for their pay, as the millers would never patronize them. It might happen that the millers would in time care nothing for their mills and look only to their profits in the millstone production. How long would a free people tolerate such a monstrous monopoly?

Is not this precisely the same monopoly as that which the railroad rings of this country enjoy? Controling all the great lines of the road, they had only to secure a monopoly in the business of furnishing the material for building and running railways to be masters of the situation. Accordingly they procured the enactment by Congress of a law to restrict the importation of all such materials under a penalty of twenty-eight dollars per ton. Canadians may build railways at a cost of twenty-eight dollars per ton for rails, more or less, but our roads are laid at a cost of fifty-six to sixty dollars per ton, every cent of which extra cost goes to the great stock and bondholders of the roads. They run all the rail-mills and factories. Let a competing company try to build a line. Why should it do so? It must pay to these monopolists their price, or import at the same price. Shall it make its own material? That is all it can do. It cannot sell to its rivals. Nothing but mighty combinations can succeed here. Just imagin one railway company setting itself up in opposition to the combination, refusing to pool, making its own rails, going alone in all respects. It would be crushed out or bought out very soon. No! The combinations are too mighty to withstand. Like the supposed case of the millers, they hav a monopoly of the manufacture and of the consumption of material essential for the public use. But for such tariff the monopoly could not exist another day. Repeal it, and cheaper material will flow in, cheaper roads be built all over the continent. HOLT.

Letters from Friends.

BOUNERSBURG, O., Sept. 28, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $11 for two years' subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $5 for the trip round the world. Truly yours, C. HULL.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I intend to keep upon your list as a subscriber as long as your paper is as good as it has been for the last four or five years. Will be up to see you as soon as business allows.

Yours truly, R. H. CRESSINGHAM.

BERRIEN SPRINGS, MICH., Sept. 29, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3 on subscription of Harlow S. Vinton. He is a hard-working man, and a true Liberal. He says your paper is a noble one, and fills the bill exactly; and that you may rely upon it that he will resubscribe just as soon as he feels able. Yours, WORTHY PUTNAM.

ARLAND, MICH., Sept. 27, 282.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for the fourth volume, including postage on the whole round-the-world books. And if you make the tour of the United States, which is talked of (which, I think, ought to include South America, going on one side of the mountains and returning on the other), you may put me down as a subscriber. Yours truly,

FRANKLIN ELMER.

HARRISBURG, PA., Oct. 4, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find check for $40, $3 for my yearly subscription, $35 for seven copies of the round-the-world books, and $2 for tracts. We hav no Liberal League in Harrisburg. We were crowded out by Christian influence. We had a balance of $37, and we all agreed to buy your "A Truth Seeker Round the World." In hopes you may enjoy good health and liv many years to come, I sign myself Your devoted friend, JACOB TAUSIG.

HAMILTON, ONT., Sept. 26, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: The time has arrived when the money for the fourth volume of your travels should begin to flow into your hands, and I sincerely trust your friends will come down with the cash at once; also pay for the postage on the volumes. Herewith please find inclosed $2 for the fourth volume when ready, and postage on the same. I am pleased to inform you that the seed of the China pink grew beautifully, and is now in full bloom. The other packages failed to germinate. With best wishes, I remain, Yours truly, GEORGE MADDOCKS.

IRWIN STATION, PA., Sept. 30, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Though a stranger to me, you hav been a friend. Your visit around this world of ours, and cathedrals, churches, fine palaces, and many other places of interest is ended, and we are happy to see you at your post once more to keep the wheel of liberty going. Your letters hav been very interesting, and much enjoyed by me and other friends.

I received the first two volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," and I am more than pleased with them. Please find inclosed $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. MOSES JONES.

MARKHAM, VA., Oct. 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, for which please renew my subscription to that wicked paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am the only patron you hav in this place. I enjoy all the reading to myself; even the "sinners" will hardly read it. My Christian friends think it is a horrible paper. They say the devil will get both of us—you for publishing the paper, and me for reading it. Friend Bennett, if you think it will be any benefit to help make you a Christian I will think of you in my prayers. Hoping there is prosperity and long life in store for you, I am, Truly yours, ALFRED VAUGHAN.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Oct. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find post-office order for $2.50, which will carry my subscription and that of James Garrett up to the 1st of January, 1883.

I think you can count on us both as life-long subscribers, or patrons; and if at any time we fail to remit for paper promptly, don't, for "Christ's sake," stop the paper.

I am so glad to know that the Rev. Mr. Clark, of our city, respected an Infidel sufficiently to admit of his associating with you as room-mate. I am very glad you were instrumental in obtaining for him better accommodations. I believe he will sincerely appreciate you kindness. With best wishes, HEALDSBURG, CAL., Sept. 24, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: There is a Methodist Episcopal church (South) camp-meeting in full blast within about a mile of my house, and I hav been there and witnessed several performances. There was some grand and lofty tumbling last night that amused the most of the congregation greatly, so much so that they laughed right out in meeting. It is very wicked, of course, to laugh when we see anything funny, but it seems to be extremely natural. I hav been branded by the priests as the worst boy in all this region. They say I hav poisoned the minds of all the youths in the neighborhood against the Bible. Well, they do hav a hard time of it making converts, but I didn't suppose I was the stumbling-block, for I hav never preached any. Well, I expect they must giv somebody hell, so let them pile on the bark; I am able to stand it. D. W. BRADFORD.

BOZEMAN, MONTANA, Sept. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: That you may know all true prophets are not dead yet, I wish to make a little prophecy "on the side," which is this: I predict that inside of five years the church will claim R. G. Ingersoll to be a product of the Christian religion, and a true exponent of its doctrins. I claim no inspiration from above. It is all from below. I predict this prophecy on what we all know of the beastliness and dishonesty of the church in claiming every man after his death whose theories or teachings hav become popular. Ingersoll's sentiments are growing too rapidly in popularity, are too grand; he is too eloquent an exponent, and he is too young a man for them to wait till after his death. Therefore, the church, always having an abundance of cheek, sufficient to do anything, and having enough left to cover a multitude of sins, will never withstand the temptation. It will try to kidnap Bob while yet alive. He should be warned of his impending danger. So sayeth the Lord! THOS. BURK.

CASEY, IA., Oct. 1, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3.50, for which please send my bible and prayer-book, THE TRUTH SEEKER; for the 50 cents please send the latest edition of "Crimes of Preachers," and also your travels through the Holy Land with Melchisedec.

I hav received two volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World." They are full of interesting accounts of things that thousands of people would never know or even dream of had you not made the voyage around our globe. Time and again did I think of you when you were in what is called heathen lands, and also I had some fears that Jesus Christ might fix some kind of a snare for you to get tangled in. But may the powers of nature be praised that you came home all right to battle for a score or more years for Freethought, which one would almost say a blind man ought to see is a taking the front seat. I wish we could hav one good Infidel lecture in our town. Yours for the right to the end,

J. W. HAGER.

HOULTON, ME., Oct. 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith find $3 to pay for the next year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER

I notice that there is considerable cheap talk over the subject of Spiritualism. I would like to know why it is necessary for the Atheists to keep banging away at any other class of Liberals who are willing to work with them to bring about the important reforms claimed by all Liberals. The Spiritualist does not ask the Atheist to be a Spiritualist until he has sufficient evidence to convince him of its truth.

I, for one, hav, or think I hav, that evidence, and I don't intend to be laughed out of it. And while Mr. White indorses Mr. Winter, I take the liberty to indorse Mr. Perry.

I think it desirable to keep to the question, and all pull together until the great object for which we are striving is accomplished; and then, if we cannot find better employment, and feel like it, we can tear each other's bonnets just a little. A. P. HEYWOOD.

DENVER, COL., Sept. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I find I am behind some four months or more on this year's paper. So I herewith inclose you the amount ($3), which please place to my delinquent credit.

I came to this country some months since to make a temporary sojourn, and in the multiplicity of business neglected to send it sooner, but hope it is better late than never. It would hav been a great pleasure to hav taken you by the hand and welcomed you home from the trip around the world. But circumstances, somewhat inexorable, prevented me from enjoying such pleasure, and saved you from the pain of what might hav been too severe a pressure for comfort. So what has been my loss has been your gain.

I hav not seen a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for some time, and sincerely hope that in the absence of its salutary teachings and missionary labors I may not be left to drift into the great Christian maelstrom, in whose turbid waters lurks many a hungry whale ever ready to swallow up any poor unfortunate Jonah who may happen to be thrown in reach of their insatiable maws. W. K. BOOTH.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Sept. 22, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to tell you an item or two of some movements that are happening hereabouts, and are somewhat interesting to us here who are working in the interest of separation of church and state. As you are aware, we hav the commissioners here to attend to the requirements of the "Edmund's bill." Well, as a consequence, our League has been called to usefulness, and Hector W. Haight, the president of our League, was appointed, and has been acting as chief registering officer for the county, and myself, for Farmington, and Michael Pilling, for Kaysville City, hav been acting as deputy registering officers. So much for our League. And now, in accordance with the "Hoar amendment," Hector W. Haight has been appointed by the governor of the territory as judge of the probate court of this (Davis) county, and myself selectman for same county. I expect we will hav an interesting time getting in, as the other side will do their best to evade giving up the offices. The leading law firms of Salt Lake City are retained on both sides to try the issue. I expect others of our League will be called on to act during the November election. To us these are signs of a coming day. So mote it be!

Fraternally yours, WALTER WALKER.

BEAVER DAM, WIS., Oct. 3, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: It is hardly necessary for me to say that I am glad you hav returned from your journey and got back home right side up with care. While orthodoxy and bigots hav been praying that the deep sea might engulf you, or the pestilence that walketh in darkness may overtake you, we are glad to know that these prayers hav not been heard, but, like the prayers offered up for Garfield, all hav been in vain. Common sense men, and men who dare think for themselvs, hav hoped that you would accomplish the work your patrons laid out for you, and that you would return safe, and we hav not been disappointed. You hav more than filled our expectations. Your letters hav been all that we could wish, and the two volumes of your travels already received are much better than I could ask. We are thankful that Joe Cook and Comstock hav not had it in their power to annihilate you, and we hope there are many years of usefulness yet before you. I herewith send you $5—$3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, 25 cents for the "Crimes of Preachers," by Col. M. E. Billings, and the balance for the fourth volume of travels. The three pictures I got of you—Bennett, Ingersoll, and Paine—are hanging in three large frames in my parlor. They are just splendid.

Yours truly, H. E. DAVIS.

BARRE, MASS., Sept. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Among so many I cannot imagin that you hav missed my congratulations, but would fain send them along with the rest, if it is not too late in the day to be acceptable. I need not tell you how interested I hav been in your letters, or how much I prize the two volumes of "A Truth Seeker Around the World," for you must be aware of that fact. You hav great reason to be proud of your friends, and pleased with your success. More I cannot say at present, so please accept my mite for what it is worth in the market of good wishes and honest purposes.

In reply to Wineford V. Aspinwall versus Mr. Winter and his article upon James Hale (see THE TRUTH SEEKER, the 16th and 30th ult), permit me to remark I think he and others fell into the same mistake I did, that Mr. Winter accused those who did not agree with him as devoid of brains. He states "no mental power can possibly exist distinct from a living, healthy brain," and ridicules the idea of "Spiritualistic folks" living without brains. I think Mr. Winter means Spiritualists claim the mentality of "folks" exists after death without bodies, including loss of brains; and, in a jocose way, he inquires why such believers do not "get their brains scooped out" and liv here without brains the same as over there. If I am not correct, let Mr. Winter rise and explain. I cannot justify his tirade minus argument, of which he is more or less guilty, for I hate slang as much as Mrs. Aspinwall, or any one else, but want justice done him. And should you, Mr. Editor, see fit to publish Mr. Hale's reply to him and myself, I will esteem it a great favor and a privilege to explain further, ELLA E. GIBSON.

LOOKINGGLASS, OR., Sept. 25, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you $7.25 to be credited as directed. We extend to you our congratulations upon your arrival home, and also to friend Macdonald for the able manner in which the paper has been conducted in your absence. If you should conclude to make the tour of our own country we will expect you to visit Oregon, where you would meet with a hearty welcome.

I hav read friend Rountree's letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 2d, in which he thinks Deist and Atheist alike dogmatic, for either affirming or denying the existence of God. According to friend Rountree's logic, Paine, for asserting his belief in a universal first cause, which he says we call God, was dogmatic. Now, if our friend does not believe this he will probably deny it. In this case he belongs to that ultra class of Atheists of whom he speaks. I confess that I hardly know where to place our friend, but hope he belongs to that intelligent class of Atheists who do not deny in a positiv manner the existence of God, but only say they hav no knowledge of any. I hope some one competent to the task will reply more fully to our Liberal friend and enlighten him a little if they can, and at the same time put the same pertinent question to him that he does to others, i. e., "What do you know about it?"

Respectfully, F. WARD.

CEDAR SPRINGS, MICH., Oct. 2, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I am a new recruit in the ranks, being one of your trial subscribers, but will become permanent as soon as my time expires. The truth is spreading very fast even in this stronghold of orthodoxy, where a Liberal or Spiritualist cannot even hire a hall. Rays of light from that central luminary, THE TRUTH SEEKER, are gradually permeating the darkness. In proof of this I send you herewith a new subscriber, a young man, the son of one of our best ministers. It was handed in voluntarily, too. The minister himself is so intelligent and well educated that he does not fear to hav his children read both sides, evidently believing that if his religion cannot stand the test of investigation and science it is not worth having. Would that all our ministers were as Liberal.

A word to our friends, the truth seekers. Do not quarrel over the questions of spirit and matter. We who believe in a future existence simply because we hav seen undoubted proofs of it must not expect others who hav not had such proofs to believe.

The challenge to T. Winter by Sister Colby, in the last TRUTH SEEKER is simply amusing. The idea of asking any one to prove a negativ! It is like an orthodox friend's challenge to me last week, viz., "Prove, if you can, that God did not make this world." No, friends; the proof must come from our side of the house on this great question, and when we consider the fact that thousands of humbugs hav masqueraded under our banner, we cannot wonder that such minds as Winter's and Elmina's reject it.

Yours truly, TRUTH WANTER.

NEWPORT, ME., Sept. 27, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: Why you print Otto Wetstein's communications I do not know. If death is an eternal sleep, in the name of all that is just and right never print another paper. If this life, with its poverty, starvation, injustice, lying, cheating, stealing, crime, and indescribable misery is all, a man is more than insane to attempt to reform it. The time is worse than wasted. Of all the cold, chilling, desolating doctrins that ever startled mankind, Infidelity or "death ends all," is the most chilling and terrible. This life all! If that is true, there is absolutely nothing to liv for. A philosophy that has no music in it is not worth one moment's notice. There is no music in Infidelity, for there is nothing to make it out of. If this life is all there is for us, compensation is a mockery. If Infidelity is true, there is not a particle of incentiv to do one good deed. A few short years of starvation and misery and then go to eternal sleep. That is Infidelity. There is more beauty, sunshine, hope, joy, and gladness in one short hour of Spiritualism than in a whole eternity of cold, blank Infidelity.

Bro. Bennett, if Infidelity is true, if this life is all, why spend your precious time in trying to better this world? It is worse than a waste of time. For thirty-five years I hav labored ceaselessly night and day, without money and without price, to try to help make a better world, because I felt that the better people were here the happier they would be in the Spiritual world. But could I be made to know that "death ends all," I would stop immediately.

Your indescribably grand letters from abroad show more clearly the necessity for some other place for happiness for the poor, starved creatures you speak of, for surely they hav none here.

Your friend, SEWARD MITCHELL.

"THE BRIGHT SIDE."

MRS. SLENKER: Your comforting suggestions to "lonely Liberals" in last week's TRUTH SEEKER hav prompted me to rise and speak.

I am a Liberal, but not lonely, for I think I hav philosophical reasons for believing in a glorious destiny for the human race, and a grander meaning in the processes of the universe than that of a ceaseless rush of blind forces, propelling senseless matter "through Time's rough billows into Night's abyss." If I believed that this world comprised the whole term of man's existence, I should be lonely indeed, for what is this fleeting life to the mind that can conceive of eternity?

You say that we ought to be very thankful and happy because we "hav learned that the universe is governed by law," and that we can make these laws our servants and helpers," but does not this very knowledge increase our desires to liv on?

Does the knowledge of the fact that we can control matter make us willing to be blotted out? And because we no longer suffer torment through fear of hell, ought we to welcome annihilation?

"If we hav lost hope of a future life, was it a real loss?" Yes, Elmina; it was a real loss.

Whether there is a future state or not, the hope, the expectation of immortality, is the grand stimulus which moves all the machinery of the world. It is the soldier's heroism, the patriot's inspiration, the student's incentiv, the courage of the toiler, the solace of love and sorrow. It is this dream of a hereafter which thrills the pulses of the world with energy and joy.

There is no greater mistake than the proposition so often urged by Materialists that a belief in a future existence is detrimental to a proper discharge of the duties of this; that it tends to impede progress by diverting the mind from present realities to visionary speculations.

Man's nature is manifold, and it is for his advancement that every faculty should find scope. The poetic sentiment in man is the spiritual, it is the reaching out after the unseen, and it must be fed and nourished or the symmetry of the mind is destroyed. Can it subsist on the dry husks of Materialism? What is a glorious sunset or a beautiful landscape to one who believes only in unconscious matter and blind force? What is a high-wrought work of art to one who thinks the artist has no soul? What is the light of love in human eyes—in the eyes most dear to him who sees only dust and ashes in the form of his beloved? What is all the glory and grandeur of nature, the rolling waters, the towering mountains, the star-lit sky, if there is no illuminating spirit behind or within all this pageantry?

No, Elmina, there is no poetry in Materialism. It leaves one part of our nature starving, and therefore it cannot be true. It is withering to all the finer feelings of the soul, therefore it is not adapted to man's development. It takes away the strongest incentiv to human endeavor, therefore it will not aid progression.

I am not aiming in this short article to argue the question of immortality, but only wish to insist on the utility of believing in it. No matter through what struggles of war and carnage this faith may hav led mankind in darker ages, the Reign of Terror in the French Revolution had its rise in man's faith in Republicanism—the Inquisition in man's faith in God; the horrors of both prove nothing against God or against Republicanism. The world will yet be one great republic, and all humanity will some day recognize the presence of the divine in nature.

Yours truly, MRS. E. HEDDON.

DESMOINES, IOWA, Oct. 7, 1882.

MR. EDITOR: I had a strong dssire to accompany you in your journeyings, but adverse circumstances preventing such indulgence, I enjoy myself very much while reading your plain, straightforward descriptions of the men, places, things, and conditions that attracted your attention. You must hav kept a keen eye on passing events to secure such an amount of interesting matter. For many years I hav been nursing a desire to at some future time make about such a journey as you hav just completed, seeing broad seas, towering mountains, and laminated plains; works that man has wrought, what man is doing, and what there is yet for man to do. Of these your descriptions are so connected and full that, for my part, I feel satisfied to stay at home and ramble in your books describing these; and I am fully persuaded that any one who desires to take a trip around the world in a book cannot do better than to subscribe for "A Truth Seeker Around the World."

Yours truly, A. CLEGG.

Reply to Mr. Whitehead.

(Concluded from page 649.)

rel about things doubtful and about authors; while we contend in parties, there is almost none that is Christ's. We decree every year of the Lord a new creed concerning God; nay, every change of the moon our faith is altered.

Such were the men and such the councils which took it upon themselvs to decide for the world which anonymous writings of their time were inspired by God, and what the creed of the church must be. Such are the men to whom we are indebted for Christianity. It will be seen at once how poor the authority upon which the New Testament and the Christian religion rests, and what a large swallowing capacity a credulous soul must hav who can "gulp" it all down and swear it is divine.

Much more can be said in the same direction, but these remarks must be brought to a close. We hav endeavored to establish the following propositions:

1. That the foundation of Judaism and Christianity is a fable.

2. That the fable is anonymous and was not written by Moses.

3. That the chronology of the Bible regarding the age of the world is wholly wrong.

4. That the narrativ of the fable is utterly at variance with truth and science.

5. That there is no valid authority for the Old Testament canon, that there is no reason for believing it inspired, or that it was written by the persons and at the periods claimed.

6. That matter in all its forms is eternal, and never was made from nothing, and hence that the story of creation is absurd and all supernaturalism entirely false.

7. That nature is grander, truer, and more to be adored than all the gods and devils superstitious and ignorant man has devised.

8. That the New Testament is as unauthentic and unreliable as the Old, and that there is no historical confirmation that such a person as Jesus lived, especially the Jesus of the gospels. If he did liv, he was no diviner than other folks.

9. That the principal dogma of the Christian religion has only a dream to rest upon, and that dream told by a forger who knew not the first thing about the dream nor the dreamer.

10. That the four gospels of the New Testament were unknown till the latter part of the second century, and that their authors were likewise unknown.

11. That the authors of Acts, six of the epistles ascribed to Paul, two to Peter, one each to James and Jude, as well as of Revelation, are unknown.

12. That the fathers who decided upon the merits of the New Testament books, and the doctrin of the church, were ignorant, superstitious, and dishonest, and clearly unfit to found a religion of truth.

13. That the claims of divinity for man to believe in as regards the New Testament and Christianity fall prostrate to the earth.

14. That the truths of Liberalism and science are infinitly superior for the human family to the sophistries, pretensions, superstitions, inaccuracies, and falsehoods of Christianity.

15. The final conclusion is that sensible men and women should discard all books and wily priests who teach absurdities and lies, and turn for knowledge to the great volume of nature, which never uses hypocrisy, never lies.

Shall we hear further from Mr. Whitehead?

Moving Is in Order.

We notice in the last National Reformer that it and the Freethought Publishing Company are about moving from their old quarters in Stonecutter street, London, to 63 Fleet street, the very locality once occupied by that brave Freethought publisher and advocate, Richard Carlile.

Here is seen a slight coincidence, for within the next week THE TRUTH SEEKER is to move from its old quarters to 21 Clinton Place, a short distance west of Broadway, and on really the same street which for over six years has been its home.

We are forced to this, because in our present quarters we hav too little room. It will be remembered that Bro. W. F. Jamieson, in writing of THE TRUTH SEEKER office, once said it is "a little larger than a dry-goods box." But as small as it is, for it and two other rooms, one on the second floor and one on the third, the heavy rent of seventy dollars per month has been paid; so much does it cost to stay here in New York.

In our new home we will not hav lower rent, but more and better room, and at the same time we shall be one story nearer the ground. We will hav much more room for keeping books, and propose to carry a much larger stock, including not only Freethought, Spiritualistic, scientific, and philosophic works, but a general assortment of standard and miscellaneous books. We hope to be able to sell our friends all the books they want; that they will want lots of them, and that we will hav the pleasure of filling many orders.

Our address will be 21 Clinton Place. All our friends are invited to call and see us when they come to the city.

Mr. Charles Watts,

Freethought lecturer, editor and publisher of the Secular Review, London, has just arrived in New York by the Inman line, and has made us a call, reporting himself in good health, having had a pleasant voyage over the Atlantic, and now ready for the lecturing season which is before him in this country. He is a good speaker, and should be kept steadily employed. His accomplished wife accompanied him. We wish them both a pleasant and profitable sojourn in our country. Communications for Mr. Watts may be addressed in our care.

The National Liberal League Congress,

Held at St. Louis on September 29th, 30th, and October 1st, will be found fully reported in these columns, and we bespeak for the account a careful reading. It is a cause for congratulation that the Congress was so successful and that it passed off so pleasantly.

Our Eugene

Is just now unusually proud and happy. His wife, on the evening of the 6th inst., presented him with a second son. Mother and child are doing well. The prospect for a growing crop of young Liberals seems indeed very good. Thus may it ever be!

Mrs. J. W. Fletcher,

Who was sent to prison in London by Christian influence, is engaged to speak during the month of October to the Spiritualists, at Frobisher Hall, 23 East Fourteenth street. We heard her last Sunday evening and were much pleased. Her subject was, "Has Hell any Terrors for an Honest Man?"

A Boy! A Boy!

BY ETHEL ETHERTON.

Now the bounding pulse beats swift and strong,
And sparkles the eye with joy,
While the breath comes laden with the glad song
Of the heart—a boy! a boy!

'Tis a glorious thing to be a boy
In the battle-field of life,
Where sorrow sips at the board with joy
And peace is purchased with strife;

Where strength of sinew, of bone, and brain
Is needed at every turn;
Where truth sits weeping beside her slain
And the lamps of error burn;

Where the field is ready for the plow,
The harvest the keen-edged knife,
The desk awaiting the stainless brow,
The dying the bread of life.

'Tis a glorious thing to be a boy,
Imbued with the thought "I can,"
With the godlike possibilities
Foretold of "the coming man;"

To make of iron and polished steel
Nerve, muscle, almost brain,
To be the creatures of thy will Alike on land and main;

To tear from bigots' darkened brows
The sin-wrought plats of storm,
And where weak superstition bows
Rear knowledge's potent form;

To shield the weak, to nerve the brave,
To lead truth's armies on;
To see her fadeless banners wave
When victory is won.

'Tis a godlike thing to be a boy!
March in progression's van,
In this, the nineteenth century—
All hail! The coming man!

"U. M. L."

Could half the joy a mind enfranchised brings
Be told in numbers that to it belong,
The world would say, "A poet 'tis that sings
Whose wayward fancy hath inspired his song!"
Too early still the day, too late the dawn,
For all mankind to yet behold the light
That shines on those who know of coming morn,
And greet its glow from freedom's lofty hight.
But time may come—when dust of ours shall lie
Mute as our papers, yellowed with their age—
When those to-day who plainest truths deny
The present poet will esteem a sage.
His worth shall liv upon the lips of fame,
And grateful praises consecrate his name.

My "Confession of Faith."

BY A. W. L.

I don't believe in Adam's fall,
That we are totally depraved,
That Eve first ate an apple,
Then coaxed Adam till he caved.
I don't believe in gods and myths,
Ghosts, devils, priests, nor shams,
That three are one and one is three;
And don't believe God's lambs
Are better than some human folks
I've read of. Some I've seen
Were worthy to be lords and kings,
Some women fit for queens.
I don't believe a hundred things
I've heard preached all my days,
About the one who made this world,
And his mysterious ways.
They tell us God made all that is;
Then who made God? pray tell.
If self-existent, then why not
The universe as well?

An Apparently Fair Proposition.

To the Spiritualists of America:

As numerous articles hav appeared in Spiritualistic and Liberal papers regarding the Slade exposure, which took place in this city on July 6th, and as some doubt the truth of it; others say that Henry Slade can never expect fair treatment on British ground, and others insinuate that Slade is ready to meet us in the United States, we feel called upon to make the following offer: We will send a committee to any place convenient to Canada, as Buffalo, Detroit, New York, Oswego, or Rochester, provided that Henry Slade or his friends first deposit one hundred dollars in some reliable person's hands, to cover our expenses in case Slade fails to appear. If Slade is unable to produce phenomena, when the conditions for fraud are unfavorable, it ought to convince even the most credulous his admirers of his falsity and trickery.

Hoping to hav this challenge accepted, and to meet the "doctor" again, we remain, Yours, etc.,

Men of the Hour.

GROVER CLEVELAND,

NOMINATED FOR GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

The gentleman nominated at the recent Democratic convention held in Syracuse, N. Y., for the first position on the ticket, is a nativ of Caldwell, Essex county, N. J., and was born March 18, 1837. His father was a minister. After receiving such instruction as was procurable from the common school in various places of the parental residence, young Cleveland was sent to the academy at Clinton, Oneida county, N. Y. Upon leaving this seat of learning he went to New York city, where he filled for some time the position of clerk in an institution of charity. He is next heard of making his way West, in company with an enterprising young man, with Cleveland, O., as his objectiv point; but visiting, while on the way, an uncle residing in Buffalo, he was induced to remain in that city as clerk in the store of his relative. He was eighteen years of age at the time, an ambitious young man, possessed of an earnest desire to become a successful lawyer. His uncle favored this aspiration, and we soon find the youth a clerk in the office of a prominent law firm, and at the same time enjoying the comforts of a good home at his uncle's house. He was admitted to the bar in 1859. His first political office was that of assistant district attorney for the county of Erie under C. C. Torrance. He held the position three years, until the end of his superior's term of office, when he was nominated for district attorney on the Democratic ticket, but was defeated. In 1870, five years after this failure, he was elected sheriff of Erie county, and in November, 1881, was elected mayor of Buffalo by a decisiv majority. His incumbency of the office is successful and popular. We are not informed as to Mr. Cleveland's religious convictions, but we understand that he is a man of Liberal views. He is a bachelor.

How Mr. Blank Was Converted.

A FACT.

A.: Good morning Bro. Blank. Going to the meeting to-night?

Mr. B.: No, guess not.

Mr. A.: Well, I guess you had better come to see the new minister. Ah, he is such a good preacher!

Mr. B.: Not to night.

Mr. A.: Well, will you come on Thursday night?

Mr. B.: If I am well, I may go to hear him.

Mr. A.: Very well, I'll call for you; don't forget. Well, good-night.

Mr. B.: Good-night.

Mr. A. goes to the meeting. The minister announces that on Thursday night he will convert every sinner in town that will come.

Mr. A.: Well, I see you are all ready.

Mr. B.: Yes, all ready.

Mr. A. and B. walk arm-in-arm to the meeting. Mr. A. feels very proud, for he has captured a sinner and is bringing him into the fold.

Bro. D. tells his experiences, what a bad man he had been; but now, since he has been converted, and believes in the little word Jesus, he is saved. So do Messrs. C. and F. and S., and so on.

Mr. A. givs his experience, what a bad man and sinner he had been, how he had cheated and deceived his neighbors all his life; but since he has become a Christian, thank God, and believed in Jesus, he is saved.

Minister: Let us hear from the other gentleman on your right.

Mr. B.: My dear friends, as for myself, I hav nothing to say, but as to Mr. A. here, I bear ample testimony to what he has said this evening is true.

Mr. A. Springs to his feet, shakes his fist in Bro. B.'s face, and says, "You're a liar and a scoundrel, and if you come outside I'll lick you."

Mr. A. has not invited Mr. B. to the meeting since. C. K.

The Freethinkers' Association.

MR. EDITOR: I intend to spend nearly all my time the coming winter perfecting the organization of the New York State Freethinkers' Association. As has been suggested, I would like to see such an organization in every state in the Union, also in Canada; but so long as this is the only one in existence I am in favor of asking everybody to join it who is willing to be known by the name of Freethinker. I hav just sent the following communication to each of the vice presidents of the association. Will you giv it a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER?

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Oct. 5, 282.

DEAR SIR: At the annual meeting of the above-named association, held in Watkins, Aug. 23d, you were duly elected vice president for your county.

The "Articles of Association" of this society provide that "the vice president of each county shall immediately after his election appoint two other persons in the county to act with him, and the three shall be the Freethought and Liberal League Committee of the county, the vice president to be the chairman, and it shall be his duty to notify the corresponding secretary of this association who his associates are when they are appointed.

I hav decided, as secretary of the association, to devote nearly all my time for the next year in perfecting this organization, and I desire your earnest co-operation.

1st. Are you willing to accept of the position to which you hav been elected? If not, will you so indicate to me and name some live, activ Freethinker to take your place? If you accept the office, then please appoint your two associates at once, and send me the name and post-office address of each.

2d. And as soon as the county committees are thus organized, I propose that the first work we engage in be to get all the Liberals in each county who are willing to be publicly known as Freethinkers to join the association. And I would suggest that each county committee appoint one person in each election district to solicit memberships. Printed circulars like the one inclosed will be provided by me on application.

3. About November 1st I shall publish a "Freethinkers' Directory," containing the names of all members procured up to that time, and other editions of the same thereafter from time to time. When we get their names all before us we will be in condition to engage in practical work. 1. We can then make an efficient effort to get each member of the Association to subscribe for some Liberal journal. 2. We can mail to each circulars and documents showing the importance of organization. 3. We shall know who to call upon to giv the cause material aid when desired. 4. We shall be in condition to make a united and vigorous effort this winter for the taxation of church property. 5. We shall know our own strength and be in a position to use it in various ways for the advancement of Liberal ideas and humanitarian work.)

4. And before our next annual meeting we must hav at least one activ Liberal League in each county and be able to send a delegation from each county of not less than fifteen delegates to our Freethinkers' Annual Convention. And so soon as we can get organized in each county we must agitate the subject of building Liberal halls wherever it is possible to do so. In most places it costs about as much to hire a hall for a Liberal lecture as it does to pay the lecturer. But if we had one good Liberal hall in each county, what an advantage it would be to our lecture system (when we hav one)! Then a lecturer could start at one end of the state and lecture forty or fifty times while passing through it; and as it would not cost so great a sum for railroad fare, he or she could afford to lecture much cheaper than at present.

5. Now if every Liberal in the state will immediately join the Freethinkers' Association and pay the small membership fee of twenty-five cents, and as many as can subscribe for the "Freethinkers' Directory," price thirty cents, these receipts will pay all necessary disbursements for the coming year. We made a grand advance this year at Watkins Glen. Let us keep the ball rolling during the year, and our next annual convention at Saratoga, or wherever it may be held, will astonish the world. H. L. GREEN, Cor. Sec.

Salamanca, N. Y.

P. S.—If you will send me the name of one activ Freethinker from each election district of your county I will mail him circulars. H. L. G.

Anyone who is sufficiently liberal and progressiv to search for the truth, and has a mind capable of being convinced by the demonstration of truth, has only to read the evidence we offer and be convinced that no method ever before employed has been so successful in conquering disease as the application of magnetism on the Wilsonia principle. The array of testimonials we hav from well-known former sufferers who are now released from the slavery of disease to the enjoyment of life and vigorous health is an interesting study and full of hope to afflicted humanity. National Convention of Spiritualists

At Detroit, Mich., in Royal Templar's Hall, corner of Woodward and Grand River avenues, on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, Oct. 27, 28, and 29, 1882. This convention is for the purpose of discussing the feasibility of organization among Spiritualists upon a rational, scientific, philosophical, and moral basis. Many hundreds hav indorsed this call, and it is hoped each devoted true spiritualist will either be present or send communications, or at least their name and address, as in sympathy with this movement. Among a few of the many who hav signified their intention of being present if possible, are Maria W. King, A. J. King, Dr. J. M. Peebles, Capt. H. H. Brown, J. P. Whiting, Giles B. Stebbins, Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, Chas. A. Andrus, A. B French, J. H. Palmer, etc.

A TRUTH SEEKER

Around the World.

Illustrated with fifty cuts, and with a steel plate engraving of the author in Vol. I.

BY D. M. BENNETT,

Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of "A Truth Seeker in Europe," "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," "Champions of the Church," etc., etc.

FOUR VOLUMES FOR $6.50.

The Most Instruction for the Least Money of any Book of Travels yet Written.

In 1880 the Freethinkers of the world held an International Congress at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was sent as a delegate. He took the occasion to make the tour of Europe, and his observations were embodied in "A Truth Seeker in Europe" (price, $1.50). The letters were also published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the readers were so well pleased with them that the proposition was made that he make the journey aronnd the world, and giv the world the benefit of a Freethinker's observations The proposition was accepted if the ones desiring such a work would advance five dollars each, the volumes to be dedicated to them. On July 20, 1881, Mr. Bennett began the journey, sending letters back to be published. The work will make

FOUR VOLUMES OF NEARLY 900 PAGES EACH

The first volume describes Scotland, Ireland, England, including also an account of the Freethinkers' International Congress at London, in 1881, Holland, the Netherlands, Germany, Austria, Greece, Turkey. Smyrna, Ephesus, Rhodes, Cyprus, Beyrout, Baalbec to Damascus.

Volume II. embraces visits to Damascus, the Sea of Galilee, Bethsaida, Nazareth, the Dead Sea, the Jordan, Jerusalem, and other places of interest in Palestine; Egypt and Egyptian history, and Egyptian towns, manners, and customs the pyramids, etc., to Bombay, India.

Volume III. describes India, Ceylon. Penang, Singapore, Java, an China.

Volume IV. Japan, the passage across the Pacific, and the tour over the American Continent.

There hav been many books of travel printed but none like this. IT IS THE ONLY ONE OF ITS KIND.

Mr. Bennett has a shrewd habit of seeing everything going on, and in his book he has faithfully chronicled the habits and customs of the different people of the many places he visited. The every-day life of all nations is laid before the reader by one who has visited them and beheld them with his own eyes. We feel sure this work is greatly superior to any account of a journey around the world we now hav.

ALL THE VOLUMES WILL BE ILLUSTRATED

Which adds greatly to the interest of the work, and with the close description will present Old-World places in very familiar light.

The volumes separately will be $2. Those sending $6.50 now will get Vols. I. and II. by return mail and the others as soon as issued, which will be in a few months, or just as soon as they can be got ready.

Vol. I. or II. mailed on receipt of $2.

FOR GIRLS.

A

SPECIAL PHYSIOLOGY,

OR,

Supplement to the Study of General Physiology.

ILLUSTRATED.

BY MRS. E. R. SHEPHERD.

12mo, EXTRA CLOTH. PRICE $1.00.

We hav here a work, the need of which has long been felt by all intelligent women, and especially by mothers and teachers, conveying to girls that special knowledge so important to them, but which, for proper reasons, must be omitted altogether from the general and school physiologies. Written in a careful and entirely unobjectionable manner, it is so plain and practical as to be easily understood, and its perusal is sure to leave an impression of the importance of the subject on the minds of the readers. It discusses the physiology of woman; the proper relation of dress to comfort and health; the age of puberty; menstruation; some of the diseases of women, their causes and prevention; something about marriage and motherhood, and many other topics of importance.

The special attention of mothers and teachers is called to this book, with the hope that they will read it, and convey to their daughters or girls in their charge the information given; or, better still, after reading, place it in the hands of the girls for whom it was written. KNOWLEDGE IS POWER.

READ.

KNOW THYSELF.

The untold miseries that result from indiscretion in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should purchase and read the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, entitled the Science of Life: or, Self Preservation. It is not only a complete and perfect treatise on Manhood, Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in man, Errors of Youth, etc, but it contains one hundred and twenty-five prescriptions for acute and chronic diseases, each one of which is invaluable, so proved by the author, whose experience for 21 years is such as probably never before fell to the lot of any physician. It contains 300 pages, bound in beautiful embossed covers, full gilt, embellished with the very finest steel engravings, guaranteed to be a finer work in every sense—mechanical, literary, or professional—than any other work retailed in this country for $2.50, or the money will be refunded in every instance. Price only $1.25. Gold Medal awarded the author by the National Medical Association. Illustrated sample sent on receipt of six cents. Send now.

CONSULT!

VINELAND, N. J.

A regularly educated and legally qualified physician, and the most successful, as his practice will prove.

Cures all forms of PRIVATE, CHRONIC, and SEXUAL DISEASES.

Spermatorrhœa and Impotency, or the results of self-abuse in youth, sexual excesses in maturer years, or other causes, and producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective Memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, &c., rendering marriage improper or unhappy, cured thoroughly and permanently cured by an

which is the Doctor's latest and greatest medical discovery, and which he has so far prescribed for this baneful complaint in all its stages without a failure to cure in a single case, some of them were in a terribly shattered condition—had in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness, Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others, again, had become foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves.

SYPHILIS positively cured and entirely eradicated from the system; GONORRHŒA, GLEET, Stricture, Orchitis, Bubo (or Rupture), Piles, and other private diseases quickly cured.

Middle-Aged and Old Men.

There are many at the age of thirty to sixty who are troubled with too frequent evacuation of the bladder, often accompanied by slight smarting or burning sensation, and a weakening of the system in a manner the patient cannot account for. On examining the urine, it deposits a ropy or cotton-like sediment, or sometimes small particles of albumen, will appear, or the color will be of a thin or reddish hue, again changing to a dark and turbid appearance, which plainly shows that the semen passes off with the urine. There are many men who die of this difficulty, ignorant of the cause. Dr. Fellows' External Remedy will bring about a perfect cure in all such cases, and a healthy restoration of the organs. Consultations by letter free and invited. Charges reasonable and correspondence strictly confidential.

PRIVATE COUNSELOR.

A treatise on above subject, sealed for two three-cent stamps, treating on Spermatorrhœa or Seminal Weakness, giving its causes, symptoms, horrible effects, and cure, followed by strong testimonials, backed by an affidavit as to their genuineness. Should be read by all. Remember no medicine is given. Address DR. W. H. P. FELLOWS, Vineland, New Jersey. Be sure and state in what paper you saw this.

Notices from the Press.

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Daily Times.]

We cordially indorse Dr. R. P. Fellows as an able and learned physician, who has been so highly successful that his name is blessed by thousands of those who found no relief in the old medication, but were cured by the scientific method originated by Dr. Fellows.

[From the Star Spangled Banner, Hinsdale, N. H.]

TO INVALIDS AND OTHERS: The Banner seldom indorses any doctor or medicin, but it is free to say to all interested that Dr. Fellows, of Vineland, N. J., is not only a skilful and reputable practitioner, but one of the most successful physicians in the United States.

Gems of Thought.

PETERBOROUGH: We cannot enlighten men if we shock their prejudices too violently.

PENN: The shock comes first, the light follows.

PETERBOROUGH: Most people will run away from both. Children are afraid of being left in the dark; men are afraid of not being left in it.—Lander's Imaginary Conversations.

THE men of the Reformation conquered for us the right of free inquiry in scripture; but modern science has conquered for itself the right of free inquiry about scripture.—Strauss.

THERE is no doubt but a man, while he resigns himself up to the brutish guidance of sense and appetite, has no relish at all for the spiritual, refined delights of a soul clarified by grace and virtue. The pleasures of an angel can never be the pleasures of a hog. But this is the thing that we contend for, that a man, once having advanced himself to a state of superiority over the control of his inferior appetites, finds an infinitly more solid and sublime pleasure in the delights proper to his reason, than the same person had ever conveyed to him by the bare ministry of his senses.—Dr. Robert South (1633-1716).

IF the existence of good in the universe implies a "benevolent creator," by the same rule the existence of evil implies a "malevolent creator." The evil is not less certain than the good. No refining can do away with this fact. Your hope that evil will cease, and good continue to exist seems without any foundation in reason. Why not good cease and universal evil remain? You "wish" that this should not be, and you "think" that it ought not to be. But if your wish and opinion could prevail, there would be no evil now, would there? Evidently your wish and opinion are not according to the "design" of the universe. The existence of evil, which no sophistry can explain away, shows that evil is incompatible with the nature of things. We cannot understand the nature of things, nor account for it in any possible way. To suppose a Theos does not help the matter in the smallest degree, but makes it worse, and is besides utterly gratuitous.—Waters's Through Rome On.

OBLIVION is infinitly preferable to the Christian theory of a future state, for if we become insensible to happiness we are also beyond pain. Death will be an eternal, dreamless, unconscious rest. According to Christian teachings, on the other hand, ninety-nine of every hundred human beings are consigned to a never-ending torture of indescribable horror. If my wife, if my children and friends, are doomed to endless torment, there can be no heaven of happiness to me; all the crowns of glory, all the golden harps, all the songs of heaven's host could not bring to me a single hour of happiness, much less the eternity of enjoyment that is promised to the faithful.—Dr. Arter's Bible—Is It of Divine Origin?

BETTER is death than life! ah, yes! to thousands
Death plays upon a dulcimer and sings
That song of consolation, till the air
Rings with it and they cannot choose but follow
Whither he leads. And not the old alone,
But the young also hear it and are still.
—Longfellow's Golden Legend.

DOUBT is the vestibule which all must pass before they can enter into the temple of wisdom; therefore when we are in any doubt, and puzzle out the truth by our own exertions, we hav gained a something that will stay by us, and which will serve us again. But if to avoid the trouble of the search, we avail ourselvs of the superior information of a friend, such knowledge will not remain with us; we hav not bought but borrowed it.—Colton's Lacon.

WE speak of Constantine as the first Christian emperor, but every student of history knows that in that fatal alliance, Christianity lost more than it won; it was far more paganized by Constantine than Constantine was Christianized by it.—J. W. Chadwick.

To reject any truth is but to defraud ourselvs. If it is a truth, it must be God's truth, and therefore sacred; and we incur greater danger in rejecting the general verdict of science than by devoutly accepting the same. At all hazards, we must squarely and manfully look truth in the face and not try to substitute wry faces and hard names for argument. To know the truth, and the whole truth, is man's most sacred duty and highest religion.—Dr. Brigham's Evolution, etc.

IN the bitter cry that was wrung from Jesus on the cross, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" we look down for a moment into an abyss of misery, which it is painful to contemplate; physical suffering and a shaken faith, the agonies of unaccomplished purposes, and the still more fearful agony of desertion by his loving father in whom he had put his trust. But Jesus, though he knew it not, had done his work. Nay, he had done more than he himself intended. After ages saw in him, what he saw only in his God, an ideal to be worshiped, a power to be addressed in prayer, we who are free from this exaggeration of reverence may yet continue to pay him the high and unquestioned honor which his unflinching devotion to his duty, his gentle regard for the weak and suffering, his uncorrupted purity of mind, and his self-sacrificing love so abundantly deserve.—Amberley's Analysis of Religious Belief.

JESUS CHRIST was an amiable and virtuous man. The morality that he preached and practiced was of the most benevolent kind; and though similar systems of morality had been preached by Confucius and by some of the Greek philosophers many years before, by the Quakers since, and by many good men in all ages, it has not been exceeded by any.—Paine's Age of Reason.

WE should always accept what is contrary to known laws of nature with great care, doubt, and hesitancy, and submit it to all possible tests and criticisms. This I hav done as regards God, Christ, and the Bible. Neither has stood the test, and so I reject them all, and hav advised others to do likewise, and hope all men, women, and children may some day see the real truth and become "wise unto salvation."—Elmina D. Slenker.

WHEN Gratiot county first began to be disturbed by pioneers, and soon after it had its first justice of the peace, a farmer named Davison walked three miles to secure a warrant for the arrest of his neighbor, named Meacham, for assault and battery. To save the constable a six miles' trip the defendant walked in with the plaintiff. They encountered his honor just leaving his house with a gun on his shoulder. Davison halted him:

"'Squar, I want a warrant for this man for striking me."

"I'm in an awful hurry; come to-morrow."

"So'm I in a hurry, and I'm going to hav a raising to-morrow."

"Meacham, did you hit him?"

"Yes."

"Davison, did you strike first?"

"No."

"Meacham, had you rather work for him three days than go to jail?"

"I guess so."

"And will that satisfy you, Davison?"

"Yes."

THE BIBLE—WHENCE AND WHAT?
BY
Richard B. Westbrook, D.D., LL.B.,
A theologian of high degree, and a counsellor learned in the law, on the origin and character of the Bible.
The author, though possessing all the prerogatives of a clergyman, repudiates the title "Rev." as a relic of Brahmanical caste and Roman sacerdotalism. He is entirely independent of ecclesiastical supervision and censure.
The questions, Where did the books of the Bible come from? What is their authority? and, What is the real source of dogmatic theology? are treated fearlessly in the light of history, philosophy, and comparativ religions. It is impossible to giv even a condensed statement of what it itself a marvelous condensation.
WHOLE LIBRARIES ARE HERE CONCENTRATED INTO ONE LITTLE BOOK.
The author's conclusions are, of course, against the supernatural origin and infallibility of the Bible, while the dogmas of the dominant theology are shown to be priestly perversions of the ancient mythologies.
The principles of natural religion are ably stated, and the claims of true morality are warmly adgocated.
The strong commendations of the secular press show that is just the book for these times of agitation and "revision."
Printed in good type and bound in cloth. Price $1.

HISTORY
OF THE
CHRISTIAN RELICION
TO A. D. 200.
By CHARLES B. WAITE, A.M.
Verdict of European Scholars.
The president of the society is Prof. Gustav Volkmar, one of the first biblical scholars of Germany, author of "Die Religio Jesu," "Jesus Nazarenus," "Ursprungs Unserer Evangelien" ["Sources of Our Gospels"], etc., etc. He is Professor of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in the University, and teacher of General Religious History in the state college at Zurich.
Prof. Volkmar writes to the author of "The History of the Christian Religion," inclosing the official letter of the society, in which Pfarrer Kupfschmidt, the secretary, says:
"In the name of the Society of Critical Historical Theology I hav the honor to inclose to you a few lines with the letter of our venerated Prof. Volkmar. With great interest did we receive information of your book, 'History of the Christian Religion to the Year Two Hundred.' One of our members, Herr Kappeler, has thoroughly examined the work, and has made to us a report concerning it, which became the subject of an animated discussion in the society. I leave it to Prof. Volkmar to enter into a critic'sm of your scientific work. It is for me to communicate to you that the whole society is rejoiced that that department of theology in which we are specially engaged has found in America so able a representativ. An unprejudiced and thorough presentation of the writings connected with the origin of our Christian religion, such as we hav found in your admirable book, places theology in accord with science; while, differently treated, it sometimes appears in contradiction to it."
The author has also received congratulatory letters from the author of "Supernatural Religion," in England, from two of the editors of "The Bible for Learne s," in Holland, and others. One of these, Dr. I. Hooykaas, says, "With great and thankful surprise I received your letter with a copy of your valuable history."
One of the most favorable reviews of the history was made by the learned Norwegian, Bjornstjerne Bjornson.

PRICE, $3.00 per annum; single copies, seven cents. Specimen copies sent on receipt of a two-cent stamp to pay postage.
The Investigator is devoted to the Liberal cause in religion; or in other words, to universal mental liberty. Independent in all its discussions, discarding superstitious theories of what never can be known, it devotes its columns to things of this world alone, and leaves the next, if there be one, to those who hav entered its unknown shores. Believing that it is the duty of mortals to work for the interests of this world, it confines itself to the things of this life entirely. It has arrived at the age of fifty-one years, and asks for a support from those who are fond of sound reasoning, good reading, reliable news, anecdotes, science, art, and a useful family journal. Reader, please send your subscription for six months of one year, and if you are not satisfied with the way the Investigator is conducted we won't ask you to continue without any longer. Smly

Notes and Clippings.

PULPITS are now filled with their regular occupants, and the war upon sin glides on serenely without a ruffle.

ON a small island near Fiji a soft material is found which, on exposure, hardens and looks much like firebrick.

A RURAL paper predicts that before the election is over many a dark horse will be feeling like a very light jackass.

UPON a modest gravestone in a Vincennes, Indiana, cemetery, appears this plaintiv legend, "His neighbor played the cornet."

A TRIAL has been made of a Siemens and Halske's telephone, laid under ground between Cologne and Elberfeld, with very favorable results, every word being distinct.

A MILWAUKEE congregation hav decided after a long debate that church lotteries are wicked. They will therefore continue to rely for funds on pew rents and beer festivals.

MORSE, who invented the telegraph, and Bell, the inventor of the telephone, both had deaf and mute wives. This shows what man can do when his wife will only hold her tongue.

THE First Baptist church of Detroit, as soon as they heard that their pastor had received the degree of D.D., raised his salary $500. This fixes the precise value of that honorary title—D. (500) D. (dollars).

A CONTRIBUTION box passed among a Cincinnati audience captured, among other things, a plug of tobacco and three beer tickets. The people of that city cannot lose consciousness of their secular concerns even in church.

A WASHINGTON clergyman shouted out the names of several brands of champagne under the impression that his congregation would take them for Latin quotations, and three deacons gave away their knowledge of drinks by getting indignant.

A COLORED preacher introduced into his sermon this true remark, "Ef de descendants ob de rooster dat crowed at Peter was to make a noise ebery time a lie is told dar would be such a noise in de world dat yer couldn't hear the hens cackle."

A BOSTON theologist thinks that twenty-five minutes is time enough for the best preachers to say their sermons, and wants the time cut down one-half for the poorer ones. That's all very pretty, but where's the man who will risk his life by selecting the poorer ones?

TALMAGE has an article in one of the November magazines on the question "Ought Christiane to hav any fun?" But while there are such queer divines as Talmage around it is about impossible to discover how Christians and other folks can help having some fun.

"GOD made Adam," said the colored divine, "and set him up agin de fence to dry." "Who made de fence?" shouted one of the audience. "Hush up da'; hush up da', you black brudder!" replied the preacher; "such questions as dem distracts de whole Christian theory ob religion."

"IF you don't like my sermons, pray what kind do you like?" said a petulant minister to an over-candid parishioner. "Well," was the reply, "I like the kind that drives a man into the corner of his pew and makes him think the devil is after him. When you preach like that I shall be converted."

CONGRESSMAN DINGLEY is as strong as Neal Dow in support of the Prohibitory law in Maine, but he does not hold that it greatly lessens the consumption of liquor. He says: "Even though it be but spasmodically enforced, it is better than license for it is a solemn witness to the sentiment of the state. The objection that prohibition cannot stop drinking is unreasonable, for no law absolutely kills out crime."

SCANDAL followed the Rev. Dr. Hoffman for many years, but he was not formally accused until last summer, when he was arraigned before the Methodist Conference of Lincoln, Ill., as a forger, perjurer, and social pest. He made a stubborn defense, but has at last been convicted and deposed from the ministry.

MR. BRADLAUGH, in notes from South Wales, where he has recently been delivering lectures, describes a visit to a heavy steel establishment where steel rails for roads are manufactured on a large scale, where 364 tons of steel rails are turned out in a single day, and where the whole process, from the pig iron to the completion of the rails, is effected in twenty-four hours time.

THE governor-General of Kieff lately told a Jewish deputation at Balta that many of them had been compelled to return from America, while in Palestine they were starving. If they only knew it, they were better off in Russia than anywhere else. He accused them of producing false evidence, and advised them to giv to their country a little of the love they lavished so inordinately on money.

"WHAT other business do you follow besides preaching?" was asked an old colored man. "I speculates a little." "How speculate?" "Sells chickens." "Where do you get the chickens?" "My boys fetch 'em in." "Where do they get them?" "I doan know, sah. I's al'les so busy wid my preachin' dat I ain't got time to ax. I was agwine ter inquire de udder day, but a 'vival come on and tuk up all my time."—Arkansas Traveler.

IN a lecture at Boston on Sunday Mr. Parton said that at Eton College, England, the students made in 1880 a five-horse-power steam engin, which turns the lathes in their shops. This is a great change from the almost exclusiv Latin verse-making of bygone days, and one which the Etonian destined for New Zealand or Australia will highly appreciate. Many of the bigger boys at Eton hav their own forges, at which they hammer and mold. To Cornell must be given the credit of originating this wholesome, industrial move.

A YOUNG man in an Illinois town stepped into a church door a moment one Sunday while the services were going on, and the smart minister saw him and shouted, "Go out, young man, she is not here." The young man was embarrassed for a moment, and then remembering the several ministerial scandals that were in the courts, he said, loud enough for all to hear him, "Yes she is, you old duffer. You hav got her hid behind the organ, and you want to go home with her yourself!" The minister blushed and said the services would close by singing the doxology.

THE unusual phenomenon of a worm-eaten church building is seen in Andover, Mass. Within the last four years boring insects hav attacked the timber of which the church is built. Their work was first noticed by reason of the little piles of dust they left upon the carpet near the wall. It has gone on until much of the woodwork of walls and pews is riddled with holes. In some places the shell which the borers hav left is hardly thicker than paper. The church people are afraid that what is left of their church will some day tumble on them. Possibly this worm-eaten church, just ready to tumble down at almost any moment, is somewhat symbolical of the decaying and worm-eaten system of religion taught therein.

LONDON has a larger population than many a European state with a sovereign and a parliament. At the census of 1881 the area of metropolitan taxation and police contained 4,764,312 persons. Thus there are in London more than double the number of people in Denmark, including Greenland; nearly three times as many as in Greece; more than eighteen times the population of Montenegro; some thousands more than Portugal, including the Azores and Madeira; nearly treble the population of Servia; more than double that of Bulgaria; three-quarters of a million more than in Holland; more than Sweden or Norway or Switzerland. And yet this splendid capital, the most populous and wealthy city the world has ever seen, is practically without a government.

THE Rev. Frederick A. Thayer had been employed by the Union Congregational church of Quincy, Ill., whither he had been called from Massachusetts, and had delivered several trial sermons. He seems to hav given satisfaction, and was to hav been duly installed a few Sundays ago; but it was discovered that he was not fully orthodox, and a council of sixteen clergymen were appointed to examin into the correctness of his views, and this on the very morning set apart for his installation. It took several hours to get the matter of his orthodoxy settled, and the time passed by when the installation should hav taken place. The organist and the choir entertained the audience the best way they could for two hours, but the waiters and listeners became very impatient. At length word was sent in that the installation would not take place. Eight of the sixteen reverend examiners had voted the Rev. Thayer to be unsound in his religious belief, while the other eight voted that the clergyman was within the bounds of orthodox Congregationalism. His unsoundness, in the opinion of the first eight, was in relation to the inspiration of the scriptures, the atonement, and the state of man after death. On these points he was a little shaky. On the following day, however, a large majority of the congregation passed a vote that he should be retained, and he accepted the situation despite the eight dissenters. This is only another indication of growing Rationalism, and that even the clergy are becoming impregnated with it.

ANOTHER clerical scandal! The Sunday Morning, of Youngstown, Ohio, has over four columns describing a case of improper conduct on the part of the Rev. J. C. Sullivan, of the Methodist Episcopal church, who for nearly two years has been in charge of a congregation in Salem, Ohio. To state the matter briefly, the Rev. Sullivan is a popular preacher with a wife and seven children, and nearly fifty years of age. He has been holding a revival meeting for some time, at which Mrs. A. L. Halwick, twenty-seven years of age, and Miss Emma Foote, twenty-one (living with the former), were converted. The shepherd took special interest in his ewe lambs, and visited them every two or three days at first, staying two or three hours at each visit. His greatest love seemed to be for the married lady, Mrs. Halwick, whose husband was much of the time away from home. His care for his ewe lambs so greatly increased that his visits became as frequent as two or three times a day, and were sometimes protracted into the night. The clergyman and the married lady usually retired to a room by themselvs. The girl, Miss Foote, was often sent away on some errand, and perceiving that she was not wanted, remained away some hours; but when she returned she found the clergyman and his convert still together shut up in a room by themselvs. He baptized them both, and they became full members of the church. After this his visits were still more frequent and prolonged. At length the husband came unexpectedly home and discovered all, together with very ardent and affectionate love-letters which had been written by both the clergyman and the newly-converted sister, and some of these hav been published. The girl, Emma Foote, played the part of Bessie Turner and told all. The result is, Mrs. Halwick has left the place and returned to her friends. The husband is nearly distracted. The Conference hav tried the erring clergyman, and, despite his great worth in bringing souls to Jesus, hav turned him out of the church. In closing his comments on this unfortunate case, the editor says, "These clerical scandals are becoming so numerous the cause of Christianity is being very much injured."

TO THE GEYSERS.

Tuesday, June 7th.—On this day I made a very pleasant trip to the celebrated Hot Springs of California, or the Grand Geysers, as they are usually called. Dr. J. L. York, having never visited the Geysers, kindly bore me company. We took the steamer at the wharf, and, passing out of the harbor amid the shipping from all parts of the world, made our way up the beautiful bay to San Quentin, where we took cars for San Rafael, and so on to Petaluma, the same route as before, and then on by rail to Santa Rosa, Healdsburg, and Cloverdale. This ride up the Sonoma Valley and the Russian River Valley is an interesting one, the fertile plain, the coast range of hills on the west, and the Mayacmas range of hills on the east, some of the higher peaks reaching an altitude of four thousand feet, affording a great amount of picturesque and changing scenery.

One cannot travel far in any direction in California without being almost painfully reminded of what a very religious people had the naming of the towns and localities of the country. I think there are more places named after the saints in this state than in any other state in our Union. The crop of saints on the Pacific coast was a most prolific one. Sometimes it is "saint" in the broad Saxon, but much more frequently in the Latin, san for masculine, and santa for feminine, both of which mean holiness. Thus we have, to begin with, San Francisco, San Quentin, San Rafael, Santa Rosa, San Jose, Santa Cruz, Santa Barbara, San Diego, San Bernardino, Santa Clara, San Leandro, San Lorenzo, San Luis Obispo, San Andreas, Saint John, San Pablo, San Ramoon, Saint Lawrence, San Emigdio, San Fernando, San Gabriel, Santa Ana, Santa Monica, San Antonio, Santa Rita, Saint Helena, San Benito, San Dieguito, San Jacinto, San Luis Rey, San Joaquin, San Miguel, San Simeon, San Mateo, Santa Maria, San Felipe, Saint Louis, San Buenaventura, Santa Paula, besides plenty of others that need not be named. There is a vast amount of holiness represented in all these sainted names; but as holiness is a quality somewhat repugnant to my feelings, I cannot say that I am fond of these saintly cognomens. They recall to my mind a host of useless mortals who spent their time in rolling up their holy eyes to an imaginary big ghost above the clouds, who has a wife and son, the latter of which the big ghost caused to be put to death in the most ignominious manner, and all for his own pleasure and glory. These holy saints, with turned-up eyes, much like a dying calf, who thought much more upon things above the clouds than upon the affairs of this world, have been of little use to the latter, and could easily have been spared, for any use they have been to mankind. The names of these numerous ecclesiastical worthies suggest that many of them were doubtless intolerant, bigoted priests ready to crush to the earth those who had the independence to presume to differ in opinion from themselves. That has been the character of saints in the past ages of the world. I must repeat, I do not admire saints and holy persons. But let us leave them for the present and pursue our journey to the Geysers.

Santa Rosa is the first town of much size north of Petaluma. It is the county seat of Sonoma county, and this is the way in which it received its name: A Catholic missionary, named Juan Amoroso, was once upon a time located very near the site of this town, where he showed great zeal in propagating the religion of Jesus and his mother, and he was fully determined to make Christians of those in the vicinity. His zeal was so great that he was disposed to use force if persuasion could not be made to answer the purpose. On one occasion, in company with one Jose Cantua, when scouring this part of the country in pursuit of somebody to persuade or force to be a Christian, he came to the territory of the Cainemeros tribe of Indians, who resided on the river Chocoalomi, now called Santa Rosa Creek. At a point in the creek opposite "the old adobe" he spied an Indian girl, and in his religious zeal he captured her, and forced her, nolens volens, to become a Christian by baptizing her at once in the creek and giving her the new name of Santa Rosa, from the fact that that was the very day kept in honor of Santa Rosa of Lima, and the same name was given to the town which was afterward started near the scene of this forcible conversion. The men of the Indian tribe did not like his manner of coercive conversion, and they pursued Amoroso in anger, and he was compelled to seek refuge from their wrath in his mission at San Rafael.

Santa Rosa is beautifully situated in the midst of Russian River valley, in a magnificent agricultural district, with teeming plenty on all sides. The valley is interspersed with oak-trees, which at a distance give somewhat the appearance of an extensive forest. It is somewhat noted as a place of summer resort.

Fifteen miles further north, and sixty-five miles from San Francisco, is Healdsburg. It is in the same valley and occupies a beautiful position on the same Russian River. It is situated on somewhat rising ground where Dry Creek and Russian River unite. It is also surrounded by an excellent farming country, and is a prosperous place. It takes its name from Harmon Heald, who settled here in 1852. It was incorporated in 1867. Litton Springs and Skaggs's Springs, places of some resort a few miles away, are reached by carriage from Healdsburg.

Cloverdale, a pleasant town with two hotels, situated at the head of Russian River valley, and surrounded by hills on the east, west, and north, appears to be the terminus of the North Pacific Railroad. Here we stop long enough for dinner, when we take stage for the Geysers, most of the way through a wild and very picturesque valley, a distance of seventeen miles up the Pluton River, which empties into the Russian River near Cloverdale. There were enough of us going to the Geysers to fill two capacious stages, and soon we were making our way up one of the wildest gorges or canons through which I ever traveled. Our course up the valley of the Pluton is in a southeast direction, and ascends gradually nearly all the way to the Geysers. It is such a country as one would suppose a good carriage road could never be made through; but two such enterprising men as Van Arnam and Kennedy accomplished it, though at a great expense. They are now receiving their profits by a pretty constant tide of sight-seers and pleasure-seekers who patronize their line through this wild region. The character of the road somewhat reminded me of some places among the Alps in Switzerland, where, if the horses or the driver should make a mistake, or some accident should occur, we might be precipitated two or three hundred feet to the foot of the gorge, where the river winds and dashes among the rocks. We passed here on the Pluton many such places where, by the slightest mishap, the stage and contents might go tumbling, rolling, and dashing to the very bottom of the ravine. But we put our confidence in the driver (I think Providence does not dwell in this sulphurous valley), and he used the lash very freely, and we often went upon the gallop, going up or down ditches, and whirling around bends enough to make one's hair stand on end in hurried contemplation of what a fearful state of things might occur should we by some accident lose our balance and get a little over the bank of the narrow roadway. The ride was, indeed, a grand one, though startling and almost hazardous. The drivers and the horses, however, are thoroughly accustomed to it, and understand their business, and there is really not so much danger as might be supposed.

PROFILE ROCK.

At a distance of about two miles from Cloverdale we passed a large projection from the crest of the mountain near the roadway, the outlines of which have much the appearance of a man's head in profile. Of course we had to stop and look at this Old Man of the Mountain who has been grimly standing sentinel here, probably for scores of thousands of years. We however leave the old man to still stand at his post thousands of years longer, while we wind and climb around and between other rocks, and take in with enraptured gaze the kaleidoscopic beauties which constantly reveal themselvs to our wondering eyes.

The rugged hills rise abruptly on both sides of our devious course. The craggy rocks are sufficiently covered with soil to afford, much of the way, a luxuriant growth of laurel, with its shining leaves, the madrona, the shrubby manzanita (Indian name for little apple), and the fragrant and profuse-blossomed buckeye, which grows in the greatest abundance. This last growth reaches the size of small trees, thirty feet high, and their profusion of foliage and large clusters or spirals of pretty flowers, now in full blossom, add great beauty to the continued scene of grandeur and loveliness combined. Higher up the abrupt hillside the pine flourishes to some extent, but in many places at a considerable elevation there is such a scarcity of moisture during much of the year that the growth of trees and bushes is stunted.

Pluton River seems not inaptly named, for, notwithstanding the blooming buckeye in such abundance, the ruggedness of the scenery, the jagged and precipitous character of the rocks and hills, and the slight sulphurous odor arising from the springs above, give the impression that we are approaching the regions where Pluto might be supposed to make his residence. If he prefers deep, rocky glens, hemmed in by sharp and craggy rocks rising a thousand feet or two on either side, with the dashing river bringing down the water from the heated springs above, which gush from the fervid earth, this place must suit the old fellow exactly. He ought to reign here in contented glory.

THE GEYSERS.

I will not attempt to describe all the scenery along our winding way, but it will be sufficient to say it was interesting and grand, the diversity being sufficient to prevent one becoming wearied with sameness, while an almost continued line of enchantments is kept up. We reached our destination, the Geysers, about four o'clock in the afternoon. The hotel at which sight-seers find accommodation stands in a narrow portion of the ravine, with the hills or mountain ranges rising abruptly on both sides. The hot springs which abound here in considerable numberf are east of the hotel, and are located in lateral ravines and on the side of the rugged hills.

This is, indeed, a wonderful locality. It must be in close proximity to the infernal regions, and here Pluto or Old Nick ought to reign in undisputed sway. Hell seems to come nearer the top of the ground right here than at any other portion of the earth I have visited. Within a quarter of a mile of the hotel the steam issues from holes and crevices in the mountain sides in at least a hundred places, and from the way it rushes out and the heated waters bubble up, an imaginative person can easily believe that the old fellow with the pitch-fork is busy at stirring up the fires.

This place is some seventeen hundred feet above the ocean, and is surrounded by wild scenery almost baffling description, and with all its grandeur there is a plenteousness of infernality about it that must be painful to a person troubled with a belief in the roasting regions, where a merciful being casts his own offspring for doing what he made and calculated them to do and knew they inevitably would do. A Scotchman might well call it an "uncanny place."

These springs and the healing qualities of their waters were known to the Indians long before the eyes of a white man rested on them. One of the places where the stream rises plentifully from a fissure in the hill is called the "Indians' sweat bath," by taking repeated baths in which many a rheumatic patient and many a one troubled with aches and pains has been greatly relieved. Perhaps instead of calling this place a suburb of the infernal regions it might more properly be named nature's laboratory and hospital, for to it many resort to be treated for the ills to which flesh is heir. The first thing I did after arriving was to wind my way down to the Pluton bath house, in the very bottom of the ravine, where the stream from nature's caldron pours out plentifully, and where the water heated by nature's furnace is brought in in abundance. There are numerous apartments in this bath house, one end being for men, the other for women. Here one can sit or recline on the benches, surrounded by a cloud of steam, until a profuse perspiration is induced, and then step under a generous stream of water, almost hot, conducted in from a spring on the hillside close by; or, if he prefers, he can have a dash of cold water, conducted in from another spring not heated by nature's fires; for, curiously enough, springs but a short distance apart afford water very different in temperature. It is almost like a first-class hotel, where both hot and cold water are conducted into every bedroom, and where either can be had by simply turning the faucets. It is needless to say I enjoyed this warm bath very highly. The bath house, the neighboring hot springs, and the precipitous and rugged character of the country reminded me of the hot springs I visited at Miya-no-shita in Japan, though I missed here the geniality and kindness which I met with among the simple-minded natives of the "Land of the Rising Sun." Americans will never become, I fear, so pleasant and polite as the heathen Japanese.

This is the way in which these springs first became known to white men. In the month of April, in 1847, William B. Elliot, a farmer, residing on Mark West Creek, in company with his son was on a hunting expedition. He tracked a bear to the summit of the opposite mountains, but here the track was lost. The father and son, however, discovered smoke or steam arising in the valley below, and naturally supposed it must be the home of some farmer or hunter; but upon closer inspection they saw no signs of human life about the locality. They descended the mountain side to a shelf or small plat, where they found awaiting them a large grizzly bear, which, however, they soon dispatched. Here on this level spot the first house was built at the Geysers, which was long known as the Old Homestead, and which was remarkable for having on its site an old grapevine twelve inches in diameter.

The first wagon road to the Geysers was from Healdsburg, over the steep range of hills called Hog's-back ridge, and the first journey over it was made in May, 1861. The main travel to the Geysers was over this Healdsburg road until 1874, when the road over which we rode was made, up the Pluton valley. The Hog's-back route is said to be extremely grand, abounding in interesting and beautiful scenes. The points for taking observations being so elevated, a much wider view of the beautiful country lying in every direction can be easily taken in. A fine view is afforded of the Great Russian River valley, of the great stretch of beautiful country, of the mountain ranges, and of the sea beyond. But the ascent is so sharp as to be very laborious for teams, so upon the completion of this valley road Hog's-back was pretty much abandoned. It must, however, have been an interesting route. One who traveled it thus expressed himself: "What a gorgeous panorama is there to be seen from the highest point of the road! In the immediate foreground are the steep mountain sides, covered with a dense foliage of varied hues. From the depths of the gulches sturdy pines rear their lofty pinnacles until they seem almost within reach. Southward stretches out the Russian River valley, interspersed with gardens and grain fields; and through its center, sparkling in the sun's rays, the river winds its tortuous way, concealed at times by the luxuriant growth of oaks and clinging vines upon its banks. Far beyond the valley the hills and mountains rise in graceful succession; and farther on the verge of the horizon, the Coast Range hems in the view, and is dimly visible in the soft hazy atmosphere, so peculiarly Californian."

As must be well understood, the name Geysers is given to the series of hot springs and steam escapes which abound in this locality, as the same name is applied to similar hot springs in other parts of the world, particularly in Iceland. These springs extend along the line of the Pluton River, six miles above the hotel, and two and a half miles below; though the most remarkable springs are in the immediate vicinity of the hotel, not more than half a mile away. I put in the remainder of the day in exploring these infernal regions, and I am sorry to say that Dr. York is so afflicted with a lame back that he did not feel adequate to the climbing necessary to seeing all the marvels of the locality. With stick in hand, by myself, and without a guide, I made my way up the

DEVIL'S CANON,

A deep and unsightly gorge, the mouth of which joins the Pluton River, some two hundred feet below the hotel. This gorge is literally filled with the steam which exudes from the numerous apertures and passages abounding here.

First an iron spring is reached, and then the Pluton River is crossed on a narrow foot-bridge. The stream here is about thirty feet wide, and the bed is full of large, smooth boulders, which for thousands of years have been made rounder and smoother by the ceaseless action of the Plutonic waters. A little past the bath house is the Eye Spring, with its dark-hued water; next Proserpine's Grotto, in the Devil's Canon, where epsom salts are found on the rocks in plentiful crystals. Here we are in what is called the Devil's Machine Shop, surrounded by infernal springs bubbling and boiling, with their alum and mineral solutions, and among the rest the Devil's Ink Bottle, so called from the darkness of its waters, as though the devil, besides attending to his numerous duties of constantly punching poor damned souls beneath the fiery flood, looking after every human being upon the earth, and continually plying his vilest arts to induce hapless mortals to step aside and yield to temptation, could find time to do so much writing that he requires so large an ink bottle! The ground here becomes almost unbearably hot, and the conclusion forces itself most strongly upon the mind that hell or internal fires cannot be very far away. The steam rushes out of the many holes in the hillsides and under one's feet. Alum springs abound, also solutions of niter or saltpeter, and a kind of soft clay called putty. The whole surroundings are so peculiar and unusual that a feeling of awe creeps over one, as well as the apprehension that danger possibly lurks around. On the sides of the banks on the right and left are carbonates of magnesia and various salts of iron.

A few yards further on up the canon the greatest wonder of all is reached, the Witches' Caldron, a large cavity six feet by eight, and four feet deep. It is full of a dark, boiling liquid, containing iron, sulphur, and alum. Although boiling and bubbling day and night, very little fluid runs away. It seems to be more heated air than water that escapes from the cavities below.

THE DEVIL'S CANOPY

Is a little above, on the right—a projection from the banks, composed of stalactites of sulphur and iron. The head of the canon is near, and the Steamboat Springs are also here. These are not in the bottom of the gorge, but are elevated some twenty feet. Here steam is profusely and constantly escaping, and rising three hundred feet high, very naturally suggesting a steamboat under a full head of steam. Among the noted spots in this remarkable canon are the Devil's Arm-Chair, which is a stone seat that almost blockades the path, and is narrowed down to a few inches in width between the rock and a tree growing out of the very narrow strip of earth bordering the canon, and from which an occasional puff of steam is visible. A few feet further on are huge rocks rising on the left, red as vermilion and soft like putty or hard paint. A little below is White Sulphur Spring, the waters of which are clear and cool, pouring from a pure white basin formed by the minerals gradually deposited there.

THE DEVIL'S KITCHEN

May well be regarded as a place of interest. So much has been said about his Satanic majesty that the place where his meals are cooked cannot be otherwise than very interesting, though from the appearance of the surroundings we readily come to the conclusion that a good meal of victuals never was gotten up here. Jets of steam are seen puffing out all around, with hot water in abundance, which bubbles up smoking hot; but no dishes, no pots and kettles, and nothing edible is in sight. If Lucifer or Splitfoot ever kept a hotel or boarding-house here he must have found his patronage light, and he quit the business in disgust, for his Kitchen looks deserted and untenanted. If old Splitfoot ever visits his Kitchen now it is done on the sly and so quietly that nobody sees him or even smells him, though a strong odor of sulphur pervades the Kitchen. The rocks rise abruptly thirty or forty feet high, and are seamed with white, red, green, and black stripes blending together at intervals, and there is a combination of bubbling, hissing, puffing, sputtering, and rumbling sounds that would seem to argue that the personage who owns the Kitchen is but a short distance below the surface.

In Pluto's Punchbowl the black water is tossing about, making a hollow, cavernous sound, while puffs of steam are ejected from numerous crevices.

The Witches' Caldron attracts much attention, and every visitor closely approaches its brink to gaze down upon its bubbling, murky waters of uncertain depth. It is said the lower edge of the Caldron was formerly bordered by a rim of rock and mineral deposit, and that in 1860 it was destroyed by a terrific explosion, which was heard at a great distance, and which shook the earth for a long way around. The waters of this spring reach the boiling point, or 212 degrees, while the other hot springs in the neighborhood do not rise above 190. The entire canon, by the torrid vapors which arise, is kept in a pretty high degree of warmth, quite sufficient, at all events, to stimulate the witches to "boil and bubble" their caldron to their heart's content.

A jet of steam issues from the foot of the Devil's Canopy and seems to come out with great force, sometimes enveloping the entire canon in a dense atmosphere of fog. From a small crevice issues heated air, which is very perceptible when the surrounding atmosphere is at a low temperature. Standing near the upper end of the canon and looking toward the lower end, watching the steam-jets spurting out in every direction and puffing away on every side, the effect of the chemical action taking place beneath the surface, the air thick with vapor and suffused with an odor of sulphur, it can easily be agreed that the man who once took it all in and shouted out to his companions that "hell's broke loose!" was not far out of the way.

THE DEVIL'S PULPIT

Is a rocky promontory which seems to be thrust out, nearly dividing the canon, and from which, from base to summit, issues steam in small puffs, great waves, and frequent jets. If the devil ever used this rocky eminence for delivering sermons, he must have had his imps and victims for an audience; and there is no reason why he should not have become well warmed up to his subject, and the humidity from the many steam jets would have been sufficient to keep him from becoming unduly dry. There is room enough in the canon for a large audience of those who would wish to listen to his persuasive arguments; and then, when preaching was over, they would have but a short distance to go to reach home. If such meetings are now held, and the devil really occupies his pulpit for preaching, it is unknown to the few who reside in the neighborhood. No notice is given out of the sermons, and no one knows of their taking place.

From the upper end of the canon, by making a little extra exertion, one can climb over the rough ridge, which presents the appearance of once having been highly heated, and at a distance of three or four hundred feet in an eastward direction other springs are bubbling up and other jets of steam are bursting from crevices in the earth. These places have the same devilish names as are attached to the localities just visited, carrying the idea that the domain of his sulphurous majesty extends for considerable distance around; thus we have the Devil's Oven, the Devil's Tea Kettle, the Devil's Washbowl, etc. The latter, also called the Crater, is somewhat in the form of a washbowl, and is thought to be an old witch's caldron boiled dry, the broth having been evaporated years ago. The ground in this locality seems to be cavernous, and vibrates when stamped upon. The number of wonders within a circuit of half a mile of the hotel will be seen are not a few—and it is unquestionably one of the most wonderful of nature's laboratories.

The causes which produce the phenomena of the Geysers are an almost unceasing theme for discussion. The more common opinion is that the molten mass of metals and rocks which constitute the center of the earth here comes nearer the surface than usual, hence the surface heat, on the same basis that volcanoes are simply the chimneys or vent places for the same internal molten mass, the difference being only in degree. Scientists and naturalists, on the other hand, regard the heat as being produced by the action of opposing chemical substances which exist below the surface, and that the Geysers are simply one of nature's laboratories, where heat is engendered the same as it is when water is added to lime. The steam and hot water are the result of spring water running into the chemical composition. This theory is probably more correct than the first. Whichever theory is true, the Geysers are truly wonderful phenomena of nature, and well worthy a visit from those who like to witness the grand and marvelous in existence.

Away a short distance from the Geysers are several natural beauties well worthy of notice. Somewhat below is what is called

THE LOVERS' RETREAT,

A little emerald arbor, beautiful, picturesque, and romantic. A rustic seat extends along the trunk of a fine laurel-tree which grows horizontally out from the mother trunk about three feet from the ground. The body being hollow for some distance, the aperture is used for a post-office, and is filled with cards, notes, etc., left by tourists. Here, of course, lovers fondly sit and commune upon tender subjects, and find notes for them left by others. A leafy bower near the Pluton Creek has the pleasing appellation of "Lovers' Rest." It is a pleasant place to rest, even for those who are not lovers.

The hotel is surrounded by very pleasant scenery. The range of high hills on the west side of the valley, though very steep, are well covered with green trees, and though they are Alpine in appearance, they are far from tiresome to the eye. From the pleasant and elevated look-out afforded by the upper veranda the view is truly a magnificent one, volumes of steam rolling slowly upward and rising like gossamer cloudlets into the clear sky, on the east. From the top of the western range a most beautiful view is said to be obtained, not only of the Plutonic valley, with its numerous hot and sulphurous springs, but of the Russian River and Sonoma and Napa valleys, which stretch away to the south as far as the eye can follow them, and disclosing one of the most fertile and productive countries on the globe. It is well worth the climbing to obtain this glorious view.

The attendance at the hotel is quite equal to the accommodations, all the rooms being filled. Those who wished seats in the morning for Calistoga on the return trip to San Francisco had to give in their names on the previous evening. Having seen the wonderful Geysers, Dr. York and myself concluded to return by the first stage. The return route is entirely different from the one which brought us out—that is to say, by way of Calistoga by stage and then by rail down the Napa Valley to the upper part of the bay of San Francisco.

At half-past seven in the morning two stages were up before the hotel, and in these some twenty-five tourists speedily seated themselves, and we were again wending our way up the rugged and picturesque gorge. For five or six miles the ascent was gradual but constant, our tortuous course winding around curves and nearing precipices, somewhat the same as the day before. Near the summit of the mountain we passed in view of a cone-shaped peak rising abruptly seven hundred feet above the surrounding hills, called the "Lovers' Leap," and connected with it is a legend that from a steep precipice on the top of it an Indian brave and maiden who ardently loved each other but were not permitted to marry, carried out a firm resolve to jump, and thus together end an existence no longer desirable.

The mountain sides and the narrow valleys are covered with a profuse growth of laurel and manzanita, some of which reach a hight of ten feet, and several similar growths which I do not know, together with the flowering buckeye and other trees in abundance. When the crest of the mountain range is reached, and we have passed over Hog's Back, a view of the valleys leading off to the south is obtained, which is grand in the highest degree, the skilful driver sends his team off at a rapid gait, and we follow our course down the winding descent for miles. The ride is exhilarating, and we have what may be termed a bird's-eye view for many miles away of the valleys and ranges of hills before mentioned, presenting such a landscape as but few places afford.

When pretty well down the several miles of almost constant descent, we pass through a region of quicksilver mines, where formerly pretty large quantities of the ore were obtained, but now are not worked. We stopped to change horses at a station where is a store, at which the curiosities abounding in this locality, such as petrified wood, Indian relics, etc., are kept on sale; then we roll on again to the level of the valleys below. Our driver is the son of the somewhat famous Clark Foss, of Fossville, who has resided here many years, and has run the line of stages between Calistoga and the Geysers, often sending three stages per day each way. A tourist who several years ago passed over this romantic route made these remarks about this noted stager: "A trip to the Geysers without Foss, the accommodating and world-renowned driver, who originated and owns the line between Calistoga and the Geysers, is like the play of Hamlet with that melancholy young gentleman left out. Not only is he an unequaled driver, but he is a man of genius and a philosopher. In person he stands six feet and two inches in his stockings, is as strong as a giant, has the voice of a tragedian, weighs two hundred and thirty pounds, and is as fine a specimen of muscular development and vigor as ever went forth from the hills of the Granite state. With a fresh team of six horses, and a load of appreciative passengers, Foss is in his glory. Alternately coaxing and encouraging his horses up the steepest acclivities, his eye sparkles at the top as he gathers the reins carefully, places his foot on the brake, turns half round to see that the passengers are all there, when crack goes the whip, a shout to the horses, and away we go down the steep mountain side. Trees fly past like the wind, bushes dash angrily against the wheels; the ladies shut their eyes, and grasp the arm of some male passenger and speed down the declivity with lightning rapidity, the horses on a live jump, and General Foss, whip in hand, cracking it about their heads to urge them on. The effect [upon the timid] is anything but pleasant. At every lurch of the coach one feels an instinctive dread of being tossed high in air and landed far below—in a gorge, or perchance spitted upon the top of a sharp pine. If a horse should stumble or misstep, or the tackle snap, away we should all go down a precipice. The angle of descent [in places] is exceedingly sharp, and down this declivity the horses are run at break-neck speed for two and a half miles, making thirty-five turns, and some of them extra short ones."

Editorial,

Cultured Liberalism.

William Emmette Coleman, a bit of ordinary humanity, residing in Presidio, one of the suburbs of San Francisco, is out in nearly four columns of the Index of the 12th inst., in which he takes rather severely to task the class of Liberals who are not "cultured" and who oppose theological claims. He says:

What a rarity is strictly accurate knowledge upon any subject, save in cases of the few specialists who may be devoted thereto! Some vague, general idea of the trend of modern science and of rational religious thought is abroad in the world; but, in most cases, even among those tolerably well-informed, naught but a mere smattering is known. Freethought and rationalism, we know, are in the air, so to speak; and yet how crude, how superficial, are most of its expressions! The world needs a cultured Freethought, an accurately comprehended and accurately-expressed rationalism. To further this desideratum the Free-Religious Association is sustained; but how little is it doing to relieve the ignorance and crudeness of radical propagandism! Mr. Underwood has recently, in the Index, written quite plainly concerning the anti-theological madness of much that passes current for Freethought, and I most heartily indorse his truthful and timely utterances thereanent. By what means are the masses being led into free-thinking forms of thought? What is the character of most of the literature and the oratory of the Liberalism of the day, and what their effects upon its converts and devotees? In sorrow be it said that coarseness, crudeness, intolerance, bigotry, misrepresentation, slander, are very largely represented in its make-up. Books, papers, tracts flood the country, filled with exhibitions of this anti-theological mania. These productions are as rabid against Christianity in spirit as the Roman Catholic church was against the heresy of the Reformation. Scurrilous abuse and misrepresentation of Jesus, the Bible, and Christianity pollute the pages of this literature, and disgrace Freethought oratory in large measure. With these writers and speakers, everything that can be collected derived from the four winds of heaven abusiv of these three, without regard to truth, honor, or decency, is greedily seized upon and scattered broadcast, to the disgrace of true Liberalism and an enlightened, conscientious rationalism.

With many of the adherents of this soi-disant Liberalism, for a true friend of genuin Liberallsm to protest against this coarse, illiberal species of Freethought proselytism, and to deplore its unhappy effects, is, seemingly, for him to commit one of the worst possible crimes; for, let any cultured rationalist express his honest convictions concerning the bad effects of this rabid antichristian folly, he at once becomes the target for the abuse, ridicule, and denunciation of those in sympathy with this inferior type of Liberalism. His private character is assailed, his culture and scholarship laughed at and denied, his motivs impugned, and expletivs and epithets showered upon him in rich profusion. Of course this class of Liberals embraces the Free-lovers, the obscenity law repealers, and the "tag-rag and bob-tail" of Freethinkers, as Mr. Underwood aptly termed them a few years since.

The misleading and illiberal character of much of the "Liberal" literature accessible to the masses necessarily has a more or less pernicious effect upon its readers. They gather incorrect ideas concerning religion, Christianity, the Bible, Jesus, the apostles, the Jews, etc., such literature being largely permeated with untruth and error, born of prejudice, ignorance, or love of falsehood, some writers erring ignorantly, some knowiugly and maliciously. And, through such writings, the masses of Liberals are being indoctrinated with prejudice, spite, illiberality, bigotry, and dogmatism as baneful in their tendency as the same qualities when manifest in the orthodox. Illiberal Liberalism is poisoning the people with its noxious dogmas, its falsehoods, and its maliciousness, and still the evil goes on. We need a higher standard of Liberal thought and endeavor at work among the masses. As it is, they are practically left to the mercy of the lower, more popular, and more unscrupulous advocates of a crude, coarse, perverted Liberalism. Converts from orthodoxy crowd the Liberal ranks, bringing with them the heritage of a long line of ancestral superstition, infolerance, narrowness, and spite. In many cases, these qualities seem to be intensified after acceptance of so-called Liberal views; and this keeping alive and intensification of such deplorable mental qualities are largely due to the character of the popular Freethought literature, in much of which these qualities are strikingly manifest. Now, as of old, sea and land are compassed to make one proselyte; and, when he is made, he is tenfold more the child of hell (bigotry and intolerance) than before.

There are several falsehoods in the foregoing extract from the conceited, self-righteous, and would-be "cultured," semi-advocate of theology, the Bible, Christianity, Jesus, and the apostles; it besides contains several flings, innuendoes, and insinuations, meaner, if possible, than lies themselvs. It is equal to the best that Joseph Cook or Anthony Comstock could get off. It is quite clear that he means the gist of his tirade of abuse for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the Truth Seeker publications, though Voltaire, Paine, Taylor, Bradlaugh, Seaver, Ingersoll, Watts, Denton, Chainey, and several others must necessarily come in for a share of his diatribe against those who oppose theological claims, the divinity of the Bible, Christianity, and Jesus. All these were, or are, opposed to those claims, and hence, according to the superior opinion of William Emmette Coleman, they must be very low and coarse fellows, false Liberals; they are not only "coarse," but "crude," "intolerant," "bigoted," and also abound in "slander" and "misrepresentation." They hav the "anti-theological mania," and reek with "scurrilous abuse," "misrepresentation of Jesus, the Bible, Christianity," and "pollute the pages of literature, and disgrace Freethought oratory in large measure." They are "soi-disant Liberals," guilty of untruth and error, or, "born of prejudice, ignorance, love of falsehood," the same committed "ignorantly, knowingly, or maliciously." These are the men who "indoctrinate with prejudice, spite, illiberality, bigotry, and dogmatism, as baneful in their tendency as the same qualities when manifest in the orthodox." Again, these are the men who are "advocating crude, coarse, and perverted Liberalism;" they are poisoning the people with their "noxious dogmas, falsehoods, and maliciousness."

As it is upon our humble head that these vials of wrath are principally poured, we must say a word in reply. If we are coarse and ignorant we are hardly responsible for it, for we act out our nature, and are just what the conditions which control our being hav made us. But we submit it to the self-conceited, mental coxcomb of Presidio, whether it is not a species of cruelty to taunt a man, less favored than himself, with ignorance, coarseness, crudeness, and falsehood. If a man is lame in one leg, or cock-eyed, or has a big nose, or is a little under size, or has a dark complexion, or red hair, is it kind or gentlemanly to taunt him about it, and hold him up to the world as an object of contempt and scorn? If it is wrong to do this for physical defects, how much more wrong to call attention to his mental deficiencies! Can a man who has no brains help being a fool, and is it a humane and manly person who tells him over and over again that he is a fool, an ignoramus, and don't know anything? Suppose Emmette was not quite as able as some other men, would he like to be abused about it and be told that he is coarse, ignorant, and vile? We readily acknowledge that we do not know so much as we would like to, and do not find as much time for reading as we wish to, but we hav looked into theological claims sufficiently to be convinced that they are all wrong, that theology is an absurdity, that there is no science of God, that the claims of supernaturalism are false, that nature is the Supreme Power, that the Bible was not written nor dictated by God, that Jesus was not begotten by a ghost, that he was begotten, if at all, by a natural father, the same as all other men; that miracles hav not been performed in any age of the world, and that the claims of Christianity are untrue. Being satisfied that we are correct in our conclusions we hav been, and are still, disposed to oppose these errors to the extent of our ability. If we do not know so much as the great (in his own conceit) William Emmette Coleman, we will do the best we can with such abilities as we do possess. We hav thought what we lack in quality we might make up in quantity. We are honest in the work we are doing, and try to do no injustice to the questions we treat, and so far as we know we hav not been guilty of falsehood or misrepresentation. If Mr. William Emmette Coleman had pointed out some of our falsehoods and misrepresentations it would hav been more manly than being content to make the charge without the slightest proof to sustain it. If we hav at any time been led into an error we will most readily correct it when specifically apprised of the fact.

It can be said of William Emmette Coleman that he has read extensivly, more perhaps than one man in fifty thousand. We confess, without a moment's delay, that he has done ten times the reading we hav; but it is a serious question whether his reading has been of great utility to him. It is to be feared that it has made him conceited and book-proud. There is a passage in the book which he reveres, and thinks should not be opposed or spoken of lightly, which reads thus: "Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? there is more hopes of a fool than of him." A man may hav read over thousands of volumes and still be lacking in fairness, charity, truthfulness, and the essential qualities of a gentleman.

If, with all his reading and culture, Mr. Coleman has shown remarkable powers of mind superior to other men, it has not been widely discovered.

But Mr. Coleman has either deteriorated or advanced, according to the standpoint from which he is viewed. Now, he seems to think it is very coarse and crude, exhibiting a great amount of ignorance and malice, to say anything against the claims of theology, against the Bible, against Christianity and Jesus. We remember that it is but a few years since we published three or more small pamphlets or tracts written by Mr. Coleman, in which he displayed not a little ability in writing against the claims of theology and Christianity; in fact, they were decidedly anti-theological. The first is a very strong argument that the Bible and the Bible God are disproved by nature, and cannot be true. In the second he examins the relationship which exists between Jesus, Jehovah, and the Virgin Mary. He throws not a little ridicule upon the supposed relation between the three, and makes out Jesus to be his own son, his own grandson, likewise his own father and his own grandfather. He makes the virgin to be mother, daughter, and sister to Jesus., and at the same time the daughter, wife, mother, and sister of God. This may be very learned and cultured, but it is certainly anti-theological and anti-Christian. To an ordinary observer this seems about as coarse, as crude, and malicious toward the Christian cause as anything we remember having written. His third pamphlet was against the Sabbath observance, and its aim is to destroy faith in the institution. We think we hav never said anything more radical upon the subject. At all events, it is very offensiv to our Christian friends, and is held by them to be very anti-theological and anti-Christian. (We sell the three for twenty cents.)

It is the same with his friend Underwood. He is now very tender upon the Bible and upon Christianity. He thinks nothing offensiv should be said against them. He has shown the same inconsistency in the change he has made that Mr. Coleman has. Although he deems it far amiss to say aught against theology, the Bible, and the Christian claims, he has himself in the past done not a little in that line. He has held several debates to prove Christianity false, he has delivered hundreds of lectures for the same purpose, he has ably shown in his "Influence of Christianity" the pernicious effect it has had upon the world. In comparing Christianity with Materialism he says very uncomplimentary things of the former. He has also made a fearful arraignment of Christianity by vividly showing up its "crimes." He has in another publication shown the failings and imperfections of Jesus, and has made fearful attacks upon the Bible, exhibiting its falsities and crudities. How can Mr. Coleman approve of such coarse conduct? But Mr. Underwood is not doing that sort of thing now; he has become too "cultured," too esthetic. It is no longer cultured Liberalism to do those things, it belongs to coarse, crude, and ignorant persons like ourselvs to perform such malicious and wicked things.

Mr. Coleman briefly explains the evolution he has made in this direction. He says:

It is but just to say that the writer [himself] was a few years ago considerably affiliated with this wing [the anti-theological] of Liberalism, but having by a process of mental evolution passed beyond its influence, his sympathy therewith, he is confident, can never be revived.

It is probably the same with Mr. Underwood. He has passed through a process of mental evolution until he now deems it improper to say anything derogatory to theology and Christianity; and they should probably be ranked with the proselytes whose last stages constitute them "ten times more the children of hell (bigotry and intolerance) than before." But the world is large, and there is abundant room for all of us. If there is a constituency of "cultured" Liberals who object to anything harsh being said in an anti-theological vein—anything opposed to the Bible and Christianity, we are entirely willing that Messrs. Underwood and Coleman should minister unto them; we will not object. If they even wish to join the church, and become cultured orthodox instead of cultured Liberals, we will not raise an objection; or if, like Oscar Wilde, they decide to wear sunflowers in the lapels of their coats as badges of their esthetic culture and purity, we will not raise a disturbance about it. We care not how far they depart from old-time Liberalism, but we claim some rights for ourselvs and ask to be left at peace in the enjoyment of such rights without censure or abuse. We regard theology a blind belief in the divinity of the Bible, and the intolerance and untruth of Christianity as our foes and the foes of the race; and we shall continue to oppose them so long as we retain our present views, and we are sustained by those who hold similar opinions. We here emphatically express the decision that we much prefer to continue the course we are pursuing in co-operation with such men as Voltaire, D'Holbach, Meslier, Paine, Taylor, Bradlaugh, Ingersoll, Wakeman, Seaver, Watts, Bright, Chainey, Putnam, and others than to train with such "cultured" Liberals as Coleman, Abbot, Ellis, Underwood, and Henry Clay Neville. Let us each continue his own course, and the more we keep apart the better. Of course, this is a sad thing to lose the countenance and approbation of such apostles of culture as Coleman and Underwood; but we shall endeavor to survive the loss so long as such a goodly number of plain, common-sense people as now approve of our efforts. If the opposit party hav true Liberalism, we promptly avow we want none of it. We had even rather be called coarse and ignorant and be lied about by hypocrits. We are content that Underwood and Coleman should write for the "cultured" few if we may be permitted to contribute according to our ability for the plain, uncultured, common-sense people of our country. We do not write for students, ex-reverends, and super-cultured souls, but are happy if we can adapt ourselvs to the working, unpretentious, but worthy class of our population.

Mr. Coleman seems very sensitive because what he calls "slander" has been somewhat used; but let him tell who began the use of slander. Let him say whether we ever said a word derogatory of Abbot, Bundy, and Underwood, until after they had abused us, and repeatedly said the most unkind things of us. Mr. Coleman seems like the unjust judge who was not annoyed when his bull had gored his neighbor's ox; but is excessivly annoyed when the neighbor's bull gores his. It is a trite old maxim that the man who hides is as mean as the man who steals, so Mr. Coleman has not and never has had a word to say in condemnation of the base and cruel attacks made upon us when in prison, but he is loud in condemnation of us if we retort somewhat, and state a few unpleasant truths. Let the cultured soul be assured that we can prove the charges we hav made, and by men more truthful and more fair than the esthetic gentleman himself, if the test is made. We think we can prove even more than is charged in the indictment.

The most contemptible feature in Mr. Coleman's cultured screed is when he quotes his friend Underwood's language and sentiment to the effect that the patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the "repealers" are "the tag-rag and bobtail of Freethinkers." What can a man think of himself, and what can others think of him, who will thus blacken and denounce thousands of worthy people with whom he has not the slightest acquaintance? No gentleman would indulge in such billingsgate. And this is the man to cry out "slander" in connection with others. How does he know who are bobtails? Pray, may he not himself be a bobtail? How shall it not be known whether he is a bobtail or a longtail? Can he not giv us a cultured treatis on bobtails and longtails?

He also has a slur and sling at "Freelovers." Are all those Freelovers who are not "cultured?" Whom does this impudent slanderer mean by "Freelovers?" Does he refer to the man who travels over the country and has his liaisons and illegitimate children in nearly every state, or does he mean those who are so uncultured as to to read arguments and facts in opposition to theology, the Bible, and Christianity? If he means that the readers and patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER are Freelovers, he is guilty of the most contemptible slandor, of which he has not the slightest means of knowing whether it is true or false. It is simply a reckless and malicious assertion, made with reference to people far more honorable than himself. We do not believe there is one in three thousand of the patrons of THE TRUTH SEEKER who is a Freelover; and it is possible cultured Liberalism might furnish nearly that proportion. But let Mr. Coleman hurry up his cultured school of Freethought for the elite of his class. We will try to still get along without it. If he can cultivate fairness and truth it will doubtless be as fine a species of culture as he can adopt.

We are sorry that THE TRUTH SEEKER and THE TRUTH SEEKER man are so much in the way of these cultured individuals, and that the placidity of their tempers should be so disturbed in consequence of such a "coarse," vile, and ignorant sheet. It has for a long time been a source of grief to them, and it has been feared they would sink into a state of hopeless melancholy. But we do not see wherein we are to blame for it, or what we can do to change matters. We are just what we are, and cannot make ourselvs over even to suit men we esteem so highly. But perhaps we can giv them a little good advice. If they will just attend to their own business, stand up bravely for Jesus, and, both directly and by innuendo, let THE TRUTH SEEKER man severely alone, he will be very sure not to harm them.

How It Was.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Your reporter's account of the late League Congress at St. Louis is mainly very correct and intelligently well done. On two points only does it need a restatement.

First. Where he says that the secretary's and treasurer's reports "showed that the League had doubled itself in members, means, and auxiliaries within the past year," his statement is true as to members, as the life and annual members hav more than doubled since the Congress of '81. At that time there were 106 annual members and 13 life members. Up to this year's Congress there were 242 annual members and 29 life members. The means were nearly doubled—last year $1,119.87; this year, $1,912.50. But it is quite erroneous to say the auxiliaries hav doubled. We added twenty-four new Leagues last year, which is a very gratifying increase, but we could hardly expect to double so large a number as we had last year. There are now 242 auxiliaries.

Second. The $50 contributed to make Mrs. Jackson and Mrs. Slenker life members should be credited to two gentlemen—Mr. Orlando Child, of Moline, Ill., and Charles Eckhard, of New York—$25 each, and not to Mr. Eckhard alone. Both these gentlemen were already life members. They know how pleasant it is to dwell in the tents of the League themselvs, and they needed some helpmeet, for life, in the good work. Hence they "proposed," like gallant gentlemen as they are. Mr. Child indicated a preference for Elmina if the Congress would approve, but Mr. Eckhard left his beneficiary entirely to the selection of the Congress. Thereupon Mrs. Severance arose and nominated Mrs. Lizzie K. Jackson, of St. Louis, as some recognition of her services as secretary of the auxiliary in that city. That is how it was.

Secularism.

Charles Watts gave us a splendid discourse before the Liberal Club on Friday evening, the 13th, concerning the fundamental points of secularism. He showed how thoroughly adapted it is to all the needs of humanity, moral, intellectual, and social. Secularism is as many sided as human nature itself. It seeks to develop every faculty that man possesses. It sticks to facts indeed, but to facts in all their infinit variety of meaning. It accepts the greatness of the universe. It has no narrow theory of the world's advancement. It looks to the ideal side as well as the material. It believs in poetry and romance; in the glory of the imagination and the splendors of art. It objects only to those artificial wants which hav been created by a false theology; the desires for a heaven hereafter, and a reward for goodness, besides the act of goodness itself. Secularism finds in this world all its motiv powers to action. One may be an Atheist, or Agnostic, or Theist, or Spiritualist, but his aim must be the life that now is, its perfection in the condition which we actually know, and not another life in unknown relations and with unknown duties. Secularism allows a vast range of opinion. It is based upon no opinion whatever, only upon the all-commanding importance of this present sphere of action. Here, indeed, one finds scope for his amplest faculties. Here he can exercise all his manhood. Here is a field for the display of the sublimest morality. To be moral is to be useful. There are no duties to God. Our duties are to man, and the foundation of those duties is what makes for the happiness of all. If the doctrin of utility is selfish, it is selfish in a very noble sense, for it is the welfare of the universal race which is to be sought and not that of any one individual. Secularism embraces in its theory life only, and not death. It does not seek to prepare for death—only for life. If one knows how to liv well, then he certainly will hav the power to die heroically. He will hav a fortitude that will front the eternities with a serene faith.

Secularism does not deny faith, only it says that faith must be based upon reason. It must spring from our knowledge and not from our mere fancy. We must reach the heart through the head, and not the head through the heart. The judgment must predominate. Faith is beautiful when born of scientific experience. Then its wings are indeed golden, and glisten with unfading luster. Such a faith in nature, in humanity, in progress, would Secularism cherish. It would make man hopeful and buoyant as he treads the upward way, only he must walk on the firm earth. Still his eye can be far-reaching and his purpose lofty.

Such are some of the ideas which form the basis of secularism to which Mr. Watts gave eloquent and lucid utterance. He is in many respects a powerful speaker. He is full of thought, and his thought is arranged with great skill. His points are definitly made and well put, without undue amplification. In this way he traverses in one lecture a vast field. He suggests many things, and the mind of the hearer is kept constantly on the alert. He is very enthusiastic. He has the magnetism of evident conviction. He captures his audience with the dash and abandon of his fervid speech. All the time, however, his deliberate judgment guides his fiery onset. He is not a mere exhorter. He is a teacher. He arranges; and from the beginning to the end of his discourse the hearer constantly progresses and sees new things, and the intellect is fed while the heart is exalted.

Every Liberal League should hear this orator. He has the right word for us. English Secularists, I think, understand the high art of organization and work much better than we do. Their achievement in this direction has been admirable. We should study their methods. Their practical experience will be of immense benefit in the future for the mighty work which lies before our onward path.

Mr. Watts comes to us with these rich experiences and practical insight. He has studied deeply into all the problems of the present time, and has a wise word to say; and if he does not solve every problem he will, I think, put forth no vague and foolish theory. He evidently builds upon common sense. He is a thoughtful evolutionist and knows that the future good must grow out of past achievement, and so he would reject only the errors and superstitions of the past, while the real life of the past he would unfold and carry on to greater issues in connection with the new light which we are constantly gaining. He is a profound historic student, and, with the wisdom of the true scholar, would make what man has reasonably done the basis of that grander good which he will yet accomplish.

Any League or body of Liberals who desire sound thought, advanced scholarship, genuin philosophy, and splendid eloquence should secure the services of Charles Watts. He will giv them the best of these things, I know, because I hav heard him myself.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

California Letter.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I congratulate you on your safe arrival home, and the many honors you hav received at the hands of our people on your route across the continent, and especially am I glad at the great success of the Watkins meeting, and great credit is due to the management for wide-spread notices which hav appeared in the press of this coast.

One such well-noticed convention is worth a thousand still-born meetings, and nothing would hav pleased me better than to hav taken part with those noble men in shaping public sentiment in favor of mental freedom.

That is a homely adage which says that "every dog has his day," and the day of the church dogs has been, to our kind, a long and dark day. But thanks for the courage and true manhood and womanhood of our workers, who are pushing forward the enfranchisment of our race from ignorance and superstition.

By the way, lest I forget it, let me commend and shake hands with Samuel P. Putnam for his able and terse criticism in reply to "Agnostic." We need more such writers as he to take the wrinkles and dry-rot out of some of the fossils who bear the name of Liberal. Bigots are not alone confined to the church, but in our own ranks they can be met simom-pure. A conservatism which can build nothing and do nothing but destory is fit only to sit in the corner and croak—a monument of departed usefulness.

We ought to be united as Liberals in the cause of every true reform, and stand heart to heart in aggressiv warfare against false religion in whatever form. What better am I that I hav rid myself of Methodism and then set about the work of taking on another cargo no less full of rubbish than the first? A conservatism which weighs well the assorted cargo as it takes it in, and then cuts loose from the worm-eaten wharf and moves out and tries to reach somewhere, deserves commendation.

I am still at home, but much better in health than when we parted at the train in San Jose, and hope soon to swing the battle-ax as heretofore.

I met our mutual friend, Adonis, in San Francisco a day or two since, and, true to his nativ impulses, is moving in the matter of calling a Liberal convention in 'Frisco, to meet on Paine's memorial day. Good angels speed the man and the cause so noble and true.

Now one thing more. I feel like writing an open letter to Dr. A. B. Spinney, of Michigan, asking him in all kindness to desist from the violence he is doing to the cause of truth as reported in notes of camp-meeting at Lansing in the Religio of Sept. 16th. In his blind attempt to drive apart the Liberals and Spiritualists of Michigan, he has taken leave of both common sense and truth, when he says that a disbelief in a hereafter leads to all that is sensuous and degraded. While a belief in spirit life compelled mortals to hold sacred their bodies, while Materialism taught a contempt for it, nothing but a softening of the brain can be pleaded for such a departure from truth and the facts of every-day observation.

I wish it were true that a belief in the Christian religion made people honest and good. But, alas! it does not. I wish it were true that a belief in ghosts made its believers honest and virtuous, but the facts forbid such conclusion, and a claimed knowledge, much less a belief, on the part of Spiritualists has had no such results as the emaculate Dr. Spinney would lead you to believe.

Men and women are made of one stuff, and they act out their life in harmony with their individual organism, be they Materialist, Spiritualist, or Methodist. Now, go forward, friend Spinney, and pull in pieces what others quite as good as yourself hav toiled to build under the title of Spiritual and Liberal Association of Michigan, and then, like every other ism, build a fence about yourselvs and fossilize, and thus become a stench along the highway of progressiv life. Sincerity and true genius unite men and women in a common cause, while fanatical crankism, through fear of absorption, spreads disunion in its path. Yours for truth. From a Materialistic-Spiritualist,

Dr. J. L. YORK.

Dialog.

B: Mr. A, I hav been very thoughtful and reflectiv all day, menaced by the sermon we heard yesterday at church. I could not deny the sincerity of the preacher; his tears and his earnestness convinced me of that. I hav spent the day thinking, and hav arrived at the conclusion that if religion is true nothing is of so much moment to mankind; and if it is not true, no imposition is as great; so I thought as you hav been so long a church-member, you would understand the question as well as any of my neighbors; therefore I hav come over this evening to ask an honest, close, and logical analysis of at least the fundamental doctrins of the Christian religion; to facilitate this investigation I hav arranged a series of questions. I hav long been satisfied that truth, like gold, never suffers from analysis. My first query is, What are the fundamental doctrins of the Christian religion as distinguished from all other religions?

A: I will answer you as well as I can, as I also feel disposed to probe it to the bottom, feeling assured that truth will appear the brighter when fully brought to view, and to giv you a candid answer as I understand the subject. The fundamental doctrins of the Christian religion, as I understand it, are two —first, the entire sinfulness of mankind by the sin of Adam, and called original sin; second, the redemption of mankind by Jesus Christ.

B: Mr. A, what do you understand by morality?

A: I understand it in short to be manners, the acme of which is, "Do as you would be done by."

B: Would not a man who had always done that be saved without a belief in the above two doctrins?

A: No; for that would be salvation by works, whereas the only condition of salvation is faith without the deeds the law requires, for by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight, so that morality is not Christianity.

B: Well, then, let us examin Christianity proper, the first doctrin of which you say is the sinfulness of man by the sin of Adam. Now one of two things must be true, that whatever were the effects of Adam's sin upon his race, they must hav been natural or penal. It is evident from our own experience and observation of the world around us that no change or deterioration in mental or physical powers results from a simply moral offense. If the results were natural, they would hav followed every offense of the kind from that day to this. But this is impossible, as we know, for that would make you punishable for every sin committed by your ancestors of father and mother from Adam to yourself.

A: I think from the narrativ that the results must hav been penal, for the act per se of eating an apple was nothing, but the doing it was violation of law and involved punishment.

B: That is true; but as the offense was very limited, the punishment in justice could not hav been unlimited. While it was just to punish the guilty, ought not the punishment to stop there? If mankind suffer anything because of Adam's offense, it must be by the infliction of the penalty of his offense upon his children. It is pertinent here to inquire what is the sum total of sufferings consequent to us upon Adam's offense.

A: I could quote to you our Confession of Faith, but then, to be short, it is all we suffer in this world, and a liability to eternal wrath in another.

B: And all that inflicted upon unnumbered millions for an offense committed thousands of years before they were born. As well suppose a man guilty for being a man, and liable to the gallows for being born blind. The following question must be settled. Can the innocent be justly punished?

A: But we do suffer because of the conduct of our parents, and that for life; but the sufferings you speak of appertain as much to animals as men, and result from infraction of organic law, and not from judicial administration. God would as justly punish animals for physical imperfection as to punish man for the same. No blame can attach to any being for what he is by nature; and if Adam's physical, mental, and moral nature were degenerated as a penalty and curse of the law, it must hav been executed by God himself, and how could infinit love fasten the penalty of eternal anguish upon unborn posterities? Can it be that our religion rests upon injustice so manifest to all! It seems so, if the race of man was cursed for Adam's offense. Yet this is the doctrin of all the orthodox churches, and what rests upon justice is not reliable. But is that the only objection you can urge against the system?

B: No; there is another fundamental doctrin as faulty as the one we hav considered, and which ought to be considered solemnly and with close attention, for if it is true it is the most momentous to mankind; but if it is not true it is the greatest imposition on the world.

A: What is that doctrin?

B: It is that this same fallen race was redeemed by Jesus Christ.

A: Can you find any fault with that doctrin, Mr. B?

B: Not with the doctrin itself, but I hav no evidence of its truth.

A: Why not true, Mr. B?

B: This involves me in the necessity of making some very careful steps, for in this matter I hav as much at stake as any man else, and, first, this redemption must relate to the curse consequent to Adam's offense. "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." This means death, and is corroborated by Paul who says, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, so that death has passed upon all men for that all hav sinned." Again he says, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, and the law said, Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things written in the book of the law to do them, and the first commandment of the law was, Thou shalt not eat of it." If the above is true, redemption means the deliverance from the curse of the fall, whatever that be. The Episcopal church says, "For he is the very paschal lamb which suffered for us, and hath taken away the sin of the world, who by his death hath destroyed death, and by his rising to life again hath returned to us everlasting life." If that is true, why are people dying every day? The Methodist church says Christ made by his oblation of himself once offered a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the whole world. The Presbyterian church says, Christ satisfied the justice of his father. Other churches support the same. All the churches hold that the curse of the law included all the suffering and death of this world and eternal perdition in another. From these Paul says Christ hath redeemed us. Let us see: Has there been no sufferings and death in the world since the time of redemption? If justice is satisfied, and the judgment paid, whether by the debtor or his friend, ought not the execution to be returned satisfied and prosecution cease, especially in regard to infants, who hav never sinned, but were made sinners only by falsely imputing to them the sins of another? How in justice could a father see a babe suffer and die from a false imputation? Mr. A, where is justice in this case, to say nothing of love or tender mercy? Can such a case be thought just among men? Could you think a law just that would punish your little boy for an offense of your grandfather in his boyhood?

A: Mr. B, you must remember that God don't see as man sees.

B: But if man sees what is just, don't God see it so too? If he does, don't he see as man sees in that case? Justice is a principle. It cannot be pretended that man sees all that God sees, but when a man sees what is right and proper, God must see it so too, so that justice with man is justice with God. Yet just think of it; all the distress and anguish, suffering and death, inflicted upon us because Adam, not a week old, not knowing good from evil, was persuaded by a talking snake to eat an apple! Can it be true that God imputed Adam's offense to all his posterity, and then treated them and punished them as if they were guilty, when he knew they were not? Tell it not in Gath. Is that principle just? If that principle can be just with God, why not just with man? And yet upon this doctrin hangs Christianity; that is, that God can be just and yet punish the innocent. This seems to be its first foundation-stone.

A: I do not pretend to understand it all; it is a great mystery. You know it says, "Great is the mystery of godliness."

B: But what good will it do to believe a mystery when you hav no evidence of its truth? If it is a mystery, of what use is it to us? A thing is not more likely to be true for being mysterious. But the principle under consideration is justice, not the application of justice in obscure cases, but the principle. Is it right, on principle of equity, to punish the innocent, not only so, but to punish myriads of innocent beings down to the end of time, for the same one offense of one man? But to counteract all effects of Adam's offense, it is set forth in the second doctrin of the Christian church that Christ came into the world. Now, Mr. A, this is a very serious subject, and I feel much interested to find the truth of it; and if I cannot find it I shall hav acquitted myself by doing the best I could. And, first, the redemption must relate to the sin of Adam and all its consequences, or to something else. If it relates to man's sinfulness, as derived from Adam, then it must be a provision for his entire recovery or only a part. But before we enter upon our inquiry of what has been done, I wish to know who the Redeemer was and what he could do?

A: He is said to possess two whole and perfect natures, very God and very man. The very God is said to be the son of God, equal in substance, power, and eternity with his father. This son, very and eternal God, united himself to a human fœtus and was born of a woman, and is now called Christ, the savior.

B: Why, according to that there is more than a trinity in the godhead, for there was a trinity always before Christ, as such, existed. And then to constitute a Christ, another whole and perfect nature of man was added, and certainly a perfect man must be a personality, and hence with utmost propriety it may be said there are four persons in the godhead. But to effect this redemption of all mankind somebody must die. Men hav been dying from the beginning down to that period, and yet the death of millions was insufficient for the redemption of a single man. What must do it?

A: No one could do it but Christ. Paul says Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law.

B: But as Christ possessed two whole and perfect natures, both those natures must hav died, or only one. Do you claim that the son of God, who was coeternal with his father and essential to the godhead, died? Can an infinit being die, either per force or by his own volition? The godhead died or he did not. We want the facts in the case. If I cannot get facts I must decide it a modern mythology. Truth has nothing to fear from error on a free rostrum. If the godhead did not die, then the manhood did die; and, if so, the salvation of the world hangs on the death of a man. All men before him died, and all since are dead or will die; why should there be so much more value in the blood of Jesus than in the blood of Joshua or all the world besides? Were the claims of God on man such as to be satisfied with the blood of one man and two or three hours' suffering? What did that blood and suffering do for God? Was the pleasure he felt in seeing the blood and writhing of an innocent man such as to satisfy him for the sins of the whole world? Your church says that Christ satisfied the justice of his father; another church says Christ was a complete and perfect satisfaction and propitiation for the sins of the whole world; now mark, if God did not die it was only a man that did die. He who worships what died worships what is not God. He who worships what is not God is an idolater. Mr. A, if my logic is not correct, please set me right. I am in earnest to find the truth, for I am satisfied that all truth is reasonable, and forty years is long enough for a man to liv and not know whether the Christian religion is true or not, or whether it may not by and by be called Christian mythology as well as the old Roman and Greek religions are now called heathen mythology. Nothing is true because it is mysterious. How can you explain or enlighten me on this point?

A: I can only say it is a deep subject. I never allowed myself to question it because there were greater minds than mine that decided in its favor, and I thought I must believe, for without faith it is impossible to please God.

B: But, Mr. A, would God ask a man to believe a thing without evidence? Would a faith that was based on a falsehood please him, or is there any virtue in faith per se? If there is, then it matters not what we believe, so that we believe it, whether Mohammedanism or Mormonism, that faith pleases God, does it? But I must return to the question of redemption, for every theory that is not demonstrable is unreliable and remains but a theory. If Jesus satisfied the justice of his father, ought not the judgment to be discharged and the execution called in? Yet little babes are suffering the curse of the law every day. Why is this if the debt has been paid and the judgment canceled? If the debt has been paid, it matters not by whom, and payment acknowledged, infants for almost two thousand years hav a just claim to damages for false imprisonment. If redemption, satisfaction, atonement, and propitiation for the sins of the whole world do not mean an entire counteraction of and salvation from the fall of Adam, what do they mean?

A: I suppose that salvation in another world is what is meant.

B: If it is taken to mean life in another world, it is very safe to promis it in some world of which nobody knows a thing; and if that world be as far off as the poet sings,

> "Beyond the bounds of time and space
> Look forward to that heavenly place,
> The saint's secure abode,"

The soul must travel much faster than light or be a great many years on the journey. Redemption must cover all the liabilities of Adam's offense. But does that harmonize with the Bible? Does not Paul say, "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin?" You see, therefore, that death, with with all its inducing ills, was the curse of the law. And yet Paul said, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of law." If this is true, where is the human being that has ever been saved? But enough for the present; good-night. . . . .

Good evening, Mr. A, I hav come over this evening to finish up our talk, for I confess I could not sleep much last night for thinking, and this morning I picked up a book from the table and saw it was the "Presbyterian Confession of Faith" that a neighboring lady had lent my wife. I thought, now I will see what that man believes that I heard preach last Sunday, who started me to thinking. So I commenced with the creed and read on to the fortieth page, which said: "The son of God, being very and eternal God, did take upon himself man's nature, so that two whole and perfect and distinct natures, the godhead and the manhood, were inseparably joined together in one person, which person is very God and very man, yet one Christ." At this point a serious query arose, Did Christ die? The godhead without the manhood was not Christ, nor was the the manhood without the godhead Christ; so if Christ died, then both godhead and manhood died. I could not conceive it possible for an infinit God to die. I therefore almost came to the conclusion that the whole was made up in an age when people did not read or reason. If that is the case, that is the reason why no human being has yet been saved.

A: Mr. B, it is a very serious thing to question the ways of God to man. His ways are past finding out.

B: That saying may be for the purpose of stopping us from investigation, lest we should find out the mystery and discover the source of all this theology. I confess I hav less confidence in it than I had when I began thinking, for then I knew less about it. I am not afraid of offending God by thinking to get at the truth amid so many errors. Why, Mr. A, if you were to-day in Turkey and talking with a Mohammedan and reasoning with him about the improbability of Mohammed being a prophet of God, he would with equal force turn to you and say, "It is a serious and even perilous thing to speak irreverently of God's prophet." It is time to worship after we find out what to worship. It is time to believe when we hav good evidence of what is true. God himself couldn't ask you to believe before. As I hav gone so far, I want to take one step further, and then I'll subside. We are told that many great and precious promises are given to the followers of Christ. Now, if those promises are fulfilled, it is proof of their divine authenticity. But if they are not fulfilled, one of two conclusions must be arrived at; 1st, they are a failure, or, 2d, that he has no followers at the present day. The followers of Christ are described as being regenerated, born again, hav passed from death unto life, hav been translated from the kingdom of darkness into the kingdom of God's dear son, hav become heirs of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ, and do not commit sin, for his seed remained in them, and they cannot sin because they are born of God. The above describes his people, and now for the promises. "They shall ask what they will, and it shall be done. If any two of them shall agree on earth as touching anything, they shall ask, and it shall be done. They shall cast out devils in his name. They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover. If they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them, and nothing shall be impossible to them. And these signs shall follow them as proofs of their faith." Now, where are the proofs? Where is there even a minister that does not send for a doctor if his family are sick? The most astounding instance of the failure of the promis "Ask what you will and it shall be done unto you" is seen in the case of President Garfield, when the believers of several nations asked God during two months and a half for a cure and got nothing. Now, Mr. A, to sum the matter up, it seems to me that the following are legitimate conclusions: 1st, No child can be justly punished for the sin of an ancestor; 2d, No son can be as old as his father; 3d, No infinit being can die; 4th, Whoever did die was man; 5th, No death of one man could atone for the offenses of the whole world, for if a child may be punished for Adam's sin it might be for the sin of every father and mother from Adam to itself, and as all men die, the death of that one man is unavailable; 6th, If redemption does not save us from the curse of the law in this world, what assurance hav we that it will in another? Good-night.

Organization.

The two first counties to perfect their Freethought and Liberal League county committees are the following, and are as follows:

Jefferson county: L. D. Olney, chairman, Watertown; Charles Kellogg, South Rutland; David Andrews, South Champion.

Ontario county: John Peck, chairman, Naples; E. W. Mitchell, West Junius; G. G. Reed, Canandagua.

I hope the other counties of the state will follow the above example at once. H. L. GREEN, Sec.

"Leaves of Grass."

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: I hav lost my position as president of the Woman's Reading Club here because the preachers' wives could not bear the odium of my owning, reading, and circulating that horrid book, "Leaves of Grass." But the more I read it the fuller do I find it of strong, vigorous, pure. and wholesome truths. Now, I want some good to grow out of evil, so I wish to sell "Leaves of Grass" as many as I can. Price $2. Address ELMINA.

Snowville, Pulaski Co., Va.

This notice will appear but once. Clip it, save it, and act upon it.

MRS. COLBY and Mrs. Smith will occupy the rostrum in Horticultural Hall, Boston, Mass., during October. Calls for week evening lectures will be acceptable. Address Mrs. Colby and Smith, Banner of Light office, Boston.

Ideology.

By ideas the world of mind is controled, true or false, as the case may be. All ideas are human in their origin. And while the human mind is the perfection of chemism, and really subsistent as the organism is from which it is evolved, all its ideals, by which it is equally controled, are never real, but always imaginary. And when Mr. James Hale (TRUTH SEEKER, Aug. 26, 1882,) and others undertake to convince us that the human mind is not the sublimation of innervation, he should first prove that in nature's order the core or seed is not the result of plant life in the vegetable kingdom! Thus, in the vegetable, instinct, vitality, nutrition, and growth; in animal life, innervation and sensation are added; and still progressing to manhood, we hav all we know of consciousness, thought, ideality, and ideas. The little girl with her doll follows her own ideality (unconsciously), as the Christian does when he falls upon his knees, shuts his eyes, and talks to the ridge-pole. The mind not only follows its own ideal unconsciously evolved in each mind for itself, but it has no power for cognizing its own mental processes of faith, fear, hope, or joy. It has no faculty for discriminating between the truth and the falsehood of ideas, in themselvs considered, except what is implied in human thought and reason. And hence it becomes manifest how it is that we are victimized by our ideals of the unknown, even from youth down to old age.
